REVIEW OF THE WEEK

WE are pleased to observe that the editor of the English Review in the July issue disposes in a very few words of the unseemly article which appeared recently in the Spectator abusing his Review in language which we, being anxious to preserve the tone of literary journalism, refused to reproduce. We think it is obvious that the editor of the Spectator has been badly served in this matter, because to every letter of protest to which he affords the hospitality of his columns he seems to find it necessary to reply in spasms.

It may have occurred to the imaginative reader in moments when, with Alice in Wonderland, he gazes through the looking-glass and perceives impossible things, to speculate upon what would happen if on a certain day not a single paper should be issued, and the thought must have made him shiver with temporary apprehension. No news with the morning coffee; no solace during the journey towards his diurnal occupation; no stimulating posters as he wandered forth at midday; no sheets damp from the press at dewy eve. Fortunately, perhaps, such a day is far off, and in order that we may not lose heart Mr. Belloc has organised still another contribution to literary London in The Eye-Witness, a weekly review dealing smartly and brightly with questions of topical interest. It is to be published every Thursday, and, if the first number is a fair sample of favours to come, it should command success. The best article, judging from a literary point of view, is one by Mr. Charles Granville, entitled "The Artist and his Nation," in which the thesis is advanced that cosmopolitanism is not only unnecessary, but may prove to be a positive hindrance, to the creative work of the future. It is a debatable question, but the author argues well and strongly for the value of "first impressions" to the artist, as opposed to lengthy study of places or peoples. Mr. Belloc himself contributes a dialogue, and, we imagine, the leading article on "Federal Defence;" other well-known names—Maurice Baring, H. G. Wells, Desmond McCarthy—sign articles on various topics which spread the interest of the paper over a wide area. We wish The Eye-Witness a long and honourable career.

As citizens of London, the most talked-of centre in the world at the present time, it behoves us to behave in seemly fashion, since there are many folks among us "takin' notes." The Paris correspondent of one of our papers has heard some serious reflections on the appearance of Englishwomen, communicated by a visitor during the past busy week. Englishwomen, it seems, "move their limbs as if they were walking over a golf-field; they have the gait of the athletic being;" and the consequences when fashion decrees the adoption of restricted skirts are "awful." They fail in their effect—sartorially speaking—because they "do not sit up." "They are deplorably hump-backed when they are at table or occupy themselves with work in the house." These assertions are much too sweeping, and convey the impression that the Parisian visitor must have encountered some peculiarly unhappy specimens of womanhood during her stay with us. Were her remarks prompted by envy of a superior physique? To do her justice, she paid a vague compliment at the close of her diatribe by observing that there is something impressive about an English woman—"a certain natural dignity that one does not find to quite the same extent in other nations." Why, then, should she grumble at the presence of a few round-shouldered, or anæmic, or inordinately muscular ladies who chanced to cross her field of vision and offend her artistic sensibilities?

The art of the theatre at the present time is in a somewhat chaotic state, partly, doubtless, because so many different types of client have to be provided for, and to treat the subject at all adequately in the compass of a short article is almost impossible. In the last issue of the Gentlewoman, however, Miss Lillah McCarthy discusses "The Intellectual Side of the Drama of To-day" very interestingly, and makes some pungent observations on the output of plays and comedies which bids fair to overwhelm the modern manager. Writers of modern drama, she notes, have ranged themselves in two separate camps: the one carrying out its ideals without resort to the traditional usages of the stage; the other "conforming to strict dramatic rules, and possessing a strong sense of the necessity of dramatic unity." The "propaganda play" does not appeal unless it is made the centre of some strong dramatic incident worked to a vivid climax, and Miss McCarthy points out that the successes of the Court Theatre a few years ago, and of the Repertory Season at the Duke of York's, were due to a grasp of this fact. "Plays that fail to do this may have a small distinguished following of an anæmic type, but the intellectual force they possess will be useless in influencing the thought of large masses of the people." In her management of the Little Theatre Miss McCarthy has shown what can still be done in the direction of intellectual drama apart from any violent propagandist spirit, and it will be interesting to follow the fortunes of the dainty house of the Adelphi, which has taken us so fortunately far from the "Adelphi" traditions.

THE TASK

I sit and beg beside the gate,
 I watch and wait to see you pass ;
 You never pass the portals old,
 The gate of gold, like gleaming glass.

Yet you have often wandered by,
 I've heard you sigh, I've seen you smile,
 You never smile now as you stray—
 You can but stay a little while.

And now you know your task is hard,
 You must discard your jewelled gear ;
 You must not fear to crave a dole
 From any soul that waits you here.

And you have still your regal pride,
 And you have sighed that I should see
 Your gifts to me beside the gate,
 Your pride, your great humility.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE HOME OFFICE

THE vigorous and true indictment by Mr. Lyttelton of the administration of the Home Office under the present head of that department has led us to refer to an article which we wrote in November last. It was at that period that unwarrantable interference with the jurisdiction of magistrates in England was coincident with the reign of disorder in South Wales as the direct result of similar interference in the Principality. The methods of Mr. Churchill have latterly exhibited more restraint, either because he has learned a modicum of wisdom, or because it is felt by his colleagues to be too great a scandal and too great a danger to the party to allow him to pirouette in the guise of a carnival entertainer. We are thankful for small mercies, and perhaps it is not a small mercy that the administration of justice is no longer in all respects the butt of an irresponsible Minister.

The change of tone which is observed may of course be traced to the fact that in November last a General Election was known to be imminent, and a notorious manifesto—which fell absolutely flat—had just been launched by the distinguished statesman whose salary from the taxpayer had recently been doubled. If it was impossible to return value in the coinage of wisdom, it is often easy to delude a democracy with a spurious issue.

It was with this view in his mind that Mr. Lyttelton remarked that the conduct of the Home Office recently had been marked by appeals to the gallery. Mr. Lyttelton coupled this observation with one which was not equally true. He said that the manner in which the Home Secretary, without inquiry of and consultation with the magistrates, had made a random use of the prerogative of mercy had thrown "the Justices into utter confusion and bewildered embarrassment in dealing with the cases which came before them." We think that Mr. Lyttelton has been entirely misinformed. The Justices paid not the slightest attention to the aberrations and fussy circulars of the temporary occupant of a position which they had been accustomed to observe under the control of trained statesmen.

The self-assertive tyro, imbued with transatlantic ideals of political warfare, may overreach himself to such a degree that he labels himself as negligible.

It must be confessed that Mr. Churchill had very little to say in extenuation of his conduct of the Home Office, and what defence he did offer was very coldly received by the House of Commons. The necessity of reasoning in place of ranting reduced him to a sorry plight, in which inaccuracy of statement was allied to acknowledged infidelity to the legislation passed by the Government of which he is a member. Infidelity was carried even further, because presumably having omitted to submit a proof of his speech to Mr. Lloyd George, he brought a very discreditable charge against the Welsh Magistracy. In effect the charge was this—he, of his great wisdom, knew that the local authorities in South Wales only demanded the presence of troops to preserve order because that course would entail no charges on the locality, whereas, if police were requisitioned, the cost of their employment would be a local charge. He proceeded that police were better fitted to deal with the emergency—a fact which must have been known to the local authorities—and therefore, seeing through the latent aim of the demand for troops, he disregarded it and sent police.

We venture to think that Mr. Churchill should have taken a further step. If—without necessity and purely from mercenary motives—the local authorities demanded the employment of a force armed with lethal weapons which might—also without necessity—have resulted in loss of life, a responsible Home Secretary would not for seven months have left those authorities—without humanity, without principle, and without sense of proportion—to prescribe the necessary measures in a situation which has never ceased to be threatening.

The defence advanced is utterly flimsy. The object was to catch votes by playing to the gallery.

But what an extraordinary position do we observe when we come to examine Mr. Churchill's attitude towards the Prevention of Crime Act. This Act was passed by his predecessor, Lord Gladstone, with Mr. Churchill's consent as a member of the Cabinet. He now says he has had "great misgivings about that Act," and characteristically he makes an attack on the magistrates whose duty it has been to administer it. The Home Secretary goes further, and announces that he is, on his own authority, altering the provisions of the Act as it appears on the Statute-book, and instructing the police to take the law from him. Well may the Justices stand aghast when it appears that it is not the law of Parliament which they are called on to administer, but the law of Parliament as amended by Mr. Churchill.

Where is this farce and travesty to end? When is the Home Department to be intrusted to a statesman of the calibre of Mr. Asquith when he filled the position, or of Mr. George Cave to-day? Is it possible that internal administration can be balanced, can be carried on with even-handed firmness and wisdom whilst an appeal to the illiterate voter is barely concealed in every executive and administrative act?

THREE GREAT PAGEANTS THE SHAKESPEARE BALL

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

THERE are three factors in his national life in which the average Englishman takes a legitimate pride and interest—the intellectual superiority of our language and of its literature; the loyalty of the masses, through all the varying political and constitutional changes, towards the Throne; the strength and supremacy of our Navy. Therefore, as was only proper and fitting, the three found separate and worthy expression at the Coronation, and we now propose to deal with them in the order of their celebration.

Those who witnessed the great pageant at the Albert Hall can only carry away with them a confused but glorious memory of the barbaric splendour of the scene. No human mind is capable of dividing such a mass of colour and gorgeously arrayed men and women into separate entities, and thus forming a number of separate pictures in which the leading figures stand out in bold relief. Probably never before, as long as histrionic annals have any claim to veracity, has such a gathering been brought together to do homage to the life-work of a single mind. What other author has ever had such a tribute paid to him, and what other works, three hundred years after the master has passed away, have grown so much in the estimation of mankind, and have received as a final seal to their superiority the homage of over four thousand of the élite of every civilised and semi-civilised nation?—

... men might say,
Till this time pomp was single, but now married
To one above itself.

For every nation, every State, every Sultanate, or feudatory Dominion considered worthy of sending a special representative to the King's Coronation was represented on Tuesday night of last week at the Albert Hall. In almost every one of these countries, whether they are filled with Aryans, Mongolians, or Negroids, editions and translations of Shakespeare's works are to be found. To the Englishman, whether exiled in his country's service beneath palm or pine, they have brought encouragement, inspiration, and solace.

In far-off China and Japan, in South America, in tropical Africa, in little craft navigating the Arctic regions an edition is certain to be found ready at hand, and in a hundred foreign tongues which have known no common literature except the Gospel they are read with wonder and delight. Napoleon as a young lieutenant once said "With my sword by my side, with my Homer under my arm I shall walk through the world." This proud boast the mighty Emperor only partially achieved, because the Englishman was at that time also walking through the world with his sword by his side and with his Shakespeare under his arm.

The combined efforts of all the historians who ever tried to bring the past before our eyes pale into insignificance before such a scene. We saw long half-forgotten or neglected epochs stalk before our eyes. We saw the famous men and famous women, the good and the bad, the fortunate and the unfortunate, the lovers of old romance and the great characters of fiction galvanised into life as if by a stroke of the enchanter's wand, and pass before our wondering gaze in a glorious or shameless procession. In twenty-seven stately quadrilles they passed, Emperors, Kings, Queens, courtesans, statesmen, and warriors; Romeos and Juliets, Antonys and Cleopatras, Hamlets and Ophelias, buffoons and jesters, mechanics and rude peasants, to bow low before the Court of Queen Elizabeth. All this galaxy of fame and beauty formed but component parts in man's complex nature; it was a procession in which we saw all the passions of men and women, good and bad, dull or brilliant, which have swayed the world throughout all ages, painted by a single human mind, and it is just because we realised that we were gazing on a Pageant of our every-day life taken from the past and portrayed by the highest exponents of each failing or virtue of human nature, that the Ball was such a unique spectacle and such a unique success.

But even amidst the triumph the voice of criticism cannot be altogether hushed. We should like to praise, but in this country nothing great was ever accomplished without some flagrantly vulgar and unworthy anomaly asserting its world-weary Hydra head, and in this instance it was to be found in the conception of the Pageant rather than in the carrying out of the prescribed programme, which seemed perfect in every detail. Ostensibly the Ball was arranged to provide funds for a National Shakespearian Theatre. Whether such a scheme is desirable or capable of accomplishment we are not disposed to discuss here, but we might make one remark in passing—namely, that if all the money spent on costumes had been voluntarily subscribed towards such a scheme we might now be in a position to erect the finest and most resplendent theatre in the world. But you cannot raise large sums of money without holding out to the subscribers the hope of some eventual reward, and in this case the attraction was the opportunity given to each of disporting him or herself in some historic rôle which each believed he or she resembled either in character or in form. Thus the funds which were actually realised will only represent about ten per cent. on the money spent in bringing about the Pageant. "But things like this you know must be," as old Jasper would have remarked, and it is not to that which we refer.

The Ball was purely Shakespearian; every one had to come arrayed as one of his characters, or in the contemporary period of his own life or that covered by his plays. Whatever may have been the original intention, it developed, as it was bound to do, into a spontaneous tribute to that supreme mind, which has exercised a greater influence in moulding the character of a nation and of mankind as a whole than any other to which we do not apply the appellation of divine. Therefore, as it was a tribute to a particular individual, that individual should have been made the central figure to whom all should have paid homage. But we need hardly say that the customary English lack of imagination, snobbishness, and suburbanism asserted itself and gained the day, and the outward display of homage, not the true, invisible tribute which all were paying in spite of themselves, was offered, not to Shakespeare the Man, but to Elizabeth the Queen. Now, when you come to analyse this, nothing could be more absurd. Why should far more renowned Kings and Queens, rulers of far greater Empires than ever acknowledged the sway of England's Queen, do obeisance to Elizabeth? In many ways she was a great woman, and probably an ideal Queen for the troublesome period in which she lived, but unworthy to hold a candle to many of those who bowed down before her. Her period produced many famous men who laid the foundation of our Empire of to-day, and Elizabeth is the acknowledged recipient of their accumulated glory. But she has left no legacy except, perhaps, that of a partially good and partially bad example to posterity; whereas Shakespeare, the unknown townsman from Stratford-on-Avon, who strutted in a minor rôle over the boards of the Theatre which he was destined to adorn with immortality, and who held the horses of those who have since become but the show puppets of his genius, has left us a legacy which is the corner-stone of the Anglo-Saxon race and the envy and admiration of every other nation.

done him in his lifetime! What an opportunity to show that even if the contemporary passes the true diamond by unnoticed, subsequent generations, when they have recognised the error of their forefathers, will lose no opportunity to make amends! What a satisfaction to those yet to come who may not receive the seal of recognition during their lifetime! What a unique opportunity was allowed to go by! How much more impressive if all the historic characters whom he has rendered famous and whose names only live through him, and if all the nobles and courtiers who neglected him, buffeted him, or who extended their patronage to him in return for priceless sonnets, including Queen Elizabeth herself, had been made to do obeisance to Shakespeare! We do not mean that he should have been made to look ridiculous by representation in the life; rather some simple statue of the master adorned with the Parnassian Wreath. But the opportunity was allowed to slip, and, although we may regret, there is no object in dwelling on it further.

But, placing aside this lamentable lack of imagination in the conception of the scheme, the Shakespeare Ball was a huge success. No ball on such a scale has ever been attempted before, and it is doubtful if any other country could have brought together such a gathering of princes and nobles, actors and actresses—the proud and the rich, the humble and the poor. No other building can compare with the Albert Hall for such a scene. It is almost impossible to overfill it, and, in spite of the thousands present, it never seemed overcrowded. From hundreds of boxes the past looked down on the past; in every corridor it seemed as if the grave had yielded up the most famous men and women of all times for just one evening on this earth; the vast floor was alive with dancing figures—men and women of different epochs separated by centuries meeting each other for the first time and dancing in perfect amity. Old rivalries were forgotten, and the bitterest enemies walked or waltzed side by side—the murdered strutted with their murderers, the deposed with their usurpers, the defeated warrior with his vanquisher, the divorced or injured wife with her erring spouse; the lover once more joined hand with the loved; the mistress and the courtesan with the wife the affections of whose husband they had ousted; the master and the servant, the buffoon and the jester, the Emperor and the slave met on terms of perfect equality for just this one fleeting night.

It mattered not that many present had never read a line of Shakespeare or seen his plays acted; for once all caught the enthusiasm of the occasion, and accepted his creations as something beyond their comprehension, and bowed down in mute idolatry. It mattered not that many were arrayed in costumes totally unsuited to their characters, ages and figures; for once the end justified the indiscretion. It mattered not that many had little conception of how to dance a quadrille; their misplaced steps and awkward genuflexions were lost in the vastness of the hall and the splendour of the multitude. Over all a myriad of coloured lights shone, and the largest band ever brought together sent forth its joyous strains. But no light is too bright and no noise too loud to obscure genius, and hovering above the gilded throng, overshadowing in its simple splendour all the kings and queens, princes, statesmen, and warriors, alive or dead, there brooded the mighty spirit of Shakespeare the Man.

KING AND PEOPLE

ON Thursday and Friday of last week the opportunity was given to the masses of showing their loyalty towards the Throne, both in the King's Coronation Procession and in the great parade of the troops through London on the following day, in which the King and Queen also took part. It is no use trying to disguise the fact that the crowds in the West-end were smaller than those which attended the Coronation of Edward VII., but both the King and Queen received a right royal welcome. At first sight this fact might seem disquieting, and might be brought forward as evidence that the Crown has lost some of its old-time prestige and popularity, but if we examine the causes there is little ground for alarm. Primarily it was due to the erection of the barriers along the line of the short procession. So much had been written about them in advance, and so many warnings had been issued by the police as to the dense masses who might be expected, that a very large number were frightened from turning up at all, and preferred to take a cheap ticket to the country or seaside. Thus not only was the crowd small, but it was composed of the lowest elements in the population, who came more out of curiosity than from a sense of duty or patriotism. On the other hand, so low were the prices asked in some of the stands that many who were formerly accustomed to line the side-walk watched the procession in the comparative comfort and luxury of a stand.

So much has been written of the Coronation that it would be superfluous to attempt a description of it here. We are more or less accustomed to these huge parades and State ceremonies, as we have had a surfeit of them during the past ten years, but the foreigners and visitors from across the seas were lost in wonder at the vast amount of time, money, and trouble we spend on a show which lasted at the most about twenty minutes. No other country—not even Oriental—goes in for them on such a scale of magnificence; no other monarchy takes the people so much into its confidence, and allows all classes to have a hand in making it a popular success. Probably no city has ever been so transformed as was London during last week. The streets through which the procession passed on the first day were entirely shut off and made into a circus to which entrance was obtained through thirty-two doors, which happily remained open all the time. In this vast arena was erected a mass of stands capable of seating, at a rough computation, over a million people, and surely Rome in her palmyest days never equalled or approached this record. Every one of these stands was decked in red cloth and painted in distinctive colours.

The procession on the second day was the finer sight of the two, because it was longer, of greater variety, and the King and Queen, riding in an open carriage, could be seen, and consequently received a much louder and more enthusiastic welcome. The detachments of the armed forces of the Empire sent a thrill of pride through every Briton's heart and aroused the envy and admiration of every foreigner present. The British Army is small in numbers, totally inadequate to the vast needs of our Empire directly any unexpected strain is thrown on it, but what other army can make such a brave show on occasions like these? What other country has such a variety of uniforms and colour? What other citizens take such an interest in each distinctive corps, and know its deeds in war so well? To judge from the cheers which greeted each detachment the Army still enjoys its old-time popularity with the masses, and many a humble citizen must have regretted in his inmost heart that he was not gorgeously arrayed and taking part in such a glorious scene, so flattering to the pride of the people, but still more so to the pride of those who received the people's cheers. The Blue-jackets received a tremendous reception, and right well they deserved it, for we never saw a finer-looking body of men. But it is invidious to praise one corps at the expense of another; cavalry, artillery, infantry, and irregulars—all were welcome, and even louder than ever was the cheering which greeted the Colonial and Indian detachments.

The Indian cavalry and orderly-officers sat their horses like bronze statues. Their Oriental calm and reserve never for a moment relaxed. They heeded not the cheers, they gazed neither to the right nor to the left, they marched on, the embodiment of that belief in destiny which has cemented our work of a century in India. No other Empire has ever had defenders drawn from so many quarters of the globe, no other capital has ever resounded to the martial tread of so many alien races, who come, not as enemies, but as loyal supporters of one monarch, a common flag, and heirs of all our Imperial traditions of past conquests and pioneer work under palm and pine.

Perhaps the most impressive sight of all was the detachment of Canadian Mounted Police, who alone of all the corps from across the seas brought their own horses with them; but every Colony and Dominion contributed equally worthy sons, whether they came from Australia or New Zealand, from the Straits Settlements or West Indies. South Africa sent men who ten years ago fought against us in the field, but who are now to be found amongst the most loyal supporters of the Union Jack. As long as the Empire has a sufficiency of trained men made of the same material as those we saw on Friday last it has little to fear. But are there enough? Has not the time arrived, whilst the memory is still fresh and the enthusiasm of the people still waxes strong, to adopt those measures which would place our security above suspicion and our power beyond the avarice of those who covet that which we now hold. To judge from the cheers which greeted the soldiers and sailors of the Empire, some form of conscription would not long be unpopular once it was understood, and men realised that it was not a form of tyranny and oppression, but an honourable service which no self-respecting citizen could afford to avoid. It was a proud day for the King, it was a proud day for the troops, it was a proud day for the people. Shall it be allowed to pass or to remain only as a glorious memory rapidly fading into the endless vista of inutility and sham? Cannot we use it in a more worthy manner as a corner-stone on which to build a haven of refuge and permanent safety for those generations who will fill our place in ages yet to come?

But the most impressive sight of all was at night, when, the traffic along the line of route having been stopped, the streets were given over completely to the people to view the illuminations. Piccadilly, St. James's-street, Pall-Mall, and Whitehall resembled some huge river, the high banks of which had been illuminated with a myriad of lights, and through which there flowed a deep, black, sluggish torrent. The behaviour of the crowd was admirable; no roughs made the night hideous with rowdyism and songs, and the police had merely to keep the people moving in the right direction. Hardly a sound arose as the mighty throng sweeping alternate ways moved at a snail's pace, gazing upwards at the blaze of light, not heeding the occasional showers. The numbers of those who came out at night completely eclipsed the throng which had lined the route earlier in the day, and it was not composed of the lower classes, but of rich, the middle-class, and the poor.

THE NAVAL REVIEW

On Saturday morning a mighty fleet anchored in the Solent awaited the arrival of its Admiral and King, and no more inspiring spectacle has ever brightened a monarch's eye. If the Coronation was grand, the Naval Review was infinitely more so. Other nations can show larger armies than ourselves, but no other nation can produce, or has produced, a fleet of such numbers or of such strength as was gathered in the fairway between Southampton and the Isle of Wight. Science has brought about marvellous changes in a short space of time in ships of war. Opposite the Royal yacht in Portsmouth Harbour lay the Victory, Nelson's old flagship at Trafalgar; she was the first vessel on which the King's gaze rested on his arrival in the Harbour. The Victory is 226ft. long, displaces a little over 2,162 tons, and her four decks tower above all surrounding craft, and were pierced for 104 guns. The Victory was propelled by the winds of heaven. She was a fast vessel for those days, and with a favourable breeze could make seven knots in a following wind. Outside in the Harbour lay the Neptune, the latest addition to our fleet and the last word in Super-Dreadnoughts. The Neptune displaces 19,900 tons, she has hardly a piece of wood on her, and instead of the 104 guns of the old Victory she carries only ten of any value in warfare. But these ten guns are monsters in size and power. The range of the Victory's largest cannon was about a mile, and the weight of her largest shot thirty-two pounds, but each of those monsters on the Neptune can throw 850lb. of steel filled with a deadly explosive to a distance of over twenty miles. The guns of the Victory were exposed on open wooden decks, those of the Neptune are guarded in casemates of solid steel over eighteen inches thick. Engines capable of driving her at a speed of over twenty-two knots an hour have taken the place of the three masts of Nelson's old flagship.

But whilst science has brought about these marvellous results in a little over one hundred years since Trafalgar, the men who man those guns are of the same race, trained in the same school, and are the descendants of those who shoved home the round shot, pulled the lanyards, furled or unfurled the sails, and who repelled the boarders in that Titan struggle which set the seal on our naval supremacy which no nation has dared to challenge since. Men come, men go, and others take their place; admiral succeeds admiral and passes on his way; the old three-decker has made way for the ironclad; only one thing remains permanent and unalterable in the British Fleet, and that is the spirit and example of mighty Nelson. The spirit of the great Admiral brooded over the British Fleet on Saturday last, and he was the true Commander-in-Chief. Powerful and impressive as that mighty fleet looked, so sombre in its grey, colourless paint, yet so dazzling in its strength and majesty, the real centre of interest was the old war-worn Victory. Every visitor should have seen her before visiting the anchored Fleet just to place him or her self in the right frame of mind to understand and appreciate the mighty legacy which Nelson has left to the English race. Is there any experience in life more inspiring or one which brings home the past more forcibly than a visit to the old Victory in Portsmouth Harbour? You enter the ship by the very gangway through which Nelson passed when he left Plymouth on his last glorious but tragic voyage. You walk the same old decks over which the Admiral paced day after day scanning the horizon for the French fleet. You see some of the same old muzzle-loading guns, thirty-twos, twenty-fours, and twelve pounders, which his men handled one hundred and six years ago. You enter the Admiral's cabin, a narrow room so low that you are hardly able to stand upright, in which he lived at one time for two years at a stretch without ever setting foot on shore, and in which he wrote his historic prayer when within sight of the combined fleets of France and Spain in the early morning of October 5th, 1805. You can almost see him pass from the cabin and mount to the quarter-deck as if it were a throne amidst the cheers of his devoted crew. You can follow him as he goes his rounds visiting each deck in turn and enjoining his men not to waste a shot. Then once more he is on the quarter-deck surrounded by his captains and giving them his last instructions, and dictating his last famous signal.

Now there rises before your eyes the picture of a great battle. The huge three-decker sails majestically along, not deigning to reply to the long-distance fire of the French and Spanish line. You can picture to yourself Nelson and Hardy pacing the deck side by side and the Admiral ordering more canvas to be crowded on. You can see the sweating gun-crews, the sails rapidly filling with holes, the masts damaged, the marines falling on the poop beneath the enemy's fire until Nelson orders Captain Adair to make his men lie down. Then comes the mighty crash when the Victory breaks the enemy's line, pouring her deadly broadside into the stern of the Bucentaure, and falling on board the Redoubtable. You follow Nelson and Hardy in their calm promenade along the quarter-deck, amidst the death and destruction caused by the rapid fire of the enemy's marksmen in the masts and yards. Then the smoke for a moment is wafted away, and, looking up at the Redoubtable's mizzen-top, you see a French soldier alone—for his companions have fallen—taking a steady aim at the little man with the one arm, the cocked hat, and his breast covered with orders. Then his musket flashes, and Nelson turns sharply and falls. Hardy tries to raise him, but the Admiral replies, "They have done for me this time, Hardy; my backbone is shot through." The sailors carry him below; but even then he must indulge the last infirmity of his noble mind. He sees the tiller-ropes shot away, and orders them to be replaced. Then he covers his face with his handkerchief in order that his sailors shall not see the loss they have sustained. He passes down the companion-way. The dying man knows he has seen the sun and smelt the salt-sea air for the last time. He stops not on the main-deck nor on the lower-deck, but is carried to the cockpit, which is below the sea-level. Does any one realise what the cockpit of an old man-of-war was like?

Imagine a noisome hole some five feet high, without any light except that provided by oil-lamps. The ship's surgeons are standing with their sleeves rolled up, covered with blood, a can of boiling tar by their sides, surgical instruments ready to hand, and lopping off the injured limbs of the sailors and marines as fast as they are carried below. Into this awful scene, peculiarly repugnant to his sensitive, almost woman-like nature, the dying hero is borne. Already the floor is so encumbered with dead and dying and amputated limbs that with difficulty space is found for him. The surgeon comes and pronounces the wound mortal. Nelson orders him to assist others who may be saved, and, with his Chaplain, is left alone to endure three hours' struggle with death, whilst the fight continues above his head. We will not dwell on his last moments. How Hardy came and told him of the victory he had won. Hardy kisses him, and bids him farewell. At one moment he regrets dying—"I would like to have lived a little longer," he gasps—but this weakness soon passes, the old heroic spirit once more asserts itself, and the hero's last words are those which have inspired every future generation of sailors, "Thank God I've done my duty." So realistic is the scene that it is a relief to pass from the cockpit on to the upper deck to smell the fresh air, and to realise that it is all a vision of the past that has crowded your mind. Then how lonely does the old ship seem. There are no sails, but few guns, no crew, no noise, no triumphant shouts of victory, no mighty broadsides shattering the power of France for ever on the sea. All is deserted—the decks are bare, not a man is to be seen, not an enemy is in sight—there are only the ghostly visions of the past and a little slab on the upper deck with the simple inscription "On this spot Nelson fell." But the spirit of the mighty Admiral hovers over all. It follows you outside the old inner harbour; it conducts you to the great fleet lying at anchor waiting to welcome the successor of the monarch for whom Nelson loyally fought and died.

Then as you pass on from the murky decks of the Victory out into the open sea and behold the mighty panorama of ironclads, cruisers, destroyers, torpedo-boats, and submarines, you realise that all were conceived and made possible in the cockpit of the Victory, and that this is the legacy which Nelson has left to his country. For that little one-eyed, one-armed man, who makes such an irresistible appeal to all because he only measured his greatness by his human frailties, has given us a supremacy on the sea and a naval peace which has lasted uninterruptedly for over one hundred years. Never since 6.15 on the afternoon of October 5th, 1805, has the British Fleet been called upon to fight a general action. It has helped to destroy a Turkish squadron, it has bombarded Algiers and Alexandria into submission, it has blockaded the Russian Squadron in Sevastopol, but no enemy has ever yet dared to challenge its supremacy on the broad ocean.

What would Nelson have thought of that mighty squadron brought together in the waters of the Solent? How astounded he would have been by the changes which have come over the ships. But surely his heart would have swelled with pride, and he would have felt he had not died in vain if his eye had been able to rest on the six great lines of warships, from the tiny submarine with its crew of seven to the mighty Neptune with her crew of seven hundred. It was an impressive, almost awful, moment when at two o'clock on Saturday afternoon the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert left Portsmouth and entered the line of battleships. It had been arranged for the King himself to give the signal when the Royal salute was to be fired, but the over-eagerness of a single gunner spoilt this. Suddenly, before its time, a gun boomed forth, a hundred others followed suit, and in a moment a pall of smoke hung over the Solent, and until the gentle breeze had wafted this aside the fleet was hidden from view. Decency forbids us to relate the awful things the Admiral had to say to the Captain of this erring vessel, but it exemplified the motto of the British Fleet, which is, and should always be, "Ready." Over-eagerness is a quality which may well be excused, and that gunner who could not wait for his King, but gave the signal himself was of the school of Nelson. He would probably be the first man to fire a shot in action and the last to pull the lanyard as his ship sank beneath his feet. Words cannot pourtray the magnificence of the scene. The dull grey—the universal colour of the British ships—is awful in its deadliness. It seems to offer no hope to an enemy. You feel that the men behind those steel casemates must win or will die without yielding.

As you gaze on those grey vessels you feel that in them is irrevocably bound up the future of the British Empire, and that, however much politicians may fight amongst themselves and do their best to break up our Constitution and alienate the component parts of our Empire, the Fleet stands apart as a solid, unbreakable wall between our foolishness and shortsightedness, and the envy and ill-will of our enemies. After all, without that steel wall and the men behind it all our domestic differences are as naught. We could not live a day; we should have the alien dictating the Constitution under which we are to live. Long may that wall remain inviolate! And it will just as long as the spirit of Nelson and the death-scene in the cockpit of the Victory form an inseparable part of every English boy's upbringing.

Thus the day passed, and who will ever forget the scene at night, when every vessel displayed her figure in a robe of electric light? For twenty miles this phantom fleet lit up the Solent as it was never lit by moon or stars. Then, as the lights faded away at midnight and darkness settled over the scene, you felt you had seen something which could not be surpassed in grandeur, and also an even more satisfactory thought entered your mind. You felt that every foreign sailor present was thinking of our strength, and perhaps muttering to himself, "Is the game worth the candle? Can we hope to compete with a nation and with a fleet like this?"

Now all is over. The three great pageants are at an end. The grave has closed again over the historical figures who danced at the great Ball; the sons of the Empire have returned to their distant homes; the mighty Armada at Spithead has faded into the misty seas, the ships are dispersed; when next they assemble many will have been relegated to the scrap-heap, and those which are now most admired will be hardly noticed alongside the greatness of their successors. Such is the mutability of earthly things. Is there nothing left except a memory of all we have witnessed during the past week? Yes, three things remain. There is the humble cottage at Stratford-on-Avon; there is the crown of an anointed King; there is the cockpit of the Victory.

PREMIUMS WITHOUT INSURANCE

By SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

IN the Chancellor of the Exchequer's National Insurance Bill is included a class called "Post Office Contributors." The inclusion seems to have been made in a spirit of irony. It was necessary that the insurance scheme should justify its claim to be called "national," and for this reason numbers of people were brought within its scope who are not in any true sense of the word "insured" by its provisions. They are, as a fact, mulcted and misused. Mr. Lloyd George, in introducing his Bill into the House of Commons, frankly described them as "uninsurable."

In the official "Memorandum Explanatory of the Bill," issued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the class of Post Office Contributors is thus described:—"Persons liable to the compulsory deduction from wages who fail to join a society or who are rejected or expelled by a society and who cannot get another society to take them will be dealt with through the Post Office." Among those who "fail to join a society"—that is, a Friendly Society which has the status of an "approved society" under the proposed Act—will be a number of domestic servants, who would be actuarially "good lives," but it is likely that as time passes and organisation is perfected and becomes better understood an increasing proportion of these young women will be impelled by the inducements offered under the Government's scheme to join Benefit Societies or the Trade Union for domestic servants which is already in existence, if that Union forms a benefit fund. In any case a great mass of the Post Office Contributors will be the people "whom nobody wants."

How are these uninsurable people to be treated? The official memorandum quoted above explains the method which will be applied to them:—

A membership book, upon which credit will be given for contributions, will be issued . . . to persons joining the Post Office Insurance, and the contributions will be charged annually with seven-ninths for men and three-quarters for women of the calculated cost for management, medical attendance, and sanatorium. A waiting period of fifty-two payments will be required before any contribution can be withdrawn, but the member will be entitled after six months to medical attendance. If, after the waiting period has expired, a member falls ill, he (or she) will be entitled to withdraw his (or her) contributions, including the employer's share, with the addition of two-ninths (or one quarter) from the State's contribution, at the rate of 10s., 7s. 6d., or 5s., &c., a week, as the case may be. After the expiration of three years, if the funds admit, a further addition from lapsed and forfeited contributions will be made to the amounts withdrawable by members in sickness. Lapses or forfeits will occur by the member dying.

Can this be called insurance in a genuine sense? What, in fact, do the provisions effect?

There is to be a compulsory deduction from the insured person's earnings. Considering the class to which this portion of the scheme applies, it is practically certain that the "Post Office Contributors" will be unable to maintain any other insurance. They are therefore excluded from death benefits, which are precisely the advantages to which the working-class, with good reason, attach the most importance. The Government scheme will actually operate to prevent these contributors from making the only provision which is possible in their case for widows and children left fatherless. This is a monstrous blemish in the plan. The money which they might have paid to secure some safeguard for their wives and offspring at the time of greatest need will be swept into the Post Office fund, and on the contributor's death it will be confiscated by the State! I am tempted to call such a proposal one for defrauding the poorest of the poor. What company working for profit would have the effrontery to offer such terms to those from whom it sought to obtain premiums? And yet in connection with this plan Mr. Lloyd George represents the State as acting in the truly paternal spirit. He depicts himself as hurrying to succour the wounded, to drive the wolf from the door, and so forth. I have not the least doubt that he is the victim of his own optimism, that his sympathetic imagination supplies the couleur de rose with which his scheme appears suffused when he contemplates it. If he could see it in the "dry light" of unemotional criticism, he could hardly dedicate his platform panegyrics to it. The class which the Friendly Societies reject is to be compelled to insure on these unfavourable terms. In this respect they lose their freedom during life as completely as the less lucky among them will lose the premiums they can so ill afford at death. If this is a foretaste of the blessings of State management for all in all things, the most necessitous section of the community may well pray to be delivered from its Socialist friends.

The temptation to feign sickness and to mangle as often and as long as possible, to which the Post Office Contributors would be subjected under the Government's scheme, is as great as it is obvious. If a man is to receive any return for the deductions taken, whether he likes it or not, from his earnings, he must "make hay while the sun shines"—which in this connection means that he must secure his benefits by appearing on the sick-list before death ends his chances of recouping himself. Otherwise he and his employer will simply be supplying forced charity for others irrespective of the deserts of the beneficiaries. The very fact that a man preserves good health will be a serious disadvantage to him.

One has to consider the special circumstances of the class for which the Post Office fund will be raised. Mr. Lloyd George, in introducing the National Insurance Bill into the House of Commons, disclosed his ideas on this subject in the following terms:—

Most of the people who remain outside (i.e., outside the Friendly Societies) will be uninsurable lives, men who would be rejected by all sorts of Societies because really they are ill at the time, or display symptoms of illness. Or they may be drunkards. Those are the sort of reasons for which a Society now excludes men. That must necessarily make it impossible for us to pay the same benefits to the Post Office Contributors as would be paid to men who are in the Friendly Societies.

If they are "uninsurable lives," why pretend to insure them?

It appears to me that the plight of persons who are ineligible for Friendly Societies because they are ailing will be wholly deplorable under the Government's scheme. The chances of obtaining or retaining work which people in bad health have are few, and, owing to their physical inefficiency, the rate of their remuneration is usually low. A weekly deduction will perforce be made from such wages as they can get. It is a deduction which in these cases will amount to hardship. Six months must elapse before a Post Office Contributor can obtain the medical attendance which is part of his "insurance benefit." Where is he to turn in the meanwhile? Either he must pay a doctor's charges out of his earnings, or he must seek Poor-law relief. Surely it would be better for him that he should adopt one of these alternatives with such wages as he can secure intact. I fully recognise the great value of medical aid, and the still greater value of sanatorium treatment to the class to which the scheme of Post Office insurance is to supply, but my contention is that the bulk of this class never will or can receive those benefits on a genuine insurance basis. The relief they require will always be disproportionate to any contribution they can make in the form of premiums. They are, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "uninsurable." It is better to acknowledge this fact, and not to elaborate a plan which professes to do what admittedly it cannot really do. Moreover, it appears likely that the most hapless of the contributors whose case we are considering will pay premiums for some weeks or months, and fall finally within the scope of the Poor-law before they have reached the time when they can claim any benefit for the pence levied on their weekly earnings. Mr. Lloyd George, in the speech by which he introduced his Bill into Parliament, pointed out that to the workman sixpence in "time of sickness is worth more than two-and-sixpence when a man is in full wage." And to the Post Office Contributor in ill-health the premium by which his wages will be lessened is by no means a trifle to be disregarded.

The payments which these contributors are to receive in the form of sick-benefit appear to me to be illusory if they are to be regarded as "insurance." No such payment will be made until fifty-two premiums have been collected to the contributor's credit. Then the position of these people will be as follows, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's explanation in the speech already quoted:—

They have paid their own contribution and there is the contribution from the State and the contribution of the employers. You will make a deduction for medical relief and for sanatoria and you will distribute the balance on purely deposit principles. There are Societies in this country which do this thing now. It is really a kind of banking transaction. You pay an amount in and you draw to the extent you pay in—with this condition in these cases, that you will get a number of lives that will drop and still a balance who will not withdraw the whole of their deposits. I propose that that should go to swell the fund. Therefore, those inside the Post Office Society will be able to draw to that extent upon the fund, and will get that additional advantage. It is quite clear there is no inducement to join the Post Office contribution and we do not want that there should be.

Making allowance for the kind of bonus that will be derived from the "lives that will drop," and from the contributors who will leave a balance in the Post Office, and for the State's and employers' subventions, it is clear that the sick-pay available for such a class as Mr. Lloyd George described will be utterly inadequate to meet their needs. It will be exhausted long before it can prove itself really beneficial, and then will come another hiatus while a small credit is again slowly accumulated to be dissipated as rapidly—unless the life "drops" in the meanwhile.

It must be remembered that in the poverty-stricken families which will be brought within the Post Office scheme the wife often works for a wage if she can find employment, and the "mothering" is done by little girls who can hardly carry the weight of the babies to which they minister. In such cases the wife, too, will be paying an insurance premium. There will therefore be a double deduction from the week's income. Can such earnings bear the strain, slight as it may seem to some of my readers? Can the scheme which Parliament is now asked to force upon a sorely-pressed class be truly called a sound and beneficial scheme?

I pass to consider the case of another section of Post Office Contributors, those that will mainly constitute the "balance who will not withdraw the whole of their deposits." It seems probable that, during the early period of the operation of the scheme at all events, a large number of domestic servants will pay premiums to the Post Office fund. These will be for the most part healthy young women who will augment the fund for a varying number of years before marriage, seldom burdening it with a charge either for medical attendance or sick benefit. When they marry they will pass out of the scope of the scheme, and will derive no advantage whatever from the premiums they have paid, except in the small proportion of cases in which they continue to work for wages after marriage. This is wholly unfair, and I must repeat that if it can be called insurance at all it is fraudulent insurance. Domestic servants often contribute from their wages to the scanty resources of their parents, helping to support the old people or to provide for the children who are growing up, and such aid is especially valuable to widowed mothers. If a servant joins an "approved society" the maintenance of her insurance will be left wholly to her own endeavours after marriage, and she will receive no State benefit in respect of the premiums she has paid. It is grossly unfair to enforce a compulsory deduction from the wages of this class for the purpose of an insurance from which seven out of ten of those brought into the scheme will receive no benefit.

It is true that certain advantages are offered as a make-weight for the extensive forfeiture of premiums which is contemplated. If a woman who has been insured as a servant loses her husband and returns to employment, she will, as Mr. Lloyd George explains, "be entitled at once to rejoin the insurance." Moreover, "arrears accruing during marriage will be wiped out on widowhood, and if an insured woman is left an invalid at her husband's death, she at once gets the benefit of her own insurance." But these advantages are more specious than solid. Many married women will die without having either become widows or returned to employment; another large class will reach the age of seventy without having obtained any return for the premiums paid for State Insurance in their youth, and will then receive the Old-age Pension to which they would be entitled if they had paid no premium at all; there will be widows who will remarry without benefiting by the Insurance scheme, though they will have contributed to the fund which it distributes; and many widows who have been servants will strive to support their children by acting as charwomen, doing laundry-work in their homes, and the like. But the State Insurance scheme does not apply to "casual domestic employment," nor to "such persons as washerwomen, sempstresses, &c., executing small orders on their own account." Therefore a widow will not be held to have "gone into employment" for the purposes of the proposed Act if she attempts to gain her livelihood by such means. The number of women who, having been compulsorily insured before marriage, will be "left invalid" at the death of their husbands will be small, and in consequence the benefit offered to domestic servants in return for the payments exacted from them will, in general, never accrue to them.

Various suggestions have been made for the redress of this grievance. It has been proposed that servants should, on marriage, receive a dowry in proportion to the amount they have paid for State Insurance, and I have been informed by an able actuary who supports this scheme that it can be soundly financed. Another proposal, as your readers are aware, is that servants, when they marry, should be permitted to remain within the Government scheme as voluntary contributors. These are matters for careful consideration, and the whole plan of insurance for Post Office Contributors ought to be thoroughly examined and closely criticised in Committee in the House of Commons. The object of this article is to show that the scheme at present put forward by the Government is ill-considered and unjust, and ought not to be allowed to come into operation.

THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT AND THE NEW LITERATURE

INDIVIDUALISM was brought into Japan, in truth, at the same time with the Western Constitution and freedom. It is the work of superficial observers to see only the uniform of Japan's patriotism in the Russia-Japan War; it is quite right to say that it only overshadowed, with its astonishing glitter of ancient sword, the elements of Western individualism which at the time of that war had begun to make their existence clear. The new Japanese even attempted to qualify the meaning of patriotism from another standpoint. Ketoku, who was hanged recently as the leader of the now famous treason case, and many others raised the anti-war cry; we have many an unpublished story of deserters who were at once court-martialled. Some critics even deny the Japanese bravery which the Western mind associates with the war. (It would surprise the Western readers if we told our own story, to be sure.)

Was it strange that, while we cursed Russia and even called her barbarous and acted as if we were ourselves the "defenders of civilisation," we, at least the intellectual Japanese, on the other hand, burned incense right before Turgenieff, Tolstoy, and even Gorky? It was the time when we smuggled in Western individualism while singing aloud the most patriotic song ever there was. The war lessened the distance between Japan and Europe a hundred-fold. The Western civilisation which we had only understood through the eyes of Oriental idealism became suddenly real, more from its own faults, without the perception of which the interesting part of Western civilisation would never be understood. And those faults appeared beautiful, even grand, when the war made us see life naked, and its brutal exposure of reality broke down our old idealism. Politically Socialism took root; in literature the so-called naturalism, of course with Japanese modifications, grew imminent, driving out the old literature which always hid from us the real meaning of life under polite phraseology. The Japanese writers, I may say nearly all of them, went to Ibsen and Maupassant to make a student's obeisance.

Since the war, particularly in the last three years, the Japanese Government has had two objects—namely, to stamp out Socialism and "naturalism," which, both of them, insist on perfect individualism. It seems to me that she used every possible power of the police and Press law toward her end; many writers were supposed, in fact, to be as dangerous morally and socially as anarchists. The Government set the police on them. The writers seemed rather pleased, since they could turn out more stories at her expense; "Kiken Jinbutsu," or the Dangerous Man, by Hakucho Masamine, is the story of how the author was followed secretly or openly by detectives on his way home. It is almost impossible to believe how many stories, magazines, and books have been suppressed by law in the last year; we can count more than sixty cases. Is there any other country among the countries called civilised where you see such an astonishing phenomenon as that? The question is: "Will the Government be able to stamp out the bad literature" as she wishes? And another question is: What is that "bad literature"? I can say that the so-called bad literature will gain more strength as the reaction to the Government's act; it is true that when it is known that a certain story or book has been suppressed that story or book always grows more known in a mysterious way. And where is that "bad literature"? Although it may not conform to the Government's idea of patriotism and national morality, it is certainly not worse than any European literature. If Bernard Shaw were in Japan, he would have endless trouble with the Japanese Government; I see quite a number of European writers who would hardly escape from her punishment.

The Rindo Kwai, a literary club, was obliged to stop its regular meeting, as the members could not talk freely, and felt uncomfortable with the police in the next room on every occasion. There is a little literary society, mainly of young writers and artists, called the Bread Club. It had a dinner-party the other evening, when one young artist who was about starting to Europe for his art-study made a speech saying that he was going to a big, big world like the sea; while another young man who was called to be a soldier said, on the contrary, that he was going to a narrow, narrow place like a hole. As they were playful, jolly young people, one of the artists painted the edge of the menu black on the spot, meaning, as I fancy, to make it appear as a death-report of that young writer who was going to "a narrow, narrow place like a hole." Now such a harmless fun-making was reported by the police to the effect that the Socialist writers cursed the soldiers, and sent their colleague to the Army with a funeral song. As a consequence, many of them were duly examined by the authorities.

If there is a most unkind country for writers and literature, that is Japan—at least present Japan. As I do not believe in the existence of the undangerous man, I am also a sceptic about the dangerous man. I, on the same ground do not know any good literature in the most puritanic sense. And what does the Government want by the "good literature"?

It is an open secret that the Government has been trying for some time to revive, but with no success, the old Chinese classics and the ancient ethics of filial piety. Many a book has been published under her auspices to bring the old thoughts and wisdom again to life. While I admit that such an attempt may not be bad, though not wise, I cannot help insisting that the new age should have the new literature. I see no time when the Government, and the literary mind in general, are so estranged as in the present day; they are fighting with their footholds at opposite extremes. The Government who represents the new age must have a sympathy with the new literature. It seems to me almost incredible that the Japanese Government, who recognises and encourages the material Westernisation, is so despotic against the new thoughts. The time is changing, but I am not ready to prophesy what the result will be for the Government who does not realise the Time's change, and even flatly denies its existence.

VERSE—AND POETRY

Bell and Wing. By FREDERICK FANNING AYER. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

Cornwall: a Poem. By P. J. KISLINGBURY. (J. W. Arrow-smith, Ltd., Bristol.)

Ephemerides. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net.)

TWELVE hundred and sixty-one pages of rhyme, and no preface or "Author's Foreword" to tell the astonished reader why Mr. Ayer did it! Surely he should have explained, or apologised, or given the secret personal history of the years during which he penned this riot of verse? We say advisedly "years," for unless he wrote continuously, with very limited intervals for rest and refreshment, the labour could not have reached its culmination in a period of mere weeks or months. At present it is the reader who needs the intervals for rest. No normal human reviewer could read this three-inch-thick volume straight through, and we will not pretend to such an achievement; but from the many specimens of Mr. Ayer's art which we have selected here and there we gather one remarkable impression—that he is steeped in the mannerism and method of Robert Browning. Take this opening stanza of a poem entitled "Confidentially":—

I loved her—I don't mind telling you—
You know her eyes were open blue
And trustful to pleafal true
Looking into the soul of you—
Her hand like the wing of a swallow
To beckon, and oh how a man would follow!
Her heart, never a word to speak,
Writing all thought out at the cheek—
One look and you knew she never knew
Her gentle power over you—
And so I loved her!

Or take a verse from the poem beginning with the extraordinary line, "Now goes my scrub-man scrubbing":—

Or they stick like a gang of plasters
To rule you, become your masters—
Look at you now there trying to please:
One spot has brought you to your knees,
Hangs you on hinges like a gate,
Puts you swinging early to late,
Gives you your crooked crab-ankle gait!

"At the foot of your rotten-runged, rat-riddled stairs," growled Browning. "Hello, sacristan—show us a light there"—a light to illuminate Mr. Ayer's obscurity, and to show him that rhymed colloquialism is not poetry, that rumbling and creaking and bumping rhythms do not convey any particularly enviable distinction, and that the torture of words is not necessarily conducive to good literary art. In a string of rhymes apparently directed against vivisectionists we have the strangest conglomeration imaginable:—

Keep a hand at it to putter
To fish moons out of a gutter—
Nose at an atom to see
If the thing be not
Just the thing you thought,
A twist of pulp and alchemy. . . .
Rip up the diaphragm of a miller
You blood and Beauty spiller,
Have a care to fork his nose,
Play microscopy at his toes
To see how spirit balks and goes—

Spit his ribs, tap his back
To get a hand in at the knack
Of finding out what God may lack—
For me, give me his wing
Of London-smoke-red frescoing
To fly to show his opal ring.

We see the idea. "Inquire not too closely, O man, whence cometh the soul, nor expect by thy seeking to discover the breath of life; strive rather after Beauty"—so we might paraphrase Mr. Ayer's lines. But why sever beauty so decisively from those lines? Mr. Ayer is illogical.

Occasionally, in turning his pages, we come across a few lines of lyrical virtue, as in the poem "Viewfully":—

But hark, there's a voice in air,
One music-voice, like a morning wind
Which never was lowered or thinned
A child's voice, the silver sound was there,
All heart-leap and not a care!

And a pretty little jingle entitled "Love" has quite a Meredithian opening:—

Such a sprite is love,
Takes to lips at first;
Mouth is good enough,
Meant for quenching thirst.

But we must quote no more from the huge and weighty volume of Mr. Ayer's fantasies. It is absorbing, astounding, inspiring, baffling; but, above all, it is Browning.

Of Mr. Kislingbury's "Cornwall" we hardly know what to say. It consists of 1,150 lines, every one beginning with the word "Land." What has our beloved delectable Duchy done to be thus unhappily eulogised? Perhaps we had better give a few sample lines, and restrain ourselves as well as may be:—

Land where many parts are as in ages long flown,
Land where pre-historic remains are its own:
Land where their great age can ne'er be assigned,
Land date antiquaries are baffled to find. . . .
Land time past sheep pastured and roam'd round the church walls,
Land where a storm raged, and great hurricane blew;
Land where this occurred in sixteen ninety-seven,
Land whence came the sand and hid church grass from view. . . .

The concluding lines are:—

Land where they study points and records of history,
Land which they soon love and never wish go away.

If the author would "study points and records" of poetry, and leave Cornwall alone for a while, he might in time produce a poem worthy of the county. As it is, we tremble for what may happen if Mr. Kislingbury brims over into Devon.

The poems published anonymously under the title of "Ephemerides" might be characterised as a kind of musical philosophy, sometimes lyrical, sometimes cast in stanzas which remind us very much of Omar Khayyam—especially as the author makes very free with capital letters. On page 37 we find a very fair example:—

So fares he forth, unarmoured to the Fray
Which is our Destiny; Pain and Dismay
His Squires, and his Lance,—a broken Reed!
Ah! Must he fail? or vanquish? Who will say?

And on page 7, in different rhythm, we have something very akin to Omar's genial theories of life:—

So that my Love may constant be,
And Bacchus keep my Cask o'erflowing,
No further Blessing ask for me,
Since I have won all worth the knowing!

The chief faults in the work are a too frequent use of the note of admiration, which gives a jerky appearance to the pages and a jolt to the poems when read aloud, and an unnecessary insistence upon the capital letter. The following charming little song would gain, rather than lose, if written in the usual way :—

Still though the sweetest Mask may hide
The Truth—that Folly dwells inside
That little Head, Ah! Woe betide
The Wretch who seeks you for his bride!
He'd better drown!

Wiser is he who chooseth Wit
To light his House and govern it;
Nor need he, should the Graces sit Around the Altar he hath lit

Fear Fortune's Frown.

Sound philosophy and prettily expressed; and there are many more poems in the volume which would bear quotation had we space to spare, the best of them all in serious vein being a fine conception entitled "Quicunque Vult."

THE PARADOX OF COLUMBUS

Histoire Critique de la Grande Entreprise de Christophe Colomb. Etudes sur la Vie de Colomb. By HENRY VIGNAUD. Two Vols. (H. Welter, Paris. 30f.)

AT Saint Dié, under the Vosges, they are celebrating on an unusual scale the birthday, or rather the christening, of the Continent of America, thus recalling to us perhaps the most extraordinary of all the paradoxes connected with the Great Discovery. How and why Columbus discovered the New World are enormous and intricate questions, witness the present bulky volumes; but the fact that he was the real and essential discoverer does not admit of dispute, unless on a quibble. And yet it is Amerigo Vespucci who is godfather to the Continent.

Columbus is fortunate in having left his actual feat out of the reach of discussion: more fortunate than Shakespeare—or Bacon—in this respect. The fierce light of criticism has beaten for centuries around every circumstance in his career, and the hidden places in his essentially simple character have been explored. This latter operation has had a particular importance owing to a movement that was going on during a great part of the nineteenth century for the canonisation of the discoverer; but it has also a very direct bearing on the discovery itself, for Columbus is one of the most important witnesses in his own suit, and a great step would have been gained if his testimony could be proved to be trustworthy. This does not, unfortunately, appear to be the case, and we have the spectacle of a band of scientists, devotees of truth, gathered round the shrine of one whom many of them regard as a paragon of deceit. It is curious sometimes, to follow their change of face, when, after denouncing the discoverer's mendacity in making an assertion that fits ill with their theory, they suddenly take up arms for his veracity in a case where it will advance their argument.

M. Vignaud, being—a good half of him, at any rate—a Frenchman, does not wander into moral digressions when engaged in the path of scientific investigation. The chief function of history is, in his view, as in that of other modern historians, the burial of legends. It is with a philosopher's sorrow that he regards the story of Queen Isabella pawning her jewels to advance the preparations for Columbus' expedition: "the improbability of a fact is no bar to its being believed, and the spectacle of a queen sacrificing her jewels in order to forward a great enterprise provides so excellent an example that all the denials of criticism have failed to blot it out from the pages of history, where it will probably figure till the end of time. The Spanish people believe the story . . . that is enough!" With regard to Columbus' veracity M. Vignaud takes up a sound and reasonable position, believing him where it was to his interest to tell the truth, and allowing often for a strong meridional imagination, capable of deceiving itself. This method is, however, sometimes difficult of application, as it is by no means always easy to see where Columbus' interests lay.

The present volumes are only an instalment, though a large one, of an exhaustive discussion of the whole Columbian legend. An earlier volume, forming a definite part of the "Etudes Critiques," has dealt with the birth and youth of Columbus. The author has also written a whole legion of smaller books on the Toscanelli controversy, and other incidental questions. The name of Toscanelli seems to focus the whole matter. Without Toscanelli's map and information we are told that the Santa Maria would never have left her moorings at Palos, Ferdinand and Isabella would never have been convinced, and America would have been left to some one else to discover. This theory leaves Columbus little but good fortune and that dogged determination which is his residual virtue, when all the critics have done with him. Curiously enough this same theory, which is, by the way, that which Columbus' champions and the executors of his glory first launched, postulates that the great discovery was a pure accident, occurring in the course of an attempt to find, on pseudo-scientific data supplied by Toscanelli, a passage to Asia by the west. India and China were then the mark, and the expedition blundered by preterhuman luck, before it had gone too far to get back, into the West Indies.

M. Vignaud lives to refute this story, and we must confess to a very lively sympathy with his point of view. Apart from the mere thirst for truth (a drouthy sensation at best), there is a satisfaction in finding that one of the greatest achievements of mortal man was not the result of blind chance; the author of the book has felt it, and has exhaled his sincere gratification in one unchastened page—out of about fourteen hundred. M. Vignaud has a formidable band of authorities against him, but he sustains his cause with such clear and consistent logic, and such an army of documents, that he leaves us with an impression that is almost a conviction that he will be allowed to remain finally master of the field. The theory that emerges from these investigations is, to summarise it in the words of our author, that Columbus "a découvert l'Amérique parce qu'il l'avait cherchée;" further that Columbus discovered America because he knew it was there, because he had the most positive information—because, in fact, some one had been there before him. This conclusion presents difficulties of various kinds; to begin with, it is in violent contradiction to Columbus' own statements with regard to the nature of his undertaking. But these statements were mostly made after his return, apart from certain passages in the diary of the first voyage, which M. Vignaud sees reason to attribute to subsequent interpolation. The discoverer came gradually to believe, and it is here that the meridional imagination comes in, that he had not only set out with the intention of discovering the western route to Asia, but that he had actually discovered it. On his second voyage he identified the island of Cuba with a promontory of Asia, and even dictated a form of oath to his crew by which they confirmed this conclusion. A difficulty of another order that arises from this view of the case—that Columbus knew where he was going—is that it implies a partition of the glory of the discovery. There is, first, the nebulous pilot who had seen the West Indies some years before the famous voyage; of him nothing definite is known, but his existence seems sufficiently attested, and is even accepted by the devoted biographer of Columbus, Las Casas. At all events, he is a necessary hypothesis in M. Vignaud's very sane theory. And besides this pilot there is Pinzon, Columbus' lieutenant and almost colleague, who had joined forces with him in order to discover the mythical island of Cypangu. Without him the expedition would probably never have sailed, and without him it would almost certainly have returned without accomplishing anything, except, perhaps, the murder of the discoverer. Pinzon's name would probably have been associated with his colleague in the discovery of the New World if he had not died before the matter had begun to be investigated.

One fact very difficult to get over, and almost calculated of itself to dispose of the route-to-Asia theory, is that no mention is made of this route in any of the official documents in which the terms of the enterprise were formulated between the Spanish Sovereigns and Columbus. And after the return of the first expedition the position is the same; the term "the Indies" is indeed used, but in the loose sense that has remained. The route to Asia was not taken seriously till many years later, when the discovery of Toscanelli's letters put the question in a different light. The authenticity of these letters is the crux of the whole matter. For M. Vignaud they are one of the big forgeries of history; the evidence he adduces, both internal and external, is of the most varied and interesting nature. The only circumstance that might suggest the suspicion of a weak spot in his armour is his constant return to the Toscanelli theme on all occasions. He seems almost to protest too much.

The most generally interesting portion of M. Vignaud's work is that in which, after a few words of apology for his lapse into constructiveness, he sets to work to rebuild the collapsed edifice of the Columbian legend, with Toscanelli in his right place. The forgery being established, we are faced with the Ciceronian query, Cui bono? The answer we are given is that some one of Columbus' immediate circle perpetrated the deed in order to counteract the unknown pilot and his West Indian information, which might weigh on the discoverer's reputation. An enterprise undertaken on data supplied by a recognised savant would do no greater harm to his originality, and would put the whole undertaking on a higher plane. It is true that the forgers must have been a little blind to Columbus' real interests, for Toscanelli's letters, based apparently on documents left by the discoverer, indicate a plan identical with that which was actually followed. M. Vignaud shows us very clearly what were the true sources of Columbus' theory, formed, as he believes, after his return from the great expedition. Chief among them is the "Imago Mundi," a geographical compilation of Cardinal d'Ailly, where it is laid down that the unknown tract separating Western Europe from Asia was of comparatively small extent and could be traversed in a few days.

The business of legend-destroying is pursued with relentless severity throughout these volumes. A fine crop of them had been rooted up in the previous studies: here the work is continued on an even larger scale. The picturesque and the edifying are thrown on the dustheap of history. The noble beggar at the convent-door, the helpful, warm-hearted monk, the impulsive Queen, and the inspired, simple mariner beating down with his eloquence the barriers of learned prejudice in the University of Salamanca—these are some of the figures that are made to fade before our eyes. Perhaps the kindly monk may remain, but he is in danger of losing his identity and his virtues through being divided into two persons. Columbus suffers in his good name and in his reputation as a navigator. Morally and intellectually he is stripped almost bare, save for the stout covering of his heroic courage and for the invisible garment of a faith that could move mountains. And so we may leave Columbus, as his biographer leaves him at the last, in the niche "belonging to him in the Pantheon of great men to whom humanity raises statues."

WORDSWORTHSHIRE

Wordsworthshire: an Introduction to a Poet's Country. By ERIC ROBERTSON, M.A. Illustrated with Forty-seven Drawings by ARTHUR TUCKER, R.B.A.; and Maps. (Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

It was an admirable idea to choose for the title of this book the name given by Lowell to the whole region that is inevitably associated with Wordsworth's poetry. It is strange that although Wordsworth's poetry has least to do with the things and business of this earth, it is nevertheless definitely linked up with the locality of the Lake District. It is a time-honoured gibe that he was very fitly called a Lake poet, seeing that poetry was so watery. But as a point of fact the most perplexing and the least understood quality of his poetry is just this extraordinary blend of the local and simple with the translunar and eternal. For example, when he speaks of the man to whom—

A primrose by the river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him
And it was nothing more

it lends itself to burlesque, it asks for parody; but when the points are shifted a little the whole force of the lines is startling. For what is a primrose more than a primrose? Vision upon vision swims in through the thought thus awakened. It is a striking indication of his mind that it did not need the pomp of archangels, but the "simplest flower" to transport him into regions that make the thought reel merely to conceive. It is the same with the body of his work. In a sense Wordsworth is the least national of poets. In another sense he is the most national. We cannot conceive him as other than an Englishman, or elsewhere than in the Lake District with its still waters and mist-crowned hills; and yet we cannot imagine him belonging to any nation or as being confined to any locality.

The fact seems to be that it was from the region lying about Westmoreland and Cumberland that he found he could best leap into eternity. There are those who said that the reason that the Cumberland hills attracted him more than did the Alps was because they were more intimate; that the Alps were more remote. There is something of truth in this; but in the main it strangely misconceives the poet. The Alps are not merely remote, they are cold and forbidding. Moreover, though they are loftier they do not seem to lead so high as a mist-crowned green hill. Their very loftiness is cold and earthly, like logic and learning. The Cumberland hills, on the other hand, are warm and mysterious, like poetry and music. The one, by very height, drove him back to the shallowness of earth; while the other led him forward and upward, giving him glimpses of eternity. It is part of this paradox that the country of his passion unfolds. Even as it led him forward, his poetry voiced its message earthward. It might, perhaps, be said of his work that, were we all country dwellers, it would cease to appeal to us. We might, indeed, be less stirred by his mere mention of streams, dells, and hills; but that does not mean that we should be less moved to wonder and rapture by his interpretation of those mystic runes of God. We should, perhaps, prattle less of his familiarity with Nature if that familiarity were our own; but we should begin to think more of his familiarity with Eternity. And that would be a very admirable thing.

In the meantime, rightly, or, at any rate, fully, to understand Wordsworth it is necessary to envisage him in the country of his passion—in Wordsworthshire, that is to say. Now any such study must necessarily preoccupy itself with the youth of the poet. This is a thing that accords well with Wordsworth's own philosophy, as readers and lovers of the immortal "Ode to Immortality" scarcely require to be told. Heaven lies about us in our youth; yet it is not unlikely that the symbols that it is expressed in may not have a sufficient appeal. Or, to put it in other words, our environment may not speak to us as it should; we may be attuned to the soul of Wordsworth, and may yet be born in the slums of London. It was Wordsworth's richest gift that he should have been born in a region that spake trumpet-tongued to his soul.

How and where it spoke it is the business of this book to show. It is a kind of a topographical guide to the "Prelude;" though, of course, it deals with more country than lies within the scope of that poem. The whole of the earlier poems, and a goodly portion of the later poems, are laid under contribution to furnish the links that Mr. Robertson has given between the inspiration and the seat of the inspiration. We can give no higher tribute to the book than to say that, read with M. Emile Legouis' illuminating and exhaustive study, "La Jeunesse de William Wordsworth," the whole indebtedness of the poet to the country is laid bare. The marvel and the wonder of it all remain. We are not enabled to see

The light that never was on sea or land,
The consecration and the poet's dream.

But it is something to us that we may see exactly from whence that light shone into the poet's soul. The two books make an inevitable companionship, and more than well repay reading together. Chapter v., for instance, in Legouis' book deals with Wordsworth's early poems, and those who have read his pages will not easily forget the extraordinary analysis he gives of Wordsworth's literary indebtedness. There is no one similar chapter in Mr. Robertson's book that traces his topographical indebtednesses, because it is all occupied with that end. Taken between them, they are a wonderful unfolding of the process by which the poet caught his song. Each book traces the course of the inspiration: one following it through the course of his life on the side of active influence, the other following it on the side of passive, and often sub-conscious, influence.

There is one feature in this book that will strike all readers. It is too much to say of Dorothy Wordsworth, as Mr. Robertson says: "Dorothy was a poet. In a measure, William, her brother, is her poetry." It would be as accurate to say that when at Nether Stowey Wordsworth was but the mouthpiece of Coleridge. In one case as in the other it is always possible to detect the difference between what Wordsworth derived and what he expressed. Nevertheless, none who has read Dorothy Wordsworth's "Journals" and compared them carefully with her brother's poetry could have failed to have felt over and over again that he was listening to one voice behind the two. In fact, that is the more accurate statement of the matter; the voice behind them was one; but it uttered itself quite separately through them. In her it was sometimes pedantic, always gentle, not always without self-consciousness. In him it was direct, masculine, turbulent, and sonorous.

Still, there was that unity between them; and Mr. Robertson judged wisely in linking their story as one. Unfortunately, his style is not a very attractive one, and it is confused by awkward pedantries. Despite this his tale will not be denied; and we are enabled to follow Wordsworth from Cockermouth, through Penrith and Hawksmouth to Cambridge, and so back again to the hills and dales that had bred and inspired him. Alfoxden and Nether Stowey, not belonging to Wordsworthshire in the strict sense of the word, are not dealt with. Naturally we look to Mr. Robertson to upset some of the accepted scenes of some of the poems; and we are not disappointed. The definite locality of a poem's reference matters less with Wordsworth than with any other poet. It was his customary method not to work with his scene before him (and what true poet can?): thus his scenes, even when their references are most precise, being passed through the movements of his imagination, become transmuted out of all recognition. He has himself declared with what aversion he regarded the pictorial process, such as, for instance, Scott employed. Still, for those whom this kind of study interests, Mr. Robertson, with the help of Mr. Gordon Wordsworth, the poet's grandson, will be found to have upset several of Mr. Knight's identifications in favour of his own. Of far more moment are his remarks on Penrith Beacon. Wordsworth's aversion to all themes of strife and bloodshed will be familiar to any attentive reader. But when Mr. Robertson shows us, as he does well and ably, that not only did Wordsworth avoid all reference to the history of that Beacon, but inevitably linked it up with lessons of unhappy strife and unnatural oppression, the interest is quickened. For the outstanding event concerning that Beacon was one of murder, robbery, and hanging. The difference between Wordsworth's temper of mind and Scott's can be realised when one thinks what the great novelist would have made of the history of the scene.

The illustrations by Mr. Tucker are beyond all praise. When occupied with mere buildings they are sometimes not quite happy; but in the portrayal of hill, vale, and distance he catches atmospheric effects as one would not imagine they could have been caught by the touch of pencil on paper. They are in themselves worth the price of the book.

SOME LANDS OF CHAOS

Central America and its Problems. By FREDERICK PALMER.
(T. Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)

To those unacquainted with Central American ethics the perusal of Mr. Palmer's book will undoubtedly cause a certain mental shock. The author, an American with an observant eye and a delightfully frank pen, undertook a journey through the nest of small Republics that link the Northern Continent to the Southern. The result is a collection of quite remarkable material that deserves notice at no inconsiderable length. Indeed, it is worth while to follow him as closely as we are able in his eventful journey, and to glean all we can from the comments that are eloquent of a grim sense of humour and a pleasantly open mind.

Ere he enters into the area of the minor Republics Mr. Palmer has a good deal to say concerning Mexico. His remarks here are as shrewd and caustic as they continue throughout the book. Thus, while he gives General Diaz the full credit that is his due for the introduction of foreign industrial enterprise, the motives and deeds of the aged Dictator are submitted to a cool and merciless analysis at his hands. Here are some of his comments on the man of the hour:—

He made peace ruthlessly; he welcomed capital generously. To clear the country of brigands he set a brigand to catch a brigand. . . . Such is his power that a score of malcontents may be executed in a lot without anybody except the neighbours being the wiser.

One of the narratives concerning Diaz is to the effect that:—

On one occasion when he was asked by wire what disposition to make of a certain revolutionist who had been captured, his prompt, unexpurgated answer, I am told, was: "Kill him while we have him in hand." And perhaps an hour later he was at a reception to receive a bouquet from a party of schoolchildren. Yes, he is a self-made ruler of a mediæval and Oriental type in the days of railroads, telegraphs, and electric cars, who rides in a French automobile and organises irrigation projects and bids the foreigner turn the waterfalls into light for his palace.

There is probably no truer word-portrait in existence of the Mexican autocrat than that summed up in these few sentences. Here we have the tragedy of good intentions—achieved at an infernal and savage cost!

In Guatemala, the next country to be visited, Mr. Palmer was received with all courtesy and honour by the President himself. He was officially shown the sights of the capital, and under the same auspices was given a certain insight into the civil and military administration of the Republic. It was only during the course of his subsequent travels, when he was enabled to question the more disinterested populace, that he elicited the details of the true character and career of his late genial host. Such was the reign of terror that the people only dared speak of it with bated breath. A mere suspicion of discontent sufficed for the perpetration of what appeared to the locality as everyday and commonplace atrocities, such as executions, torture, and deaths from flogging. The mildest criticism involved gaol:—

It is the business of all editors to print frequent long disquisitions on the glorious career of his Excellency, the most Illustrious. All foreign news dispatches are blue-pencilled by Cabrera in person before they are published. The public may read nothing whatsoever not to his taste.

Yet this impoverished, terrorised, and decadent country is in itself not only lovely, but filled to the brim with natural resources: "It is a country of the gods, fit home for the aboriginal civilisation of a continent."

Leaving Guatemala with remarkably little regret, in spite of its glorious scenery, we are taken over the border into Salvador, the tiniest Republic in the Western Hemisphere. The politics of Salvador are very similar to those of its neighbours. The actions of Ex-President Regallado, for instance, may be taken as representative specimens of the enterprise of local statesmen:—

Early one morning in the Spring of 1906 he planted the artillery in the Plaza and blew off the front of the Salvadorian White House. His action was primarily due to his personal dislike of Escalon, who was President at the time. Having paid this grudge, he set out to pay another. That Cabrera, of Guatemala, was a mean, half-caste Indian, who deserved to have his face slapped. So Regallado led the troops across the Guatemalan frontier without any declaration of war. He had not yet sobered up when he was killed in battle.

This incident is only one out of a number of the kind that are cited, and yet Salvador possesses the most stable Government of any in Central America, with the notable exception of Costa Rica.

Honduras succeeds Salvador in the course of the itinerary, and Honduras proves the most backward and impoverished of all the Central American States. "Why should our people accumulate more than one shirt apiece," demands an old Honduran, "when a revolution may come along at any hour and rob them of everything not on their backs?" The misfortunes of Honduras, however, are due rather more to the machinations of its neighbours than to its own harassed internal economy. There is a bright spot here, moreover, due to the energy of an imparted Chilian colonel, who is transforming a number of the young men "from languid, slouching Hondurans to athletic, well-set-up youths."

So far as actual tyranny is concerned, the Republic of Nicaragua is probably the worst sufferer of any of this group of countries, and the licence permitted to the utterly immoral leaders is mediæval in every respect. Much that the author saw with his own eyes is of a purely revolting nature, and it may be imagined that the tales that were told on all hands were of no brighter a tendency. When we arrive within the frontiers of Costa Rica, however, all is changed. Happy little Costa Rica, as Mr. Palmer terms that fortunate Republic, represents the single oasis amidst the desert of Central America. Here, at last, is breathed the atmosphere of freedom, prosperity, and progress. Perhaps the surest testimonial to the actual condition of the nation is afforded by the remarks of a Columbian who intended to disparage the country. "That President of Costa Rica," said the Columbian, "is of no account. He has not the courage to put a banker in gaol or shoot a rival. You will see, he cannot even re-elect himself. Fifty other men are just as smart as he. Any of them might be President. Costa Rica has never had a great man."

It is, of course, due to nothing beyond the presence of these "great men" that the remaining Republics are stretched prone in utter poverty, squalor, and misery. How sordid the life, how filthy the conditions, and to what a depth the mental degradation has sunk will be evident from a perusal of the author's pages. There is no doubt whatever that Mr. Palmer has every right to command an attentive hearing. His statements—although they cannot well fail to startle the greater proportion of his readers—are quite innocent in themselves of any taint of exaggeration or of recklessness. He is remarkably free from prejudice, moreover, and sounds an emphatic note of warning against the confounding of the circumstances in the countries he has described with those of the enlightened and progressive South American nations, such as Argentina, Brazil, and Chili.

Mr. Palmer, as a matter of fact, has approached his subject with an open mind, and is sufficiently frank in condemning what he terms the selfishness of his own compatriots, whose policy it is, while refraining from intervention themselves, to prevent other nations from bringing a needful pressure to bear. Rather than this passive attitude, he pleads for an assumption of responsibility, and for a volunteering of grooms to clean these Augean stables of the tropics. On this point one who has read his book will find some difficulty in disagreeing with him.

ECONOMIC CHANGES IN INDIA

The Economic Transition in India. By SIR THEODORE MORISON, K.C.I.E. (John Murray. 5s. net.)

We have here a reprint of the substance of lectures delivered by Sir Theodore Morison at the London School of Economics and Political Science in 1910. It is vivid and illuminating, and may be perused with pleasure and profit. Those who attended the lectures must have gained clearer ideas and a better grasp of the subject, which is one of some importance. If the book contains little original matter, it abounds in extracts from sound authorities, which have been judiciously selected. The author traces the original resemblance between all countries which depend upon the old physical conditions. In England the industrial revolution took place in the eighteenth century, and India is now arriving at that stage. The main factors in the transition consist in the substitution of machinery for manual labour and the application of steam power. In England agriculture is now only one of several industries; manufacturers have drawn the workers to the towns. In India 70 per cent. of the population still depend upon agriculture; but the development of factories is attracting labourers to the towns, and, as India abounds in raw material, this economic change has enormous possibilities in prospect.

India has always had its special features; the villages have, on account of their isolation, been self-supporting and self-contained; transport and means of communication have been deficient, as elsewhere. As canals, roads, and railways facilitated exchanges and trade in Europe, so they are having similar effects in India. Lord Dalhousie gave them an impetus. Another feature was the insecurity of the country until the Pax Britannica was established. Another impediment was the imperfect division of labour; but specialisation is now becoming possible. Again, the typical village in India had its normal characteristics, the distinction between the landowners and the tenants, the open or common field, the rare use of money, the assignments of land for service, the rivalry between custom and competition. The tendency has been, as population increased, for rents to become competitive; the competition of landlords to obtain tenants has changed to the competition between tenants for land; produce rents have been converted to money rents; property in land has come to be valuable, and the village money-lender found ready victims in the improvident and indebted cultivators. It is satisfactory to read that, to meet the rapaciousness of the usurer, the Government lately passed a measure for the constitution and control of co-operative credit societies on Raiffeisen principles. These have fortunately caught on among the peasantry, and the principle of co-operation is calculated to extend to other purposes.

The literature of Indian famines is extensive; the liability to famines has been ever present. But few people realise that so late as Queen Elizabeth's time England, and France up to the close of the eighteenth century, were in danger from similar causes. The command of the sea has secured England, but the circumstances of India have admitted of famine recurring whenever the crops failed, until recent times. The assertion that, owing to British rule, famines at the present day are more severe than formerly is not warranted by the historical evidence. The development of communications has changed the whole problem of famine relief. Deaths from starvation should now be extremely rare; famine now means a prolonged period of unemployment, accompanied by dear food; relief works are opened to give employment to the sufferers.

With the introduction of machinery the weavers engaged in their domestic industry, still nearly six million persons, have naturally suffered; the want of capital is their difficulty, as it was in England; the erection of small factories, making use of hand-power instead of steam, is advocated as the remedy, but with the competition of Bombay and Manchester in the production of machine-made clothes the prospects of hand-weaving are not bright. The economic revolution in England has brought with it the interdependence of all parts of the industrial world, the concentration and subdivision of labour in factories and centres, the utilisation of accumulated capital, expert supervision. Until the revolution has developed further in India it will remain a poor country in comparison with England.

The increase in the number and output of the jute and cotton mills in India is a most promising sign of the industrial revolution.

The worthlessness of the charge against the British Government of "draining" India—a charge often exposed, but nevertheless repeated—is again refuted by Sir Theodore Morison, perhaps with more elaboration than was required, as the real point is fairly simple. The "Home Charges" which the Secretary of State has to meet amount to about eighteen millions a year. The allegation is that India is bled to this extent without any return; the answer is that India has received, and does receive, full value for this sum. It is a pity that Sir Theodore ever uses the misleading word "drain," for which he rightly substitutes "foreign payments," such as other countries have to make for the interest due on their borrowings. The greater portion of the payment represents the interest on the capital lent by England for the construction of railways and canals, which more than pay the interest; the remainder is spent on meeting certain necessary expenditure, such as pensions, allowances, stores, Army charges, which are actually incurred in England, as part of the administration of India, and must be paid for somehow. England's credit enables India to borrow 2 per cent. cheaper than she could otherwise. Roughly speaking, the Home Charges are for the most part paid by the excess value of the exports from India over the value of the imports into India; the payment is the method of adjusting the balance. Sir Theodore's little work puts into the hands of students the means of understanding the question of these foreign payments, on which the Indian National Congress is never weary of harping.

A SCIENTIST AT PLAY

Triumphs and Wonders of Modern Chemistry. By GEOFFREY MARTIN, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Sampson Low, Marston and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE popularisation of science, especially of the wonders of the "new knowledge," is a task of no mean difficulty. The unfolding of the recondite problems of the nature and constitution of the universe requires the delicacy of the master hand; the well-stocked mind must not be allowed to exhibit the narrowness of detail, but must illuminate the dark places of the great unknown, as the sun from the first flush of the dawn opens out to us an ever widening vista which becomes clearer at every moment. Nevertheless with the ascent of our luminary to its noontide height comes a blurring of the vision that perplexes even the most seasoned veteran. Dr. Martin's volume reminds us of a certain undergraduate who, in early life, listened to the elementary lectures of a very learned professor, and then, years later, having returned to his alma mater as a tutor in that science, again sat at his senior's feet in the fervent hope that he might appreciate those elementary lectures! To advanced students Dr. Martin's book will prove of interest, but the beginner and the general reader will miss that breadth of view and gentle touch which we associate with the classic writings of Mr. Whetham. Dr. Martin has accumulated a wonderful mass of facts, but he lacks the genius and literary ability which instructs without giving birth to the boredom of the regulation text-book. It may be true that twenty millions of electrons can be packed side by side in the millionth of an inch; nevertheless, while conveying absolutely no meaning to the general reader, this would probably give him a very erroneous idea of the constitution of matter. Electrons are not entities which can be isolated, yet this would be an extremely excusable inference.

This type of book, while readily lending itself to the exposition of the great inductive sciences, can scarcely be successfully applied to a science of fact, such as chemistry. Though chemistry treats of those conglomerations of electrons which we usually designate matter, still, to include in its ramifications the constitution of that matter requires a great stretch of the imagination. Dr. Martin, upon the unhallowed text of the chemistry of air, water, and the more common elements, builds up a volume of the most pretentious character. He quotes a panegyric on Snowdon, recounts at great length stories of subterranean rivers and stalactite-crusts caves, refers to Kaufmann's great researches on the variation of the mass of a body with its velocity, tells us that the pressure at the centre of the earth has been estimated to be three millions of atmospheres, and so on. We are treated to literary quotations extending from Lucretius to John Davidson, Rudyard Kipling, and Sir Lewis Morris. We look in vain for a few lines from Mr. Hall Caine or for the estimate of the number of peas in a pint. There is an interesting list of the authenticated tragedies connected with the owners of the Hope diamond—so interesting that Dr. Martin should have called in Mr. William le Queux to touch up some of the unauthenticated stories. Occasionally Dr. Martin refers to his own science, but immediately rushes away to tell us that "there exist within each cubic centimetre of oxygen gas, that is to say, within the volume of a large-sized pinhead, no less than 42,090,000,000,000,000 molecules" (we hope he has not made an error of a dozen or so); or to explain the method of and reason for administering oxygen (illustrated). The book is a perfect encyclopedia.

This notice would not be complete without reference to the illustrations. The artist who was responsible for many of them was a most thorough realist—there is no Post-Impressionist work here. Even Dr. Martin must have blushed when he first saw some of these pen-and-ink wonders, the neat diagrammatic sketches everywhere giving place to the weirdest attempts at perspective drawing. The prize is awarded to the illustration on page 238 of the Dog Grotto, near Naples. On each side of a cicerone, who stands declaiming with outstretched hands in the best Hyde Park style, is the asphyxiated body, presumably, of a dog: at the entrance to the cave is a maiden dressed in the white of purity and carrying a common white sunshade. We look in vain for her tears.

A. E. H.

FICTION

John Merridew. A Romance. By FREDERICK ARTHUR. (Longman and Co. 6s.)

THE first business of the reviewer of this book is to make clear that it is not a novel. The object of a novel is the telling of a story which, because of what it is or the way it is told, or both, amuses or entertains. But this is a romance, whatever that may be. There is also a preface, in which we are informed that the author has an object in writing the book, an object not usually in the mind of the writer of fiction. And the object is to urge, inter alia, that—

The need for England at this moment is that her sons should learn to think more deeply, to take life more seriously, to live less on the surface of things, and, while jealously maintaining that manliness which has made her what she is, should make their sports the relaxations and not the objects of their lives. . . . For life is not the search for wealth, or health, or even happiness, because it is in service, and in service alone, that man can find his true destiny. If the reader, in tracing this history, is led to take a wider view of Christianity . . . the author's labours will not have been wholly in vain.

So much for the preface. We should have liked to quote it in extenso as leading to a fascinating physiological study. The book which Mr. Arthur has produced is truly a romance. He does not refer to himself as the author of any previous works of any kind, and we do not remember to have come across anything of his before. Time was when serious-minded men, burning to proclaim some bladderish shibboleth and fearing lest their pamphlet should be lost, relieved their souls of their appeals through the form of the novel with a purpose. The book under review, however, contains no fire, no epigram, no wit, no freshness, no wisdom; it is packed with the despondent groans for our country and our people.

We are sure we should greatly offend the author if we said we had been entertained by the book. But we shall not say so, for we were not. It is not meant to be entertaining; it is merely meant to scold us into certain views. He makes his characters talk of education, and how it should be provided; of religion, and how it should be regarded; of the duties of landowners, and how they should be performed; of the need for compulsory military service, and how it will save our poor old country, and so on. Like one of the incidents in the book, it is intended to have the effect upon the nation that the contents of the great French doctor's phial had when injected into the arm of Lady Merridew, whom the English doctors had made us believe was already dead. "Then a slight flush came into Isobel's face, and her breast heaved almost imperceptibly. 'Mon Dieu, ça a réussi.'" But if Old England is in the state the author thinks we fear there will be no revival from this effort at all events.

Although the story is dedicated to the noble purpose of saving us here in England, the scene is nearly all laid in Italy, and especially Southern Italy. Many passages reveal the great knowledge the author has of those parts and his deep sympathy with the people. Mr. Arthur clearly has a good deal of knowledge of certain things of which he speaks. But he has no gumption, and, greatest tragedy of all, no sense of humour.

The Case of Letitia. By ALEXANDRA WATSON. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

As may be gathered from the title, this book is a character-study of a woman. In a well-written book of this nature the characterisation is so vivid and true that it is only necessary to hear the name of the principal character for a picture of him or her to spring into one's mind instantly, without being able to prevent it. Miss Alexandra Watson has not succeeded in achieving this. Even at the moment of finishing the book Letitia is only a shadowy, little-known creature. It is impossible to see her distinctly, to feel her personality. Undoubtedly the book is mistitled. It should have been called "The Case of Rob." Here, if you like, is a character whose personality is striking, forceful, visible. The picture of Teddy is not well drawn. Has there ever existed, or will there ever exist, a man of the world, a gentleman—although a decided scoundrel—who would make use of the two following expressions? Meeting Letitia after many years' absence, he says: "Have you forgotten your old playmate, Miss Letty?" Again, when referring to a theatre he says to her: "You will enjoy it ever so!" Letitia, Rob, and Teddy are the three leading characters. Like a great many modern women-writers, Miss Watson makes her heroine marry both the men, Teddy being the one to die. It is a tendency, this frequent marrying, which has only lately sprung into being, and which is, everything considered, not at all necessary. "The Case of Letitia" may be described as undistinguished—it is only mildly interesting, not very well written, while the heroine is unstriking. Here and there are moments of drama, but they are merely moments, and the only thing in the book is Rob, who would have stood being developed to a far greater extent.

The King Over the Water; or, The Marriage of Mr. Melancholy. By JUSTIN HUNTLEY MCCARTHY. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

SOME months ago, at the Queen's Theatre, Mr. A. E. W. Mason's play entitled "Princess Clementina" was produced. It dealt with the escorting of the Princess for her marriage with King James the Pretender, at the moment exiled from the country, to his Court abroad. Unable to go himself, the King sends his servant, Charles Wogan, who falls in love with his sire's bride-elect. His love is returned, and their adventures by flood and field provided the action of the play. Mr. Justin Huntley McCarthy has chosen the same theme for his new novel. Princess Clementina's adventures in the company of the gallant Wogan make spirited reading of the Dumas type. Swords play and horses are ridden to death, and men die fighting for their Princess. For those who like that kind of thing the author has provided two hours' excitement in the atmosphere of frills, hostilities, lace, and cavalcades. Undoubtedly the best chapters of the book are those in which are related the parting between the Princess and her lover. They are written sincerely and excellently; but have we not had too much of Mr. Charles Wogan? First we had him some years ago in Mr. Mason's book; then he was resuscitated in the play, and here he is again yet a third time—and we hope it will be the last, for the incident was never epoch-making, even when fresh.

THE THEATRE

THE CORONATION GALA PERFORMANCE AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE

THE Coronation Gala Performance at His Majesty's Theatre may be aptly described by the title of the last feature of the programme, "A Vision of Delight." Everything that taste, theatrical aptitude, and skill could do to make the production the most memorable in the annals of the Drama was accomplished. In delightful surroundings, abounding in artistic ornamentation, all the leading actors and actresses of the day gave of their best. To mention a few, Mrs. Kendal and Miss Ellen Terry, not to omit Mrs. Calvert, gave a delightful representation of the Letter Scene in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Sir Charles Wyndham repeated his well-known performance of "David Garriok." Sir Herbert Tree, in the Forum Scene of "Julius Cæsar," delivered a marvellous oratorical tour de force. Never have we seen the subtlety of Marc Antony and the subtlety of his oratory presented so superbly. The groupings of the senators, citizens, and soldiers—parts all in the hands of well-known actors—were arranged in a masterly manner, and the workings of the orator's skilful eloquence was appropriately punctuated first by execrations gradually turned to enthusiastic acclamations as the speaker wrought upon his hearers. It is a thousand pities that in these days such persuasive eloquence and dignified rhetoric are confined to the boards of a theatre. "The Critic" was, as usual, received with the greatest enthusiasm and amusement. Acted by a wonderful caste, not a line of the author's humour was thrown away. Where all were excellent, it is not perhaps invidious cordially to congratulate Mr. Cyril Maude on his performance of Don Ferolo Whiskerandos. Lady Tree as Tilburina deserved unstinted praise for her exhibition of madness. No Ophelia was ever half so mad as was Tilburina as presented by Lady Tree. The scene of the Procession of Rivers was graceful in the extreme.

Thereafter Mrs. Patrick Campbell recited a prologue written by Mr. Herbert Trench. Prologues are usually tedious, and there is every desire to take them as read, but Mrs. Campbell was so charming and arch in her delivery that for once a prologue was welcome. The concluding feature of a notably memorable performance was the presentation of Ben Jonson's masque entitled "The Vision of Delight." The title—alluring as it is—hardly conveys the grace and beauty of the scenes presented to a delighted audience—scenes which will linger for long in the memory of those who were privileged to witness them.

THE COURT THEATRE

THE IRISH PLAYERS

THIS is an important visit of the Irish Players, more important in several ways than any of their previous visits. As we pointed out in our first article, when we had but seen the first night of their projected repertory, there are several external indications that seem to suggest a change of conception in the dramatic idea that the Abbey Theatre exists to express. It is not the moment to enter into the details of this, although they demand careful examination—firstly from the hopes that the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, had raised in us, and secondly from our desires for the future of drama itself. The fact may be referred to in passing because of the interest it sheds on the combined programmes of this week.

Firstly, on Monday, the 19th inst., there were put before us two plays that had never been produced in London: a one-act tragedy entitled "The Clancy Name," by Mr. Lennox Robinson, and a three-act comedy, "The Mineral Workers," by Mr. William Boyle. Only the previous week we had seen Mr. Robinson's "Harvest" with acute disappointment, seeing portrayed in it just that lack of obsession with itself that goes to the creation of great drama. Over and over again we discovered in it the stage-worn tricks that Mr. Robinson sought to pass off before our eyes as the authentic thing. In "The Clancy Name," however, there was a refreshing difference. It was not a flawless play by any means: such things belong not to the wayward ways of temporal circumstance; but the matter of importance was that its flaws and errors were proper to itself, and not the gifts of imitation. The story is that Mrs. Clancy, the widow of John Clancy, is a Clancy by marriage and a Clancy by proper origin, and is full of all the Clancy pride that never in its long history has that name earned the soilure of disgrace. On the death of her husband she had to borrow somewhat heavily from two neighbours of hers, Mrs. Spillane and Eugene Roche, in order to continue the farm; and as the action opens she is seen paying back this money, with its requisite overplus of interest, in the proud consciousness that she of her own labour hath done this, and that the Clancy brow may again raise itself in challenge to the world.

In strict accuracy it may be said that the action opens somewhat earlier than this, when Mrs. Spillane, rendered by Miss Maire O'Neill, and Eugene Roche, rendered by J. A. O'Rourke, enter on a visit to Mrs. Clancy, and, finding her out, stay ostensibly to await her, but truly to put us abreast of the action. This is cleverly done, and done with the conviction of simplicity. Mrs. Clancy's son John is there too, in the person of Fred O'Donovan; and when the two visitors start to speak of a murder that the neighbourhood has lately been startled by, his restlessness is swiftly conveyed to the audience. When Mrs. Clancy, her debts all paid, and the Clancy name all clear and fair, also takes up the gossip of the murder, John leaves them so strangely that we half expect his subsequent confession to his mother that he himself is the murderer. It was in wild passion he did it; and such is his remorse that he is driven to the need of public confession.

Mrs. Clancy's state may be imagined; but no imagination can convey the full force of the stubborn distress that Miss Sara Allgood conveyed in her strong interpretation of the scene. John goes out under promise of silence—a promise she has extracted in the teeth of his desires and her principles. To her the Clancy name is above all. Then, when Mrs. Spillane has entered to arrange a wedding between her niece and John, the sound of hoofs and a tumult of shouting is heard, and Mrs. Spillane, going to the door, describes to Mrs. Clancy how a man has sought to rescue a child, with evidently no desire of escape for himself. It is, of course, John. He is brought in dying. Here Miss Sara Allgood rises to an extraordinary power of acting. Her endeavours to frustrate John's efforts at confession, and her deliberate misinterpretation of the clues he gives, never once strike a wrong note. And she is successful, for John dies, and the Clancy name is not only safe, but girt with the new lustre of bravery. There are many faults in the play. For example, never does John seem capable of any deed so vigorous as murder. Again, there is obvious artifice when Mrs. Spillane stands at the door and describes the accident to Mrs. Clancy. It is unavoidable, perhaps, but then it should be passed swiftly through, and touched on lightly, instead of being delayed as it is. But there is real power in this piece.

"The Mineral Workers" was of a wholly different species. From first to last it is unmitigated laughter. Indeed it was so full of laughter that it becomes no small business to disentangle the play itself from the laughter it awoke. Yet it needs to be done, for the play as it stands would profitably bear rewriting. There are many strands in it flying loose that perplex the mind and disturb attention and enjoyment. These should be gathered in or cut away; and so the play would gain infinitely. As the play opens the Mulroy family is discovered—old Ned Mulroy, his wife Mary, and his children Patrick and Kitty, with the wiseacre of the neighbourhood, Uncle Bartle, discussing a momentous piece of news. Ned Mulroy's cousin, Stephen J. Reilly, is about to arrive from the States, a wealthy man, and his desire is to open up Mulroy's farm in the faith of its mineral possibilities. As they cogitate the news, the chief character of the play, Daniel Fogarty, is introduced to us. Confident know-all that he is, he is convinced that if Mulroy should give in to his cousin's persuasion, there can be nothing for him but "red ruin."

Thus the play is set a-swing. The centre of interest is how Stephen J. Reilly has to encounter the various oppositions of Mulroy, Fogarty, and Uncle Bartle in his projects: Mulroy, to whom the piercing of the shafts is like rending an ungainly wound in his beloved earth (a beautiful and true touch this!), Uncle Bartle with his cautious questioning, and Daniel Fogarty. Daniel Fogarty is supreme. His derision at unhappy Mulroy when difficulties are encountered, his contempt of Reilly, and his cocksure entrenchment in the ways of his fathers, are all in the highway of humour. It comes to him at last to stand between the venture and success, and his triumph thereat is unmeasured. But Stephen J. Reilly is one too many for him; and the robust Fogarty crestfallen is very finely conceived, both by the author and by Arthur Sinclair, whose acting throughout was the making of the play. He recovers, however, and, being forced to join the enterprise, bids his one-time colleagues know they may find him "in his office." In all this there is genuine laughter. It must be set to the account of the play and Mr. Arthur Sinclair that Daniel Fogarty never fails to set the house aflow on the waves of laughter. But we ask a play as well as laughter. The interest of the play went in and out with Fogarty; Mrs. Mulroy is seen in the first Act and no more; Kitty, beautifully played by Eithne Magee, maintains a love interest with Reilly, in opposition to Mrs. Walton, the squire's sister, which is not concluded, however it be suggested. The squire himself, played by Eric Gorman, and his sister, played by Kathleen O'Brien, were disappointing, Miss O'Brien in particular being most affected and unhappy. Yes, the play demands rewriting; and it is worth it.

Different again was Lady Gregory's "The Image," produced, we believe, last year for the first time in London. It was obviously by one of the "Old School," its even craftsmanship and its unperturbed balance telling that surely and inevitably. Yet therewithal it was over monotonous. It was very charming and delightful to watch the self-appointed committee—Thomas Coppinger, Brian Hosty, and Darby Costello—decide on the erection of an Image to a certain Hugh O'Lara, a name that had been pronounced to them with great unction by the mad mountainy man, Malachi Naughton, because he had chanced on a bit of board bearing that name that had been cast up by the sea. Who Hugh O'Lara was and what he was none knew, and we felt the edge of an ulterior purpose more than once in the course of the play. As with "The Full Moon," there was more than a hint of Maeterlinck; and, like Maeterlinck, the author lacked throughout the tense grip of interest that drama requires. The play slept awhile; and if Lady Gregory says that in this the play was like the village of her choice, we can but respond that therein the play was much unlike the drama of our choice. But there is whimsical grace and humour in it that holds off censorious opposition and fault-finding. Indeed, Lady Gregory was herself her worst critic. The inimitable "Rising of the Moon" that succeeded to it came with rousing and contrasted cheer.

It is fit to close with mention of the holiest moment that has ever fallen on us in a theatre. On Friday was given Synge's "Riders to the Sea," a play that is not so much a tragedy as a tragic interlude, and the purest of all that author's works. It was played quietly and gravely, and from first to last the "keening" note was never lost. Miss Eileen O'Doherty and Miss Maire O'Neill made no mistake in pitching the true tone for the play; but the crown of praise remained with Miss Sara Allgood. That really supreme actress excelled herself, and when the last words fell from her lips—"Michael has a clean burial in the far north, by the grace of Almighty God. Bartley will have a fine coffin out of the fine white boards, and a deep grave surely. What more can we want than that? No man at all can be living for ever, and we must be satisfied"—a grave hush held the whole company awhile. Surely no actor can require more perfect thanks than that!

"GHOSTS" AT THE REHEARSAL THEATRE

It was perhaps unfortunate that the inaugural performance of the Adelphi Play Society on Sunday last at the Rehearsal Theatre followed so quickly upon the enacting of "Ghosts" by the Ibsen Club at their Studio. At subsequent performances the new society will produce plays by Edmond Rostand and Laurence Housman, and, although the production of Ibsen's play was an adequate one, the substitution of one of these would have probably accentuated the interest in the opening performance. Miss Alice Chaplin gave a very excellent and studied interpretation of the part of Mrs. Alving, while Oswald Alving, the innocent sufferer for ancestral sins, was well portrayed by Mr. Maurice Elvey. The Pastor Manders of Mr. Leslie Gordon, though exhibiting the pliable character and dogmatic assurance of that clerical gentleman, was slightly overacted, Manders being represented as an insincere rather than as an ignorant ecclesiastic. Mr. James L. Bale was very successful as Jacob Engstrand, and Regina was well played by Miss Cicely Fairfield. "The Fantasticks," by Edmond Rostand, will be performed on July 9th.

THE MISSION OF GOVERNMENT

It is a singular fact—and one over which we may well pause—that in the records within our ken, ancient or modern, actual or imaginative, not a single plan on true scientific lines—complete, consistent, practicable, and definite—is to be found for the good government and guidance of a people. In each and all are to be marked some touch of confusion. In the making of monarchies, oligarchies, republics, real or visionary, existent or crumbled, rulers and statesmen, poets and philosophers, past and present, would seem, in default of the true reason, to have vied with each other in building up and visualising colossal structures of incongruities and contradictions. In every system, if fairly analysed, such anomalies stand glaringly conspicuous. In the monarchy, associated closely with despotism, often is to be found the larger freedom; in the republic the fiercer despotism; and all, whether monarchies, oligarchies, republics, commonwealths, or even communes, are tainted with bureaucratic tyranny—the synonym for Socialism.

The failure of democracies, so long as the true mission of government remains undefined, will be a standing wonder to the future historian. And this, despite the sidelights in the form of warnings proffered by the past—the republic of Rome, with its privileged rulers, who treated the people like pariahs; the plutocrats and oligarchs of Venice masquerading as upholders of the republican idea while imposing despotism; the French revolutionaries prating liberty while practising the direct forms of blood and iron rule; our present system, wherein the people, having gained for themselves political and religious freedom, are clamouring daily and hourly for economic and social despotism and gravely imperilling their very existence as free men.

In the real systems as in the ideal, from the imagined Utopias of the remote ancients through all the ages right down to the visionary free commonwealth of Milton, sooner or later the parental idea predominates. Even the great Plato himself in his "Republic"—with a touch of unconscious satire worthy of a Molière—was lured into a dream of a perfect government presided over by philosopher Kings.

The misapprehension of the mission of government by the ancients was excusable enough: they had not an inkling of either political economy or sociology. Æsop alone, perhaps, and then only in the part of fabulist-interpreter, pointed the moral and adorned the tale of masterly inactivity as against official taskmasters and tax-eaters, when he told the illuminating story of King Log and King Stork.

That the ancients blundered and that their political structures crumbled should therefore be no cause for wonder. They had not the choice of the two opposing principles by means of which the solution of the capital and labour problem is alone possible—the free principle and the compulsory principle. Their only means of governing was to apply domestic economy to the State. Feudalism was a transition from the compulsory system to the free. At the present day all civilised nations are supposed to have their division of labour organised on the principle of political economy, or the free system; but as a matter of truth the principles of domestic economy have been largely and are increasingly being resorted to in all directions. This state of things is becoming more and more palpable amongst ourselves. The masses are constantly voting our system out of the region of political economy altogether; they are for ever calling out for prohibitions, inspections, and restrictions of all kinds—beseeching their leaders, in fact, to treat the nation as though it were a farm, a factory, a workhouse, or a plantation worked by slaves. They are now arriving at the stage of the bread and games of ancient Rome; and they will wake up one day to realise that those who know not how to ask for bread must expect to receive a stone.

All such conditions as these have no place in the science of government. That should be concerned with political economy alone. All legislation and methods adopted, or intended to be adopted, in a Socialistic State are entirely alien to individual liberty, private ownership of property, division of labour by free contract, and rewards regulated by the laws of supply and demand.

A nation has to do one of two things. It must decide to adopt or submit to one of two systems—the free or the compulsory one, and then look round for the best method of carrying out the selected system. If the compulsory system has been chosen, the principles of domestic economy should be studied and applied; if the free system has been adopted, then the laws of political economy should be mastered and allowed free play.

We are supposed and often flatter ourselves that we live under a free system, yet our legislation from olden times has been permeated by acts of compulsion, defensible only on the ground of domestic economy; and during the last decades such hosts of meddling enactments have been added to our statute-books by both political parties that, being of a cumulative nature, such legislation is in danger of landing us in a similar economic imbroglio to that of many a vanished empire.

To be truly just, we live at the present time under a hybrid system which, despite old Socialistic meddling laws retained and new pragmatism and predatory laws added, is still predominantly free. Under these circumstances it is natural to consider which of the two systems—the compulsory or the free—is best for a nation. The answer to such a question could never come from an economist as economist. It is an ethical question, and the economist deals only with the material world. The reply addressed to a people so advanced in intelligence as our own might well be this—that the compulsory system is the best for a nation too savage, too corrupt, too ignorant to use their individual liberty for their own advantage. To such a people the evils of coercion may be less than the evils arising from misused liberty, but then only on the condition that the coercing power is naturally or has an interest in being benevolent, and that it is exercised by those superior in every sense to the coerced nation. To a people the majority of whom are enlightened enough to understand what is advantageous and what is harmful to them, the free system must be incomparably better than the compulsory. This is the more certain because not only is the free system the only one compatible with material happiness and the least amount of suffering, but because personal liberty is the indispensable condition for intellectual, æsthetical, and moral progress.

As to the productiveness of the two systems, that of the free system is incalculably greater. In the ancient States, where compulsory division of labour prevailed, works and buildings were achieved the ruins of which fill us with wonder to-day. But it was all slowly accomplished, and while such work was in progress the general production for the welfare of the people was almost at a standstill. With even such a free system of division of labour as we now partially enjoy production is amazingly prompt and effective. Huge buildings, railways, tunnels, telegraph-lines, steamers, machines of all kinds are all constructed rapidly and with ease. Masses of highly-finished goods are turned out for consumption and use of the masses. We know that science and invention have greatly contributed to the progress of modern production; but it is equally true that the progress in science and invention is to a large extent the result of free division of labour. Given the removal of all anti-economic barriers in the form of monopolies, restrictions, inspection, and prohibitions, it is not so difficult to imagine the wondrous results that would accrue. A truly free system of division of labour would supply all the factors for the production of prosperity which the compulsory or socialistic system of the ancients supplied; but in addition to this each of the factors in the free system would exceed in potency the corresponding factor in the ancient system. The dread of punishment as the motive for work would be replaced by the desire for success, the hope of prosperity which has carried personal exertions to such a pitch in modern times; new materials and instruments would be supplied by competition between the whole world instead of being supplied by Government officials; the accumulation of capital would continue not in the hands of a privileged, squandering caste, but in the hands of every individual, and would largely be applied to new production. The discipline would be that over factories or farms instead of slavery; the selection of leaders would not depend on the caprice of a ruler, but would be the outcome of a natural selection of the fittest; distribution of work and the selection of products to be produced would depend not on the requirement of the governing classes, but on the workers themselves; frugality would not be compulsory, but voluntary, and actuated by highly-stimulated thrift. There can therefore be no doubt that the system of free division of labour would bring about a state of prosperity far exceeding that of the ancient compulsory systems.

We have seen in the last few decades what extraordinary benefits have been conferred by the abrogation of antiquated forms of legislation. Hundreds of examples could be given. But it will suffice to mention one or two of the most palpable—the abolition of paper and stamp duties so nobly compassed by Milner Gibson. Who among our grandsires would recognise their newspaper and book world in the newspaper and book world of to-day? The change is simply amazing. And yet in all directions we find that instead of pursuing the healthy and wealth-producing policy of the unmaking of laws, we are for ever sedulously engaged in the making of new and, in most cases, poverty-producing laws.

For an enlightened people, then, the science or mission of government should aim at allowing an individualist or free to shape itself on lines compatible with the personal of all—a system conferring upon the citizen by the simple functions of those presiding over it, work and to prosper according to his ability, aspirations; a system wherein the usurer, the motley tribe of social, financial, and political parasites would seek in vain to prey upon their fellows; a system wherein the division of labour, being unhampered and perfect because unassailed and unassailable by bureaucratic brigands, would enable the more fit to put forth all their powers for self-culture and the fulfilment of their destiny.

The mission of government, then, should be simply twofold—the jealous safeguarding of a people from invasion, and the strenuous upholding of law and order, and the liberty of the individual in the community.

A. EGMONT HAKE.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE PALAIS-ROYAL—III.

BY MARC LOGÉ

It is impossible to say how long the theatre would have remained shut had not Mademoiselle Montansier, directress of the theatre at Versailles, returned to Paris in October 1789, in the wake of the Royal Family. She wished to reopen an establishment in the capital, and, after searching for a house, she discovered the Beaujolais, which seemed to suit her plans particularly well. La Montansier immediately entered into negotiations with Delomel; she paid up the debts he owed, and had the lease of the theatre renewed in her name. She next turned her attention towards embellishing the old playhouse, which was repainted, whilst the stage was enlarged; and on the 12th of April, 1790, the Beaujolais reopened, having been rebaptised rather affectedly by the new manageress "Théâtre de la Demoiselle Montansier," subsequently shortened into "Le Théâtre Montansier." It was on this stage that the celebrated Mlle. Mars made her début at the age of thirteen, before being engaged at the Théâtre Français, where she became universally admired for her beauty, her enchanting voice, and her inimitable talent.

According to the variations of the political situation, the Théâtre Montansier altered several times its name, as its directress was a most practical woman, who tried to follow the fluctuations of public opinion. Thus, in 1791, the Palais-Royal, having been dubbed Palais-Egalité, the Théâtre Montansier received the rather far-fetched appellation of "Théâtre du Péristyle du Jardin Egalité," whilst in 1794 it was known as "Théâtre de la Montagne." But in the following year, Robespierre having himself fallen a prey to the people whose bloodthirstiness he had been the first to excite, La Montansier thought best to designate her playhouse as "Le Théâtre des Variétés."

Les Variétés then formed the fashionable rendezvous of Paris. Brazier, the celebrated vaudevillist (1783-1835) says, speaking of "Les Variétés:"

"La République, le Directoire, le Consulat et l'Empire y ont traîné leurs éperons et leurs grands sabres; c'était là qu'on faisait halte entre deux victoires; ce n'était qu'un bivouac, le grand abatteur de trônes ne laissait pas à ses capitaines le temps d'y faire élection de domicile."

The success of the Variétés could not but excite jealousies. Soon the Comédie Française (as it had done once before) complained bitterly that the Variétés represented plays degrading the standard of French literature (!), and the Press received from influential quarters orders to attack the immorality of the Variétés; whilst Fouché, Minister of Police, prevailed at length upon the Emperor to issue a decree obliging the management of the Variétés to leave the playhouse of the Galerie Beaujolais (January 1st, 1807).

La Montansier and her troop accordingly left, very regretfully, and settled for the time in the old Théâtre de la Cité whilst awaiting the construction of a new house on the Boulevards.* The old Beaujolais was once more left silent and solitary. But La Montansier soon obtained permission to let the theatre to a "marionette" show. The days were past, however, when fantoccini could interest the public. The people of Paris had had so many live puppets to play with during the past years that it could hardly be amused by the jests of little wooden figures.

A band of four-footed comedians—dogs—next took possession of the stage. The troop was complete—jeune-premier, ingénue, villain, confidant, &c., and a regular melodrama was written for them. The subject was most exciting—a young Russian Princess (represented by a silky-haired spaniel) was supposed to be sequestered in a tower by a wicked tyrant (a bulldog). Her lover, the Prince (a magnificent poodle), wandered at the foot of the tower "barking his love"! The intrepid retinue of the dashing young Prince (composed of poodles and daschunds) gave assault to the fortress, finally vanquishing the cruel tyrant's soldiers, and carrying off the Princess.

This show drew a full house each night; the Jeux Forains, as it was then called, was every evening the scene of delighted applause from Paris's most fashionable inhabitants. Brazier, speaking of these wonderful dogs, says:—

Beaucoup de spectateurs conduisaient leurs chiens à ce théâtre, pour servir de comparses, ou de figurants. On ne saurait s'imaginer combien ce spectacle était drôle; on entendait de toutes parts, des baignoires au Paradis: "Tiens! voilà Médor! Tiens, voilà Azor! Ah! c'est Turc qui commande la patrouille!" Un soir, un caniche était de faction au pied de la tour; lorsque son maître entra à l'orchestre, le pauvre chien le reconnut, quitta son poste, et déserta dans la salle avec armes et bagage! . . . Peu s'en fallut qu'il n'entraînât une désertion générale!"

The dogs eventually departed, however, to amuse other audiences in other climes, and the Salle Montansier was transformed into the Café de la Paix, where later small plays were acted by two or three comedians. After Mlle. Montansier's death, which occurred in 1820, the theatre was rented by Messieurs Dormeuil and Poirson, who obtained under M. de Montalivet's Ministry the privilege of giving back to the old playhouse its original destination. The interior of the Théâtre du Palais-Royal, as it was then named, was entirely rebuilt, and on the 6th of June, 1831, it opened with a prologue, wittily entitled "Ils n'ouvriront pas!" ("They won't open!")

During the seventeen years which elapsed until the Revolution of 1848, the Palais-Royal enjoyed an unprecedented success. When political trouble arose, it curtailed its name to Théâtre du Palais, but from June, 1848, it became definitely the Théâtre du Palais-Royal, and has remained so ever since.

Amongst the most celebrated protagonists of all the joyous plays which have braved les feux de la rampe within its precincts is to be mentioned Régnier, one of the greatest comedians of the last century, who later had a most brilliant career at the Comédie Française. Since the 'thirties the old enmity existing between the two theatres seems to have disappeared; indeed, proof of this was given this winter by M. Georges Berr, the talented actor of the Comédie Française, who wrote for the Palais-Royal a most charming play entitled "Le Million!" Samson, who created "Le Philtre Champenois"—the well-known L'héritier, who appeared for more than fifty years on the stage of the Palais-Royal, in such works as "La Cagnotte," of world-wide repute—the famous Mlle. Déjazet, and the no less famous Gil-Perès, who founded the Théâtre Molière at Brussels, and who died crazy, are amongst the other great comedians who have amused generations of Parisians. And "La Vie Parisienne," by Offenbach, which is at present scoring a real triumph on the stage of the Variétés on the Boulevards, was presented for the first time at the Palais-Royal, in 1867, with considerable success.

Such is the history of the Palais-Royal, quaint old playhouse, which has remained ever faithful to Rabelais' motto, "Le rire est le propre de l'homme," which still adorns its front. And one of the curiosities of the theatre which has passed through so many vicissitudes since its foundation to this day is its foyer, the walls of which are decorated by frescoes due to the brush of Emile Bayard. These paintings represent all the most celebrated actors and actresses who have appeared on its stage since 1831. Dressed in the costumes they wore in their greatest triumphs, Hortense Schneider, Gil Perès, the incomparable Virginie Déjazet, the inimitable Raymond gaze with smiling eyes at the people who during the entr'actes walk up and down the foyer, exchanging impressions, pleased to see that the old tradition of the theatre is so stoutly maintained by the new management, and that the Théâtre du Palais-Royal is still, as it has ever been, "the temple of laughter."

THE GIFT OF APPRECIATION

It is hardly necessary to remind readers of THE ACADEMY that Carlyle, the Scotchman who wrote a fine romance about the French Revolution but generally preferred to write in broken German, once devoted a book to the consideration of Heroes and Hero-Worshippers. These words are set on paper a long way from that and most other books, and I cannot recall for the moment the exact attitude he adopted towards hero-worshippers—whether he pitied them, patronised them, or admired them. As he was himself undoubtedly a hero one would expect his emotions to vary between compassion and admiration—the strong man's compassion for the weakness and admiration of the strength of the weak. I am sure at all events that he did not fall into the vulgar error of despising hero-worshippers, because they are content not to be heroes. Yet as I write it seems to me that the very name "hero-worshipper" has been spoilt by sneering lips; we are asked to believe that they are only weak-minded enthusiasts with a turn for indiscriminating praise, and that they swallow their heroes, as a snake swallows a rabbit, bones and all.

Personally I think this is a bad way in which to eat rabbits, but the best possible way in which to take a great man. I detest the cheese-paring enthusiasm that accepts the Olympian head and rejects the feet of human clay. Until Frank Harris taught me better I thought Shakespeare's Sonnets were capable of but one probable interpretation; but I did not wag my head with the moralist Browning and cry "The less Shakespeare he!" To-day I do not find Shakespeare less great because he loved Mary Fitton; it seems impossible that any one should. Yet Moore burnt Byron's autobiography, Ruskin would not write a Life of Turner because of the nature of his relationship with women, Stevenson abandoned an essay on Hazlitt because of the "Liber Amoris"—Stevenson, whose essay on Robert Burns "swells to heaven"! In the face of such spectacles as these it is surely legitimate to pine for the blind generosity of the enthusiast, that incautious fullness of appreciation that lifts great men with their due complement of vices and follies on to a higher plane where the ordinary conventions of human conduct no longer apply.

Great men are usually credited with an enormous confidence in their own ability, but often enough they have been distinguished for their modesty, and the arrogance has only come late in life to support their failing powers of creation. In fact, it may be said that no man, even the most conceited, is assured of his own heroic qualities till some one tells him of them, and thus far it would seem that the hero-worshipper creates the hero. One enthusiast can create many heroes, which possibly accounts for the fact that we find in life that heroes are far more numerous than hero-worshippers. Nearly every one possesses the heroic qualities in posse; the gift of appreciation is proportionately rare. Every day there are more great men and fewer admirers of greatness in man. In the next generation super-men will be so common that it will become a distinction to belong to Christ's democracy.

The standard example of hero-worship is Boswell's "Life of Johnson," a book whose greatness is universally admitted, and, it may be added, universally misconstrued. If we are to class biographies by their utility, it loses its pre-eminence, for we would have derived a considerable if insufficient knowledge of Johnson from the pages of Piozzi, Hawkins, and others; whereas if that matchless prig Austen Leigh had not written the Life of his aunt Jane Austen, we should have known practically nothing of the inspired miniature painter, less certainly than we know of Shakespeare. But, of course, the greatness of Boswell's Johnson rests with Boswell, and not with Johnson at all. Johnson had all the traditional virtues and vices of the mythical average Englishman. He was brave, honest, obstinate, intolerant, and ill-mannered; he was all these things with a violence to shake society, as his vast body shook the floors of houses. It is this violence that marks him out as an exceptional man, for violence of any kind is abnormal, but it is safe to say that for one Boswell there will be born a hundred Johnsons. In terms of literature Johnson is only of interest as being the protagonist of Boswell's masterpiece. If his "Lives of the Poets" still exist to irritate the unwary, "Irene" and "Rasselas" are dead and buried. For all his greatness Johnson had not the wit to win for himself his measure of immortality. It needs the magic of Boswell's pen to put life into his dead bones. He displays his hand in many parts—as a learned pig, as a sulky child, as Falstaff, and, happily enough, often as a simple, kind-hearted man; but, whatever the rôle, Boswell never forgets to impress us with the fact that this is a man to be admired. He shows us Johnson bellowing at the thought of death; he tells us that he was a brave man, and we believe him.

Johnson apart, Boswell's Life is a masterpiece of self-revelation; he is so honest as an artist that he makes no effort to hide the petty dishonesties of his own nature. He tells us how he won the tolerance of Johnson and, indeed, made himself necessary to him by means of skilful flattery. This signifies but little, for Shakespeare did not scruple to flatter Elizabeth and Pembroke, the greater folk of the moment. We are most of us willing to flatter great men if it gives them pleasure, but, unlike Boswell, we do not subsequently explain the process at full length in a book. It reminds us of Pepys taking careful note of his peccadilloes, but Pepys did not always remember that he intended posterity to read his diary. Boswell wrote without thought of concealment, handed his portrait of Johnson and his no less conscious portrait of himself to his own generation, and ever since has been regarded as a kind of thick-headed parasite for his pains. Boswell was not an intellectual man in the sense that Johnson was intellectual, but he had a wonderful knowledge of human motives and an appreciation of Johnson that brought out the latent genius in him, and ended by making the expression of his admiration more admirable than the man admired. Johnson is as dead as Garrick. Boswell lives with the great ones of English literature. The hero-worshipper has outlived the hero.

As a rule it is to be feared that appreciation is a gift granted only to the young. In our green, unknowing days we used to divide books into masterpieces and miserable rubbish. The classification is convenient, but as our minds wear out and we become wise, the tendency is to find no more masterpieces. Those were great nights when we used to read each other's verses and congratulate the world on its possession of our united genius. That is really the poet's hour, his rich reward for years of unprofitable labour, when the poets of his own unripe age receive his work with enthusiasm—an enthusiasm which in all honesty and all modesty he shares himself. Unhappily he is paid in advance; sooner or later he wakes to find that he is worshipping before the shrine of his own genius, and the shrine is empty. That is why I am half pleased and half melancholy when young men tell me that Antony Starbright, aged twenty, is the greatest poet since Keats. If they only knew that I too in my hour was one of a group of greatest poets who all wrote poems to Pan and Hylas, when on summer nights that sometimes stretched far into summer mornings we were all hero-worshippers together and we ourselves were the heroes.

There is a box at the Strand end of Waterloo Bridge which is always brimful of the works of new poets, and I can never pass it without pausing to look at the little neatly-bound volumes which say so little and mean so much. All the enthusiasms, all the illusions of youth are there, printed with broad margins and bound in imitation vellum. I turn the pages that brutal critics have not troubled to cut, and bitterly lament the blindness that makes it impossible for me to know what the young men who wrote them really wanted to say. But it pleases me to think that each of those little books has its appreciative public, some half-dozen young men who know the author and can read the greatness and pride of his youth between the reticent lines of his work.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

MUSIC

THERE is something undeniably pleasant about the word "popularity," and the ideas it conveys, and yet there is something unsatisfactory too. We feel instinctively that, when applied in connection with certain pre-eminent persons in whom the world has agreed to delight, the word is hardly good enough. There is, perhaps, a want of dignity about the idea of popularity. Admirably used to describe the position in public regard enjoyed by a great cricketer, a general, a statesman, or even a monarch, it cannot be so well used about great artists. Raphael and Mozart had the personal qualities which make men "popular," and their genius could be and was felt by the multitude; but would it not be almost derogatory to apply the word "popular" to them? Among the great figures which have adorned the inner temple of Art in recent times no man, perhaps, was more deservedly popular in a certain sense than Joseph Joachim, yet we should pause before applying the word to him. It would almost seem disrespectful to one of his high bearing in all that had to do with his art. We might apply it to Sullivan without fear, but hardly to Joachim.

But however this may be, if, for want of a better term, we are driven to speak of the popularity of certain artists, there is one thing about it and about them which we know only too well. Popularity is a possession which, however widely enjoyed, may surely and speedily be lost. Fashions are for a moment; lovers are fickle; pendulums swing; and the artist who twenty years ago was the object of ecstatic adoration may come to be regarded only as one who has had his day. An artist who continues to be unaffected by the changes and chances which wait on the career of public favourites is certainly a phenomenon. In the world of music at present we can think, perhaps, of only one, and that is M. Paderewski. We do not care to descant upon his "popularity," for he, like Joachim, is one of those for whom we would wish to find a word of greater seemliness; but, though he is certainly something more than merely "popular," he is the one artist of the time towards whom the attitude of the musical world—of the two hemispheres—has not changed. Familiarity with his art has bred no sign of indifference to it. If the rather silly manifestations of delight made by some of his more unrestrained admirers had the effect of cooling the ardour of the rest it would not be surprising. But there is no trace of this being so. Year after year, in every country, there is the same eagerness to hear M. Paderewski play, and when he has played there is the same agreement among his brother musicians and the amateurs that he stands alone, the Liszt or the Rubinstein of this generation. He, too, is unchanged since the first day that he mounted a platform. He has had to live in an atmosphere of adulation such as few artists have had to experience. Yet the effect of it upon him has been no more than that of Nebuchadnezzar's flame upon the Three Holy Children.

The causes of M. Paderewski's pre-eminence have often been analysed and stated. It has been shown that even though, as some have contended, he may be surpassed in certain secondary matters of technique by one or two of his contemporaries (an opinion which we do not share), he alone unites in a supreme degree all the gifts which pianists should possess—poetry, enthusiasm, culture, sensitiveness, magnetism, together with such art of touch, tone, and technique as enables him to make use of the higher qualities mentioned. But if this were all, if, indeed, M. Paderewski's equipment were one which could thus be analysed, it cannot be denied that there are two or three pianists who would run him very close in an examination in the schools. We must add, therefore, that in his playing, about the whole being of the artist which is expressed by that playing, there is a quality of dignity peculiar to himself, and it is in this dignity, enveloping all the poetry and all the romance as in a cloak, that the secret lies. Were M. Paderewski to vanish from the scene, there is one artist who would then, we think, occupy the unique place among the pianists. His gifts are magnificent, and his usage of them is ennobled by a certain robust manliness which has the effect of a fine mountain air. The strength of the hills is his. But he has not the special gift of chivalrous dignity which is so strong in M. Paderewski, that in his presence one feels as if Bayard were alive again. It is this dignity added to the romance and all the rest of it which makes him such a Chevalier. It happened to us the other day to glance through a dear, ridiculous, well-remembered old nursery-book in which we were once taught geography, "Near Home, or Europe Described."

We thought at once of M. Paderewski when we came to this true passage, "The Polish nobles are very polite and very brave, and they think there is no country in the world like Poland." The simple language brought a glow of sympathy and admiration with it. Polish nobles! What a character is theirs! And in that hierarchy surely M. Paderewski is among the first! Is not his playing brave? Is it not "polite" in the best meaning of that word? And when he is playing the music of that other great Polish noble, Frédéric Chopin (for Pole he was in spite of his French descent), are we not immediately aware that he thinks "there is no country in the world like Poland"? All of us have always recognised this; it needed not the burning, eloquent address to his countrymen about Chopin which M. Paderewski recently delivered, and which we were so much delighted to read in Miss Alma Tadema's just published translation—it needed no words of the pianist to teach us this. But we venture to advise all who love Chopin to read this oration, for they will find in it much that will help them to a fuller understanding of the composer-poet and of his interpreter, the pianist-poet.

So much has been said and written about M. Paderewski's playing of Chopin that we will not add more than merely to notice how delicate are the changes of mood shown by the pianist in his ever-changing treatment of the subsidiary passages. He has a new air to give them each time he plays a nocturne or a prelude. We anticipate, perhaps, that he will execute a particular passage with the same nuance which so much delighted us when last he played the piece. If disappointment it be, we are like to be disappointed, for, by some infinitesimal alteration of tone, some variation of the rubato, he has played it differently! Yet the conception of the piece remains the same, and we are reminded how Liszt said that Chopin compared his compositions to the tree whose stem is immovable, while the branches and leaves sway about, ever taking new curves and catching new colours. M. Paderewski's Chopin-playing is of course a thing apart, not challenged by any rival. We have sometimes thought that if we were condemned for our sins to know in the future only one of the pianistic enchantments it has been our lot to enjoy, we should choose to hear M. Paderewski playing a mazurka by Chopin. Other pianists can give us real pleasure with the studies and the sonatas, but none of them come near M. Paderewski when it is a question of the mazurkas. The late Mr. Hipkins, of Broadwoods', and the late Mrs. William Lowther, who had lessons from Chopin both in Paris and London, have told the writer that M. Paderewski was the only pianist who played Chopin like Chopin, that Charles Hallé knew some of the secrets, and that in some pieces M. Pachmann did also. They held strongly that Rubinstein, with all his genius, did not express the most personal of Chopin's compositions in the right way.

But we could wish that the perfection of M. Paderewski's Chopin did not seem to make some people less alive than they ought to be to the incomparable beauty of his treatment of other composers' music. He played some Beethoven and some Schumann the other day at Queen's Hall as finely, perhaps, as he has ever done. We scarcely like to draw attention to particular passages which impressed us by their strange beauty of interpretation, for the real marvel was the power with which he co-ordinated the whole piece, put each detail into its proper place, and made everything seem inevitably right. But we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of saying that M. Paderewski's delivery of the bits of recitative in the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, and the management of the embellishments in the slow movement, which were made to grow out of the melody like leaves out of a rose-bush (not some stiff "hybrid perpetual," but some climbing "Summer" rose), gave us moments of exceptional pleasure. Then in Schumann's F sharp minor Sonata, with what lucid art were the temperaments of "Florestan" and "Eusebius" made real to us! And if the delivery of the first verse of the Aria—so hard to play well, with the "tum-tum" accompanying chords to the simple, moving tune—was a revelation of what hidden art can effect, the second verse—an easy violoncello-like theme with right-hand ornaments which a child could surely play (though then it would sound merely stupid)—was an even greater wonder. It was altogether a rare experience, and roused such emotions as one would feel at the sight of some great gentleman, gay, yet grave, playing with some little, beautiful child.

We were reminded of M. Paderewski and his playing while we were listening the other day to the Coronation music. In its tender intimacy, its purged clarity, it resembled the effect which the verse from Purcell's "Jehovah, quam multi" had in the midst of that polyglot collection of compositions made for the sacring of King George. Of its noble dignity, its splendid simplicity, we were reminded by "Zadok the Priest." Of its frequent sweet austerity, Merbecke (beautiful still, though submitted to torturing processes of compulsion by Sir George Martin) and Tallis' great Litany reminded us; and to its frequent bright, strong, solid cheerfulness the music of Purcell's truest successor in our day, Sir Hubert Parry, turned our thoughts. Then there were the compositions to order, in their varying degrees of excellence. But among them all, Marbecke, Tallis, Purcell, Handel, and Parry were pre-eminent. So is M. Paderewski among even the best of his kind.

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR—II.

By FRANK HARRIS

I THOUGHT Grenoble one of the most beautiful and most interesting towns I had ever seen. Placed in a valley just above the meeting of the two rivers—the Isère and the Drac—with mountains from 5,000ft. to 10,000ft. in height walling it in on both hands, it would be difficult to find a finer position. The museum is wonderful, as I have said, and the town itself is a sort of epitome of the past. The old part of the Law Courts dates from 1480; the church of St. Laurent was built about 1050, and there is a crypt below with columns of Parian marble from the sixth century; the very name of the town, a corruption of Gratianopolis, carries one back to the time of the Emperor Gratian, who ruled towards the end of the fourth century; one can trace the growth of civilisation in Grenoble for fifteen hundred years.

But we had heard so much of Annecy and its joyous, bright lake that we resolved to visit it. At first our way led along the Durance by the great bastion of Mont Eynard, some 5,000ft. in height, which we had already admired on account of its bold, rocky outline. As we went on, this mountain became still more picturesque: first came vineyards and orchards and crofts; then a long pine-clad slope for a couple of thousand yards, and far above the pines a thousand feet of porphyric cliff like a wall. I do not know that the rock was porphyry, but the colour of it was that peculiar reddish brown. On the other side across the stream were mountains of all shapes—breasts, and pyramids—while behind them showed a higher range of snow-clad peaks.

A little later and the scene on our left hand became entrancing. Mountains of various shapes sprang up in front, and between them one caught sight of the vast porphyric bastion frowning down above them, the top veiled in clouds. Here and there waterfalls streamed down between the cliffs; now the water was blown into foam, now it was whirled about like veils of lawn tossed in the wind. As we drew towards Annecy the mountains fell away on either hand, losing their majesty. Nor did Annecy, charmingly situated as it is, nearly 1,500ft. above the sea-level, make up in beauty for what we had left behind. It is a delightful little town, the old part intersected by broad canals, a sort of quaint Venice among the mountains looking out over the gayest, brightest lake imaginable. But after being impressed by natural beauty for some time, one wants rest just as much as if one had yielded to the enchantment of some marvellous book or work of art. Emotions soon weary, and so Annecy has made a deeper impression in memory than it did at the moment. We left the town in the afternoon and coasted the lake for some ten miles to Ugines at the other end and then turned towards Chamonix and Mont Blanc. Soon the road began to climb a most romantic gorge, the setting, so to speak, of the mountain torrent, the Arly, all emerald waters and lace foam tumbling over brown rocks. But our eyes seldom fell to the stream: we were all intent on the heights. For the most part they were clothed in pines and larch to the summits, and so near together that when we turned round, the gorge seemed absolutely closed behind us. We were in complete shade, which would have been gloom had it not been for the blue sky and sunlight above. We crossed and recrossed the stream a dozen times, winding up higher and higher for something like twelve miles of the most romantically beautiful road in Europe. Suddenly we were stopped by douaniers at the little village of Flumet; we were entering the neutral zone, it appeared, between France and Switzerland, and a pass was required, which took half an hour to draw up and cost us a penny-halfpenny. Custom-house officers and aeroplanes! Man's sense of humour is rudimentary.

In ten minutes after leaving the custom-house we swept to the top of the pass and caught sight of the Mont Blanc range; the snow summits all rosy in the evening light. A little later for a moment we saw Mont Blanc himself with his ermine cape swathed in clouds. Then down, down into St. Gervais for the night. Every one knows how the little town was almost destroyed by an avalanche in 1892. Even to-day it is only beginning to be rebuilt—capital recovers confidence slowly.

We had had a feast of natural beauty, and it seemed impossible that any scenery, any combination of wood, water, and mountain could make a new impression on us. The drive from Ugines to St. Gervais had exhausted our capacity for that sort of emotion. Consequently we were in a hurry to get northward: Paris and the rush of civilised life began to draw us. All the morning running out of St. Gervais towards Geneva we had every variety of mountain scenery; but our appetite for it was blunted. We were glad when the mountains fell away and hills took their place and we caught glimpses of level plain; so we drove like Jehu till we reached Bellegarde, the frontier of the neutral zone, and underwent the custom formalities again in an exceedingly hot sun. While the douaniers were verifying our passport we betook ourselves to the famous Perte du Rhone, a gulf where the river disappears for some 80yds. whenever the water is low.

On leaving Bellegarde we went up a very steep hill, and a few miles further on we came to the Défilé de l'Ecluse—the famous gorge by which the Rhone leaves Switzerland between the southern extremity of the Jura range and the mountain of Vuache, which is here about 3,600ft. in height. This wonderfully deep and narrow defile is commanded by the Fort de l'Ecluse, which was founded by the Dukes of Savoy and rebuilt under Louis XIV. by Vauban. We passed through the fortress by a tunnel in the rock, and on issuing from the gloomy precincts came suddenly to a most surprising view. Away below us on the left the Rhone runs through a rift in the mountains, the cliffs on the further side falling almost in a precipice, and from our side it looked as if one could jump into the torrent 1,000ft. below. After our glut of natural beauties this view brought a new thrill.

In half an hour or so we reached Nantua and lunched there. It was very hot, and the hotel was crowded—a dozen autos at the door, and a hundred guests making a holiday of Whitsuntide.

The road from Nantua to Bourg ran in wide sweeps upwards for nearly half an hour, till suddenly we reached the top of the mountain. My breath was taken by the grandeur of the prospect. We seemed to be on the roof of the world, so wide was the outlook; the whole country in hills and valleys lay beneath us as in a coloured map. We ascended many hills afterwards and had wide prospects, but none to be compared with this.

About four o'clock we reached Bourg, and at once made our way along a wide boulevard to the famous church of Brou. The first glimpse of the beautiful portal, in form like the handle of a wicker-basket, showed me how much deeper was the impression made by art than was made by any natural beauty.

The church has often been described and always praised; but pretty as I thought it, the best I can say for it is that it is a fair casket for the jewels it holds. It was built by order of Margaret of Austria between 1511 and 1536 to carry out a vow of her mother-in-law, Margaret of Bourbon. One could almost guess from the first glance that it was built by a woman. Although it had the famous architects John Perreal, called John of Paris, and Loys van Boghem, it shows a grace and elegance which I like to think of as Margaret's. There are other indications that she was concerned with the design. The beautiful portal has over the centre an Ecce Homo, and a statue of St. Nicholas, to whom the church is dedicated, and another statue to St. Andrew—everywhere men-saints, and not women.

Margaret to me is a most interesting personality, with a weird, unhappy story: she married John of Castile, and was widowed at seventeen; she married again Philibert the Handsome, of Savoy, and again was left a widow before she was twenty-four years of age. She became Regent of the Low Countries under Philip of Spain, and governed the United Provinces with extraordinary tact and considerable success for years. According to tradition, she leant on Egmont rather than on her Spanish advisers, and when Philip recalled her and sent Alba with an army to carry out his suicidal policy of religious persecution Margaret returned to France and occupied herself piously with the building of this church of Brou till her death in 1530.

The inside of the church is as graceful as the outside; the carved woodwork of the stalls extraordinarily rich and elaborate; but it is the three tombs of Margaret herself, her mother-in-law, and her husband Philibert which take the eye. The tomb of Philibert is in the centre of the cross; Margaret lies on the left, and the other Margaret, her mother-in-law, on the right. Margaret's tomb and Philibert's are both distinguished by having two statues. Philibert is represented above in his habit as he lived, and below in the degradation of beauty as a skeleton. The Renaissance, like the youth of men, was obsessed with constant thoughts of death and brooding on the undiscovered country. Margaret has used the same idea for her own tomb, except that her presentment is clothed, even in death, with the exception of the feet, which are bare. On the left foot one can see the mark of the wound from which she died. But the feet are the feet of a living woman, and not of a skeleton. For herself Margaret loved beauty more than truth.

Naturally enough, according to modern ideas the tomb of the mother-in-law is the simplest, Margaret's own tomb the most beautiful and the richest. On the cornice of it, as on the great font at the entrance of the church, one reads Margaret's motto, "Fortune, infortune," to which she added "Fort'ne," as if in defiance of adverse fortune. There are other slight indications of her character. Her oratory in the chancel has a sidelong opening, which allowed her to sit alone by her fire and still see the high altar and the officiating priests. Above her tomb are some women's figures in the costumes of the period (probably some of her own r aids), carried out with extraordinary charm and an exquisite, if mannered, grace. A love of beauty with a studied elegance of gesture, a profound melancholy with a brave acceptance of whatever Fate might bring—these seem to me the characteristics of Margaret, or, rather, I feel that these qualities linger like a perfume about the monuments of Brou, and they are to me the pathetic emanation of that perturbed and lonely, but brave and gracious woman who here won at length to eternal peace.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By LANCELOT LAWTON

PROBLEMS OF THE PACIFIC

WERE it possible on the grounds of expediency to have published in detail a complete report of the deliberations that have just been brought to a close at the Imperial Conference, many matters of high consequence affecting the welfare of the Empire as a whole would doubtless have been revealed. Probably one of the most important subjects debated in camera was that relating to the vexed question of Asiatic immigration in the Colonial Dominions. The problem is one of deep concern, not only to the United States, but also to Great Britain. In relation to ourselves it is essentially an Imperial problem; in a wider and more significant sense it is an Anglo-Saxon problem.

The political events which have happened during the last few years have rendered a danger, always foreseen, an imminent peril. Moreover, the irony of circumstances decreed that Great Britain and the United States, the two nations now beset by the problems of Asiatic immigration, should take a prominent part in shaping those events. Both gave material support to Japan in her war with Russia. Both assisted in a large measure to gain entry for Japan into what is commonly called "the comity of nations." Their object was in itself laudable enough. They wished to see the tide of Russian aggression in the Far East stemmed, and to secure the policy of the Open Door. Russian aggression in the Far East was, to some extent, arrested. But, though determined in the letter of treaties, the policy of the Open Door is less assured to-day than it was in the period of the Russian occupation in Manchuria. It is a policy the fulfilment of which is more dependent upon the spirit than the letter; it is in the spirit largely that it is being violated at the present time. Apart, however, from these considerations, the outstanding feature of the situation, plainly stated, is that the nations who, in their adherence to the policy of the Open Door, had supported Japan, were very shortly afterwards compelled to close their own portals against Japanese immigrants. I have said that they closed their portals, but they were not in a position to bolt and bar them. For the prestige of Japan among the Powers of the world had improved to such an extent that she claimed that discriminating restrictions on the movements of her people when imposed by foreign countries were humiliating. She declined to become a party to immigration treaties, and herself voluntarily offered to remedy the evil.

The problem may be regarded as officially settled. But the masses of the people in British Columbia and in California are by no means disposed to accept such a sanguine view. They claim that Japanese of an undesirable class are still smuggling themselves into the forbidden territories. Furthermore, they strenuously object to the Japanese who are already settled on the soil, and they urge that, owing to the fact that these people possess an adroit habit of concealing themselves when officers entrusted with making a census are at work, the total number has been miscalculated. Any dispute on this score is beside the question. The fact remains that the white residents on the Pacific coast will not tolerate the presence of Japanese in their midst; and if events prove that further immigration has not been satisfactorily restricted, the problem that will arise can have only one solution. And as Japan has plainly intimated that she will not consent to exclusion treaties, that solution can only be found as a result of an appeal to arms. It would be idle to deny, no matter how much we would like to think otherwise, that when Japan voluntarily offered to take her own measures the resources of diplomacy were exhausted. Unless she keep her word implicitly, the future can hold nothing but trouble—trouble, moreover, in which Great Britain will have no choice of sides save she elect to strain to the point of breaking the ties which bind her to her Colonies; save she volunteer to prove false to her own flesh and blood and to turn her back upon those loyal people who for so long have upheld the traditions of the race in the King's Dominions beyond the Seas.

Not only in the United States and Canada, but also in Australia and New Zealand the presence of the Japanese in large numbers is considered undesirable. The English-speaking peoples in the Pacific are therefore united in the determination to preserve the exploitation of their territories for the white man, and for the white man alone. If any doubt on this subject is entertained in the Mother Country, then, for the sake of the maintenance of the integrity of the Empire, the sooner this doubt is once and for all dispelled the better. The antagonistic sentiment in the territories of the Pacific is directed not alone to the Japanese; it extends to all Asiatics, irrespective of their nationality or the country of their allegiance. But it must be confessed that the presence of the Japanese is detested more than that of any other race. As colonists they are looked upon as comparing unfavourably with the Chinese. The latter are held to be more amenable to law and order, less aggressively assertive in individuality, more honest in their commercial transactions, and altogether less prone to corrupt the social community in the midst of which they have temporarily taken up their abode. Moreover, the Japanese immigrants are subjects of a country strong in a military sense and acknowledged as a Power; whereas the Chinese are subjects of an Empire whose diplomacy, unsupported by force, has always been unequal to the task of resisting measures of frank exclusion, taken from time to time, measures which were more discriminating than any imposed in regard to the Japanese. Thus the situation is complicated to an extraordinary degree, owing to the fact that while Japan is the friend and ally of Great Britain, the presence of her people is resented by the Colonies more than the presence of the people of any other Asiatic race.

While this resentment has been in existence for some considerable time in the United States, Canada, and elsewhere, it has of recent years gathered force, until to-day it threatens developments, the gravity of which must inevitably impress itself upon all those who have at heart the maintenance of Imperial interests, and, in a still greater sense, the consolidation of Anglo-Saxon aims and ideals. It is to be feared that in the British Isles the danger is not sufficiently understood—not sufficiently realised. We who see little of the Japanese know little of them. We have, for the most part, formed our opinions from books that were written in the days of old Japan, the days when Japan was the land of quaint customs and picturesque scenes. Few Japanese visit England; and those who do so are either officials charged with special missions, or else the representatives of established business concerns in Japan. From contact with such as these it is impossible for us to form a true estimate of the Japanese character. The peoples of the Pacific, however, meet all classes of Japanese, particularly the labourers, who are the most undesirable class. If value is to be attached to the saying that to know people it is necessary to live with them, the Americans and our Colonials are in a position to form an opinion of the Japanese which is much nearer the truth than any superficial survey of the tourist or the officially inspired writer. We who are far distant from the scene of racial strife cannot logically refute this opinion without casting a reflection, not only upon the honesty but also upon the common-sense of our own kinsmen. Let us, therefore, be chary of criticising others who are in a better position than ourselves to judge of their own local needs.

As the problem of Asiatic immigration is more acute in British Columbia than in Australia or New Zealand, I propose to deal with some of its general aspects in so far as it relates to that portion of the King's Dominions. In the course of a speech in the Canadian House of Commons on January 21st, 1908, M. Lemieux, the representative of the Canadian Government, who concluded an understanding with Japan on the subject of immigration, and who has frequently expressed his cordial appreciation of the Japanese, reminded his hearers that "One must bear in mind that there are now over 25,000 Asiatics in British Columbia, practically all of whom are male adults. There are about 75,000 male adults of the white race in the Province. So that if to-day every fourth man in that Province competing for a living is an Asiatic, are not the reasons for effectual restriction far more compelling than one would at first imagine?" A census shows that of the 17,000 Chinese in Canada no fewer than 14,000 are domiciled in British Columbia. Originally a tax of 50 dollars per head was placed upon all Chinese immigrants. This was subsequently increased to 100 dollars; but, as it did not prove effective in checking the influx of Chinese, a still further increase to 500 dollars was made from January 1st, 1904. For two years no Chinese entered the Dominion. In 1906 there were sixteen, and in 1905 ninety-five, Chinese immigrants.

It is not denied that there is a serious shortage of labour in this province. With an area of 395,000 square miles, British Columbia has a white population of only 260,000, or less than one person to the square mile. In many respects it constitutes one of the most desirable territories for immigration in the whole world. The country is described as evergreen, healthful, and invigorating, and it presents the greatest variety of climate of any of the provinces of Canada. With a coast line of 450 miles on the Pacific Ocean, washed by the waters of a warm current that flows from Japan, the territory occupies a situation only rivalled by that of California, and one fully justifying the title given it of the "World's Sanatorium." The industrial resources are so immense as to be incalculable. There are over 82,000,000 acres of forest and woodland, and the area of standing timber is the largest and most compact in the world; wheat land covers 10,000,000 acres; coal-measures are the most extensive in the world; the undeveloped deposits of iron ore are enormous; the fisheries have yielded over 103,000,000 dols.; while gold to the value of 114,000,000 dols., and other minerals to the extent of 185,000,000 dols. have been produced. In view of these facts it must be admitted that nowhere can be found a fairer field for immigration than the rich lands of British Columbia. For their development both capital and labour are required. The quarter of a million white people who have already settled in the province have as yet barely scraped the surface of the soil. There is room not only for thousands but for millions more, and herein lies the crux of the whole problem of immigration. Where are these thousands, these millions to come from? From the East or from the West? Are they to be white men, with the habits of white men, who will assimilate with the white race already settled on the soil? Or are they to be yellow men, with the habits of yellow men, whose assimilation with the white settlers is as undesirable as it is impossible? British Columbia has already made up her mind on this question.

MOTORING

THE R.A.C. test of a 14.20 h.p. Deasy car (Siddeley type) was concluded on the 19th inst. The official certificate of performance will not be issued for some little time, as the car has to be dismantled to allow of a detailed examination of the mechanism; but it is unofficially announced that the whole distance of 15,000 miles was covered without an involuntary stop. This was a very fine performance, especially as it is stated that the car was running as well at the finish as at the commencement of the trial. Only on one other occasion, we believe, has any car been subjected, under R.A.C. supervision, to so prolonged a trial; and it is hardly too much to say that the splendid achievement of the car referred to did more than anything else to establish its permanent position in the front rank of the world's automobiles. We refer to the memorable trial of the Rolls-Royce "Silver Ghost," which in 1906 covered 15,000 miles on the road without an involuntary stop, and which, on exhaustive examination by the official experts at the conclusion of the run, showed its mechanism to be practically as perfect and free from signs of wear as on the day it left the Rolls-Royce works. No competitor has attempted to emulate this performance, which stands out as the most remarkable in the annals of automobilism.

Practically the only two problems in connection with the motor-car which still remain to be solved are the evolution of the ideal tyre and the dustless road. So far as essentials are concerned, the tyre remains what it was when Dunlop invented it—or, rather, rendered it practicable—before the motor era had even commenced in this country. It has, of course, vastly improved in strength and durability in the intervening years; in fact, when one realises the tremendous strains to which it is subjected, and which it successfully withstands, one can only marvel at the science and skill which have conferred such strength upon so thin a shield of rubber and fabric. But the tyre which consists of a combination of air and rubber is still the only one which is practicable for use on the motor-car; it is still liable to puncture and burst, and it still constitutes the most troublesome and expensive feature of motoring. What the future may have in store one cannot tell; but the utter failure, so far, of inventors to give us a satisfactory substitute for the conventional pneumatic tyre or to remove its grave defects is not conducive to optimism in this important matter.

With regard to the other great problem—that of dust-prevention—the position is different. It may safely be said that whatever popular prejudice still exists against the motor-car is mainly due to the dust nuisance for which it is responsible. It is perfectly true, as motorists are never tired of arguing, that the car does not actually create the dust, but it is equally true that it raises and disperses it, and it is the raising and dispersing of it that constitutes the real evil. However, the main point is that the dust nuisance does exist to an intolerable degree, and that until it is

A NEW FACTOR IN MOTORING.

The best is generally good enough for most people; but generally most people are lamentably unsuccessful in getting the best. How, for example, may the motorist get the best tyre? It is the matter of moment to him; but only the costly experiment will answer the question satisfactorily.

If he could exhaustively test every tyre on the market until the best had been determined; if his years of experience and an expert knowledge of rubber and its preparation, had given him ideas for improvement which he could incorporate in that best tyre, and again exhaustively test until he was entirely satisfied with the results, he would be able to claim that he had the best. Is that not so?

Then we have the best tyre because that has been our method. With entire liberty of choice we made our selection, incorporated our ideas, entered into a binding contract with the manufacturers (a firm of the highest reputation and experience), and produced—the VICTOR TYRE. Indisputably the VICTOR TYRE is the best.

The VICTOR VEST continues its extraordinary successful career. The VICTOR VEST is a new foundation, and a new life, for any old cover. It prevents punctures and bursts, and enables the cover to be run to its last shred of tread. We give a written guarantee that it will save 50 per cent. on normal tyre cost—£5 on every £10 spent on tyres.

These two make a new factor in motoring. With the VICTOR RETREADS (sound covers for unsound free) they make the most effective trio available to the motorist to-day. We shall be glad to prove that.

remedied, prejudice against the car will continue, and motoring itself will be deprived of half its charms.

Unlike the case of the perfect tyre, there does not seem to be any insuperable difficulty in the way of obtaining the dustless, or practically dustless, road. The exhaustive experiments carried out during the last year or two by surveyors and experts all over the Kingdom prove that a properly-constructed road foundation, which has its surface tar-sprayed at reasonable intervals, is to all intents and purposes dust-free, and both motorists and the public are entitled to ask what the authorities have done, or propose to do, in that direction. Much was expected from the Road Board, which was specially constituted to deal with the question, and was provided (by motorists) with the necessary funds, but it must be admitted that up to the present there are few indications of drastic improvement.

There are signs that the long-threatened invasion of this country by American motor-car manufacturers is on the eve of materialisation on a scale which will demand the very serious attention of our own makers, if the latter are to retain the position they have won by a dozen years of determined and persistent effort. For some months past several of the big American car-manufacturing "com-bines" have had branches or distributing agencies located in the Metropolis, and definite announcements of a further influx in the near future appear from time to time in the technical motor journals. Of course, the American manufacturers, with the modesty which is so characteristic of them, make no secret of their intention to secure the lion's share of the British market, if not to capture it in toto; and they will do it by offering their productions at prices with which the British maker cannot compete. It is not difficult to understand that they may be in a position to do this. The enormous scale upon which cars are manufactured in America—one reads of individual factories capable of an output of 20,000 complete cars per annum—naturally tends to reduce the cost of production to a minimum; and, in addition, there is the important point of the disposal of the surplus production to be considered. It is stated that at the present time the American factories are equipped with the necessary plant for the turning out of 200,000 cars every year, and the native demand has been, and still is, so great as to absorb almost the whole of this enormous output. But this cannot go on indefinitely. The time must come when the home demand will slacken, and the American manufacturer will then have to find a market for his surplus wares at any price. This is the real danger the British maker will have to face—the surplus product. Fortunately for him, the unpleasant impression produced upon the minds of the Britisher by the low-priced American bicycles dumped over here in such enormous quantities and in similar circumstances some fifteen or twenty years ago still remains to an appreciable degree, and it will take some time before the consequential prejudice against American cars is wholly removed.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE Coronation is over, and we are all heartily glad to have some work to do. Frankly the disturbance to trade caused by a long public holiday in the middle of the season is not liked, and we all hope that the Government will not give us another forty-eight hours' compulsory holiday. The speculator will not speculate when there is anything else to do. There is this curious feature connected with gambling in stocks and shares. It does not appear capable of being conducted by a mind that is bent upon any other pleasures.

The new Greek Loan is out, and although Messrs. Hambro and Messrs. Erlanger give the issue their support, I do not think that the public will apply. They might just as well buy Greek Fives at 101½ instead of these new Fours at 86½. The new issue yields £4 14s. per cent., and the old issue, including accrued interest, 5 per cent. Greece is prosperous to-day, and may not go to war with Turkey. But many Greeks consider that such a war is a complete certainty and that the country only requires money in order to make a good fight. If a war did break out all Greek stocks would tumble ten or fifteen points. Therefore I see no reason why any one should jump at the new loan. The Dominion Saw Mills asks the public for five million dollars in the shape of 50,000 seven per cent. participating preference shares of 100 dollars each. They will be sold at 97½ dollars, or rather the allotment will be made at par and a commission of 2½ per cent. allowed. The money is wanted to purchase certain retail lumber businesses, the profits of which are estimated at £100,000 a year. It will be remembered that the Debentures of Dominion Saw Mills were floated last year. South Vancouver has been asking the public to subscribe to a 4 per cent. Loan, but as this is only a suburb of the city of Vancouver itself, it does not appear to me a reasonable proposition. The interest is much too low.

MONEY.—Money is gradually hardening up, and the combination of the Settlement and the end of the half-year has made money distinctly tight. This is, however, only momentary strength, and in July we may expect ease. There will be a good deal of gold coming from Egypt, for although a certain amount of hoarding has no doubt taken place, the fellaheen still owe large sums of money to the banks and mortgage institutions, and this money is gradually becoming available to London.

FOREIGNERS.—All foreigners have been idle. The new Greek Loan is quoted at par. Russian Fours have improved a shade, and the four and a half are up a point. Peru Prefers, which are really the only gamble in the Foreign Market at the moment, go strong and weaken again as the bulls succeed in getting out. Tintos are better on the account, but they should see yet higher prices, for they are being bought by the right people.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway Market improved only to fall back again. There is a great deal of talk about Dover A and Kent coal, but the Stock Exchange is much too previous in these matters, and cautious people will prefer to wait until Kent collieries are actually producing coal. At present, although I make no doubt that the coal is there, we are getting nothing but talk. There is evidently still a small bull account in Great Central A and B, but some of the weaker bulls were shaken out at the Settlement. North-Easterns look cheap and London and North-Western are also a fair purchase at 145, but the best of the lot, as I am continually reminding everybody, is Great Western at 129, and next to these I should prefer Lancashire and Yorkshire, which at par yield nearly 5 per cent. It is a strange thing that the public has never come into this market. It showed signs of buying a few months ago, but those who bought were unable to take up the stock, and although there has been a rise most of the prices are still too low.

YANKEES.—The Yankee market had a smart spurt on the news that the Combine between the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific had been declared legal, but the decision was not the decision of the Supreme Court, but only a Circuit Court, and it is possible that it may be appealed against. Nevertheless, the speculator went in and bought Unions greedily, and both Unions and Southern show a sharp rise. The big bankers still remain rather pessimistic. The crop reports, upon which the whole thing really hangs, are not as good as at first anticipated. Business throughout the West is uncertain. In some places undoubtedly the harvest will be good, but dry weather seems to have damaged large sections of the country. The speculator may find himself shaken out, for I again repeat that what the "Big Six" want is a steady market and no boom, and what the "Big Six" want they generally get.

CANADA.—The Canadian news shows that all the big financiers in Canada are becoming very nervous as to the financial position. The harvest will be the largest on record. This will mean that all the banks will require every farthing they can collect. Canadian banks are very well-managed institutions, and they will probably be able to find all the money that is required; but it is notorious that they have advanced very large sums to the promoters upon combines that have not yet been floated. These promoters relied upon London finding the money, and London apparently realises that Canada is a little over done. I do not think that we shall have any serious crash, but it is quite certain that wise people are now getting out of their Canadian securities, and they will not buy in again until the slump has run its course.

RUBBER.—Notwithstanding the Rubber Exhibition, which, by the way, is one of the dullest shows I have ever attended, rubber shares remain practically unsaleable. The dealers report that they never do a bargain, and, although Linggis and Vals stiffened just before the account, this was only due to some of the jobbers making their books even and not to any demand on the part of the public. Raw rubber remains at a very low figure, and it is clear that there are large stocks still to be sold. I am often asked to recommend cheap rubber shares, but this is impossible, for with rubber weak in price, dividends for next year are certain to be reduced, and the share that looks cheap to-day will be found to have been a very expensive purchase in 1912. I am afraid that the bottom has not been reached.

OIL.—Sir Marcus Samuel through the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company has at last come to terms with the Red Sea Oil Fields. In my opinion they are paying too much for the property. The Red Sea Oilfields has made a good bargain, for it gets the Samuel crowd to find the money and manage the business, and all it has to do is to sit tight. Red Seas look cheap to-day. It is possible that an oil-field may be built up. Certainly the reports of the geologists are favourable; but oil-fields require enormous capital and many years of patient drilling. The meeting of the Commonwealth Oil was a very uninteresting affair, for Mr. Mackay was able to announce that the Board had made arrangements to find working capital. This relieved the shareholders of any responsibilities. I do not see how this Company can ever hope to pay a dividend in view of its huge capital and extravagant management.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir market still keeps very dull, and people are evidently afraid that the continued illness of Sir Julius Wernher has had something to do with the lethargy displayed by the leaders. Optimists, however, declare that the Rand is on the eve of an immense production, and that new methods and new machinery will reduce working costs. Cheap power and mechanical drills may do a great deal, but 50 per cent. of working costs are labour, and this, according to the manager of the Rand Mines, will cost more this year than last year. At the moment I see nothing attractive in the Kaffir market.

RHODESIANS.—Rhodesians are harder mainly because the dealers now have the steady support of the big houses, who are quite determined not to allow any share to fall below what they consider its legitimate value. As the leaders hold two-thirds of the share capital of all the Rhodesian companies they can make prices whatever they like. Mr. Robert Williams, the greatest boomster on earth, has sent a magnificent cable, in which he says he has seen enough ore to produce 600,000 tons of copper, or about an eighth of the world's consumption. No doubt Mr. Williams believes his own good news, but the London market takes it coldly. It has grown used to the optimism of this remarkable gentleman.

MISCELLANEOUS.—A share that has recently been officially quoted on the London Stock Exchange is the 100-drachma share of the Bank of Athens, which can be purchased to-day at about 5½. The last dividend was 9 per cent., and it is believed that 1911 will show an improvement on 1910. The turnover of the Bank has jumped from 2,241 million drachmas in 1908 to 4,429 million drachmas in 1910, and the deposits are rising in a most surprising manner. This Bank has pursued a very forward policy, and some of the big trust companies are absorbing the shares.

The SUBSCRIPTION LIST is NOW OPEN, and will CLOSE on or before FRIDAY, the 30th June, 1911, for Town, and SATURDAY, the 1st July, 1911, for Country.

Applications will only be received upon the terms of the Prospectus dated June 26, 1911, to which intending subscribers are referred, and which contains further information and particulars.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

WE print in another column a communication, signed "A Shocked Citizen," taking exception to our comments on the recent administration of the Home Office. The writer, who modestly withholds his name from a curious public, is obviously a perfervid admirer of "our Home Secretary." Any one is, of course, perfectly at liberty to bestow his admiration where he will; but we must protest against our correspondent laying the blame for his "shocked" condition on us. If Mr. Winston Churchill will proceed along the lines laid down by his most famous predecessors, no one will be disturbed by any remarks which we shall offer. If, however, the Home Secretary repeats some of the worst of his own precedents, we think it likely that not one but many of his sensitive admirers will find our comment to be little to their liking.

Concessions having been granted to the restless dockers and seamen at various ports—for the especial exigencies of delayed transport of passengers and cargoes demanded rapid action—the strike which threatened to upset commerce to an unparalleled extent has practically ceased. Dissatisfaction, however, like an infectious disease, has spread to other sections of the workers, in the North of England notably, and the thousands of carters of Manchester, backed up by an enormous number of the roughest element in the population, have cast that city into a state of lamentable turmoil. The old story is repeated; the crowds have lost their heads and defied the law, and the police have had to draw their batons and use their belts, often in sheer self-defence. Wagons and drays laden with ordinary goods—in some cases with perishable produce urgently required—have to be guarded in their progress by police, mounted and on foot; even thus they often fail to reach their destination safely. Several vans were rushed by hundreds of strikers on Tuesday evening; stones were thrown and sticks freely used, and a number of police were seriously hurt. The experience of the recent outbreak in Wales seems likely to occur again, for Birmingham, Bolton, and other large towns have been called upon to supply extra forces to cope with the inflamed and angry men. Simply by the force of example these thousands of rioters have been created from the ranks of formerly contented labourers. Had the seamen not struck, or not gained some of their points, the carters and draymen would have remained peaceful citizens, and the normal prosperity of one of our busiest centres of industry would have rested undisturbed. The fever spreads—encouraged by the enactments of a Government thoroughly imbued with the Socialistic tendency.

The Indian weeklies which reach us—The Wednesday Review and The Parsi—are generally of great interest, and recent issues are no exception to the rule. In the former paper, dated June 7th, the writer who signs himself "Day-Dreamer" has a capital little causerie entitled "Over the Groundnuts and Water," which we are told is the equivalent of our phrase "Over the walnuts and wine." After our recent experiences with the Coronation festivities reports of public meetings convened with the object of presenting addresses to his Majesty cannot be expected to rouse much enthusiasm, but it is pleasant to note that Madras, "the oldest of British territories in India," is exerting herself to make the forthcoming Royal visit a brilliant success. The Parsi for June 11th has a good literary article by Professor Wadia on "Life After Death according to the Babylonians," and its topical notes are excellent; while a discussion of the cinematograph as an educational factor, by Dr. Dadachanji, F.R.S., is worthy of serious consideration.

The possibility of owning the sole existent fragment of Captain Cook's original diary should attract many prospective purchasers to Messrs. Sotheby's forthcoming sale of manuscripts. The particular leaf of the diary offered is dated Sunday, May 6th, 1770, and contains the first known allusion to Botany Bay, with an explanation of the origin of the name. "The great number of new plants, etc., our gentlemen botanists have collected in this place," writes the famous old explorer, "occasioned my giving it the name of Botanist Bay." Parts of a log-book of a later voyage in 1773 will also be for sale. He was not, however, "Captain" Cook at that time; not until he was forty-seven years of age, in 1775, did he attain that rank. Many interesting autographs are also to be put on the market, including letters from Thackeray, Rossetti, Carlyle, Browning, Shelley, Burns, Byron, and others.

A REBIRTH

With memories of that truant time I woke
 When the young earth no memories held but dreams,
 And all the dear remembered voices spoke
 In piteous concord with the living themes
 That threaded all the woodland peace with song.
 Then I lost feeling of the lingering wrong
 That time has wrought and hope may not remove :
 It seemed the world had grown no older, love !

So, as responsive to a charm, I stepped Within those cloistered precincts, and with eyes
 Enkindled, ears with memory adept,
 Embraced the faery haunt, to the puny flies
 Skimming the mellow beams of the low sun,
 And the shy stealthy footfalls, one by one,
 Of sylvan folk that stirred the leafy ways
 To whispers of long-buried summer days.

Thus fancy lured me through the verdant aisles,
 Breasting the fern that rustled as I passed,
 And listening now to catch in frequent whiles
 Your skirt's soft mimicry, until at last,
 Whole prey to dim remembrance, forth I stood
 Where sleeping waters lap the drowsy wood,
 And heard again the voice beloved wake
 Echoes of trilling joy across the lake.

The fretted canopy now darkling hung,
 As once again I sought the scented wynd,
 And on the mossy floor deep shadows flung
 That called to the dark shadows of the mind.
 Then, issuing from the gloom, a cool breeze kissed
 My cheek : a gossamer sea of drifting mist
 Broke at my feet, and closed my dream above—
 And oh ! the world is so much older, love !

THE CULT OF PAPER

THE lack of restraint, the default of discipline, the decline of the patria potestas which are characteristic of the present day, and the half-century which preceded it, have led to many modifications of national character. Far from being pessimists, we rejoice to observe patriotism kindled in national emergency, as in the South African crisis, and patriotic movements obtaining a firm hold on the younger generation, as in the movement of the Boy-Scouts and kindred voluntary organisations. Proof is afforded not only that national spirit survives, but that, unconsciously perhaps, it displays itself in what amounts to a protest against creeds held in modern schools of thought which assert themselves far beyond their real significance or influence.

The schools we have referred to are those which believe, or pretend to believe, that the world can be conducted according to their views through the medium of paper. We do not mean that the gassy orator eschews the spoken word, but he relies for its influence chiefly on the knowledge that his words—very probably bereft of their crudity—will be transferred to paper.

Take the instance of the Socialist : so far as his voice can influence, he loves to hear the sound of it, and to inflict it on the classes whose time is not valuable, and who for that very reason are more likely to be inflamed by his delusive sophistries and led into dangerous opinions and courses. The mob-orator, however, knows that his voice can reach but few ; he therefore endeavours to disseminate various periodicals, which embellish the spoken word with a wealth of extravagance which it is hoped will lead to the acme of publicity—a criminal prosecution. The spoken word, in these days at least, seldom attains to that goal ; but the rag in which blasphemy, revolution, and obscene imagery are indulged in may by notice if it fall into injudicious hands provide gratis an advertisement which no money can buy.

Printed matter such as we have referred to came into our hands in connection with the Coronation, with the suggestion that we should brand it as it undoubtedly deserved. It was not as a result of any fear that our vocabulary would prove unequal to the task that we resolutely declined to give the advertisement of clean paper to filth which was conceived in the gutter, and after an ephemeral existence naturally passes into the sewer.

We have endeavoured briefly to show how the cult of paper may be beneficial in the realm of literature by lending support and authority to that which makes for the welfare of the commonwealth for moral and material good. We have also shown how its cult may be honoured by refusing its use in the dissemination of poisonous and malevolent matter.

From another point of view the cult of paper appears to us to be less satisfactory. In international affairs, in spite of abundant evidence to the contrary, the belief in the efficacy of paper—treaties, agreements, ententes—is in reality a hoary superstition. An acute crisis may, indeed, be bridged over for a time by the provisions of an international act, if—and only if—the interests of the subscribing parties at the moment, and the state of their resources at the moment, render the erection of a paper barrier temporarily useful. Such a barrier, however, whether its aim be to terminate or to postpone a conflict, has long since ceased to be lastingly binding. The efficacy of paper in international affairs changes with the internal and external capacity for offence and defence of the parties to an act, and whether the balance of power be on the side of capacity for aggression or the necessity for abstaining from it. The Treaty of Paris, the Treaty of London, the Treaty of Berlin, the Act of Algiers, to name a few well-known examples, have served their immediate purpose. Any one at all acquainted with the methods of diplomacy is aware that no sooner is an international document signed than intrigues commence to undermine or supplant it. All such documents are in the nature of a temporary compromise, and have not, therefore, the element of permanence in them.

It is for that reason that we are not greatly disturbed by the acceptance on its own merits of the Declaration of London. We observe, however, that its inception and ratification are indicative of flabby diplomatic fibre and a subserviency to the party whip where national interests are concerned, which is deplorable.

Perhaps the Declaration may, after all, prove to be a blessing in disguise, since the object of the acts which it authorises are so obviously a menace to our existence that unless we have lost all national grit and resolution we shall at once set about making our home secure from threatened starvation.

Without some such manifestation it is possible we should have relied too implicitly on our cult of paper, and deemed ourselves secure, trusting in the efficacy of the written word.

THE ONLY WAY

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

THE object of a good general is to defeat his enemy finally and decisively, not to fight continuous undecisive actions, which sap his strength and exhaust the patience of the rank and file, over an untenable position. This fact should be borne in mind by the leaders of the Unionist Party at the present crisis. Let them remember there is nothing inglorious or cowardly in a movement which is merely a reculer pour mieux sauter. During the last few days—ever since, in fact, the Coronation has enabled us to revert to serious things—the air has been full of rumours of an approaching General Election to be held some time in August. The side that makes itself responsible for this colossal blunder will go down to ignominy and defeat at the poll, and will deserve it. The Unionist party has absolutely nothing to gain by an Election in August, or for some time to come. There are three main reasons for this: (1) We have no constructive policy to lay before the people except Tariff Reform. That measure has been threshed out at three General Elections, and its bones have been sucked so dry that the meanest electioneering dog will hardly smell at the carcase again. We have so firmly established the principle of Tariff Reform that there is no further necessity to consult the country on that particular issue, because the people know that directly a Unionist Government is returned to power it will form the main plank in our constructive policy. (2) The Government has not yet been in office long enough to ensure a sufficient residue of unpopularity to warrant an appeal to the people. (3) A Committee has just been formed to reorganise the Unionist Party, and it is essential that it should be given time to act.

Therefore, if we fight an Election in August, it can only be on the old issue of the Peers versus the People, on which we have already been twice defeated, and on which we could not hope to regain a seat at the present time. The rank and file should make it perfectly clear to their leaders, and their leaders to the House of Lords, that they refuse to make a third attack on this stronghold of the enemy. It would be the height of folly, for the country could never be induced to believe that it was not the Lords who had forced the Election, and, as we have already said, the side that forces an Election in August is going to make itself extremely unpopular.

Therefore, having established the principle that an Election in August would be highly disastrous to the Unionist cause, what course remains open to the Lords to adopt towards the Parliament Bill? We will assume, as is highly probable, that the House of Commons will reject the Lords' amendments en bloc. Up to this point the Lords have a perfect right to preserve to themselves full liberty of action, and to leave it to the Government to disclose their hand first. The Government can either appeal to the people or Mr. Asquith can go to the King and ask for guarantees to create the necessary number of Peers. An appeal to the people is unlikely. Neither side wants an Election; party funds are scarce, and also, supposing the Government came back with a slightly increased or reduced majority, they would find themselves in exactly the same position as now, and a solution would have to be sought, as there is nothing to prevent the Lords rejecting the Parliament Bill a second time, and so on ad infinitum. Therefore we will assume that Mr. Asquith will ask for, and will obtain, the necessary guarantees from the Crown. Then is the moment for the Lords seriously to consider their position. They can either follow the precedent of 1839 and abstain from voting, or if they wish to show the country they have only yielded to force majeure they can give way after the first batch of Peers has been created. To hold out until sufficient have been created to swamp the Conservative majority in the Upper House would be the height of folly. What has the country or the Conservative party to gain by having the House of Lords filled with the dregs of the Radical party hacks? The Parliament Bill would in any case become law, and then it will be infinitely more difficult to upset it in the future.

No; directly the first of the Hireling Batch receive their Togas in return for party cash, it is the bounden duty of the Lords to allow the Bill to pass under a solemn protest, and they will incur a criminal responsibility if they allow these vast hostile additions to their ranks. They can take up a strong and dignified position and say, "There is no clear majority in the country in favour of this measure; it has passed the House of Commons by a combination of parties, not united on the Bill itself, but in order to pass ulterior measures in return for giving it their support. On the other hand we cannot take upon ourselves the responsibility of forcing a third General Election on the country within a period of eighteen months; neither can we place the Crown in the invidious position of having to create this vast number of new Peers in order to force this Bill through the Upper House, a course of action for which there is no Constitutional precedent, and which is merely throwing the responsibility of the electorate on the King. On the other hand, we admit no finality in the present limitation of our powers. Both parties are pledged to the Reform of the Upper House, and that question is indissolubly bound up with Electoral Reform. Until these two great questions are settled it is impossible to strike a proper balance of authority between the House of Commons and the Second Chamber, and any temporary arrangement like the present must necessarily be the subject of future consideration and revision. The Government has not yet any general scheme of reform to offer, and therefore until that hour arrives we will abstain from voting on the Parliament Bill." This is the only course for the Peers to take—the only one, in fact, which will preserve their dignity and utility for future action.

Now let us consider the future. Supposing the Peers decide on this sane and simple course, their motives will not be misunderstood by the Liberal party or by the country. The Government can never say "We have won a final and permanent victory" when it is obvious to the meanest understanding that it is merely a reculer pour mieux sauter. Once they have obtained what they want, and have no common enemy to oppose, how long does any one believe the discordant elements which make up the Radical majority in the House will hold together? Hardly a day. Does the Labour party love the Government? Do the Irish cherish any tender feelings toward a Cabinet which has been in power for five years and has never yet produced a scheme of Home Rule? Do the old members of the Gladstonian party like to ride in double harness with Socialists and crude financiers of the type of Lloyd George? We have here the elements of a pretty quarrel. It is only the idea of a common enemy which holds them together, and once that enemy gracefully retires and leaves them to fight amongst themselves he can destroy them in detail as they advance the respective interests which each has so dearly at heart. Within a year the Unionist party will be the complete masters of the situation.

Whatever measures the Government brings forward they cannot become law under the Parliament Bill under two years unless we have continuous sessions, and by the end of two years there will be nothing left of this predatory horde, who in lieu of having anything better to loot will fall upon one another with even greater vigour than they have devoted to attacking the Unionist party and Unionist property. In the words of the old song, "There's a sun still shining in the sky," and even in England that sun is bound to come from under its cloud sooner or later. Give them the rope with which to hang themselves and one another. They have the State Insurance Bill to pass, which is already exciting the most bitter controversy; they are pledged to Home Rule—how popular that will make them! they are responsible for the Declaration of London—that will lose them many followers amongst thinking and responsible men. There are a thousand fantastic schemes brewing in the jaundiced brains of Messrs. Lloyd George, Winston Churchill, and Keir Hardie. Let us go to the country on some of these measures, not on the old battle-cry of the Peers versus the People, which has served the Radical party so well in the past. Then victory will be assured, and when victory is assured the Parliament Bill is of about as much value as the historic Act of Algeciras. The Unionist party can then adjust popular representation on a fair basis. Limerick shall have a few more and Romford a few less electors. They shall be equally divided, not in the proportion of 50 to 1 as they are at present. We will make the Upper House a business-like and representative Chamber, which can hold its own in future on its own merits. We will get rid of the Backwoodsmen, and fill it only with men who have won their spurs not by borrowing the rusty harness of their ancestors, but in active competition with their fellow-countrymen in the vast field of public service, experience, and natural ability.

PEACE OR WAR?

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

It is a dangerous game to play with fire, and, as we pointed out in our issue of June 17th, the French action in sending an army to Fez was likely to lead to European complications of a serious nature. The example of France was quickly followed by Spain, who, to prove that she still had an interest in the Moroccan settlement, landed troops at Larache and seized Alcizar. We also pointed out in our issue of June 17th that it only remained for Germany to follow suit. Now with startling suddenness—without a word of previous warning to the other signatories of the mutilated Act of Algeciras—Germany has dispatched a warship to Agadir under the pretext of protecting German subjects and German trade. As a matter of fact there are no German subjects at Agadir, except, perhaps, a few Nationals who need no protection, and German trade in that district is absolutely nil. Therefore the hollowness of this assumption is so obvious that we can afford to ignore it altogether and to consider what effect her action is likely to have in Morocco and in Europe.

It is a satisfactory sign that Germany's action has been received calmly both in France and in Europe generally, which shows a desire on the part of all parties to leave the matter to diplomacy to settle; but it is no use hiding the true facts, and the situation is so serious that a European war may be the result. But, of course, this entirely depends on whether Germany is merely bluffing, or whether she seriously intends to assert her claim to a share in the partition of the Shereefian Empire. If Germany merely intends to remind France and Europe that she must receive compensation elsewhere, why then diplomacy will have little difficulty in giving her a recompense; but if she means to have a port in Morocco, why then only the firmest stand on the part of the Governments of England and France can preserve the peace of Europe. It is distressing to see how little interest has been taken in the affair in this country, because this seizure of Agadir is directed just as much against England as it is against France. Agadir can be made into an excellent harbour, and it stands right on the great highway between this country and South Africa. It will immeasurably add to our burdens in wartime if we have to dispatch a fleet to prevent the depredations of German cruisers on our South African trade. Then there is another aspect. It neutralises, to a great extent, the advantage we have in holding Gibraltar. We must at all costs, even if we have to go to war immediately, prevent Germany establishing herself on the coast of Morocco. Once she is in possession of Agadir there is nothing to prevent her seizing other ports, and this she will certainly do once she realises that we do not mean to fight over Agadir. If a German force seized Tangier and constructed forts there we should no longer hold the key to the Mediterranean, as we do at present. We should share it with another keeper, and our great highway to India and to the Far East would be threatened. Apart from the strategical position, however, and looking at it from the purely commercial standpoint, we cannot allow Germany to control the outlet to the rich Sus country. Our trade would gradually driven out of Morocco altogether, although at the present time it is four times as great as Germany's.

We have up to the present merely looked at the question from an English standpoint, which is serious enough; but the position of France in Northern Africa is rendered even more precarious. As French writers have pointed out over and over again, France cannot afford to have a German frontier in Africa as well as in Europe. Her possessions in Algeria would be jeopardised and her forces in Europe would have to be correspondingly reduced if a German Army Corps were established in Morocco, which it would certainly be once the principle of Pacific Penetration were established. Any future steps France may take to preserve law and order in Morocco would be neutralised by the presence of German troops. Europe would live in a state of constant unrest, because a new Sultan would certainly spring up under German rule; Morocco would thus have two rulers constantly quarrelling; and once the native allies of the two Powers were engaged in hostilities it would not be long before their European seconds followed suit. An intolerable situation would thus be created, and we had much better fight at once than drag on in a miserable state of suspended animation, only postponing the inevitable day.

There is a very prevalent opinion that Spain was urged to seize Larache at German instigation. It was a ballon d'essai just to see how France would act. Owing to the weakness and fall of the Monis Ministry, nothing definite was done, and France was content to accept Spain's explanations, and thus encouraged, Germany determined to go and do likewise. Germany's action proves that she has little fear of France by herself, and that the policy of pin-pricks is going to be continued once again after a lapse of three or four years. Therefore it is obvious that only one thing can thwart German ambitions, and that is joint action on the part of England and France.

But what will be the attitude of Sir Edward Grey? Is he going to stand by France or is he merely going to acquiesce in a half-hearted policy of laissez-faire? It is too early to say. We cannot afford to allow another Balkan incident, similar to that in which Russia, Servia, and England surrendered their position in the Balkans at the dictation of the German Government. Unless we stand by France in the present crisis the Anglo-French Alliance is so much waste-paper, because France will refuse, and will rightly refuse, to support us in future on the Continent if on the present occasion we prove ourselves to be merely a broken reed. It is announced that it is the intention of England and France to send cruisers to Agadir to assist Germany in preserving order in that district, although there is not the smallest sign of a disturbance of any sort. There is a delightful irony about this, and it is a sound step to which no one can take exception, but it is only the first move in the game. The French and English Governments should make it perfectly clear to Germany that they will not allow a single German soldier or sailor to land in Morocco, and that such a step can only be regarded as an overt act of hostilities, which would immediately lead to a declaration of war on the part of the allies. No one would deplore hostilities more than ourselves, but, on the other hand, we must face the facts as they are. If Germany is merely bluffing, her bluff will be disclosed at once, but if she really means to force a quarrel on us, why then it had much better come at once whilst we still enjoy a measure of that Naval Supremacy which is gradually slipping from our grasp.

The action of Germany will go a long way towards shattering our faith in the value and honesty of diplomacy. The plot was maturing even whilst the German Government was entering into pourparlers with France towards a rapprochement between those Powers, and just at a time when it seemed as if the war-clouds were dispersing from Europe's horizon. But we can learn a useful lesson from the coup. It should prove to us how little any pretensions of friendship or goodwill can be relied upon, and that, even whilst the Kaiser's heir is receiving the cheers of the citizens of London, Germany's old game of undermining our supremacy on the seas continues just as uninterruptedly and barefacedly as ever.

THE "ENGLISH REVIEW" AND THE "SPECTATOR"

A FRENCH VIEW

[Translated from the "Mercure de France," July 1, 1911.]

"We have already pointed out in these columns the interesting nature of the English Review, under the brilliant editorship of Mr. Austin Harrison. We find the greatest names of English literature among its contributors—in fact, all those who are proud to show some independence of intellect, to express ideas meant for adult ears and not for young people. It should be noted that nothing has ever been published in its pages which could pass for indecorous or indecent; subjects are merely treated with the liberty which well-brought-up people allow themselves in their conversation after the children have been sent to bed. But this independence, which seems the most natural thing in the world to us in France, and particularly to the readers of the Mercure, seems to arouse alarm among certain sections of the English public as being a dangerous freedom. The last straw was an article, entitled 'Thoughts on Morality,' by Mr. Frank Harris, one of the most vigorous and emancipated of English thinkers. Mr. Harris cites the Italian proverb: Peccato di carne non è peccato, and invokes a number of arguments in its defence, among others some which are most moderate and familiar to persons of intelligence. But this was really too much! It must be stopped; war must be declared on the 'Great Adult Review,' and it was the Spectator which flourished the red ribbon.

"This Conservative weekly newspaper is edited by a sombre and an austere man, who is naturally suited to play the rôle of 'Père la Pudeur' on the other side of the Channel: they have also that sort of bird in England. . . . The anonymous author of this diatribe poses as the champion of insulted morality. It is unnecessary to describe the methods of defence adopted by Mr. Austin Harrison—he has plenty; at any rate, the quality of his merchandise is above suspicion, and he has no need to pose hypocritically as something that he is not. The chaste and pure Spectator announced its intention of never again referring to the English Review, and of refusing its advertisements. To which Mr. Harrison replied: 'Your threat to boycott our advertisements is a little like the fable of the sour grapes, since we have not offered you any for over three months,' and he informs the Spectator at the same time that he will reply to its attack in the July number of the English Review. But this artificial imputation has already caused a great sensation, and from the point of view of publicity Mr. Harrison could not desire anything better.

"Numerous protests have been addressed to the Spectator, among which are Mr. Arnold Bennett's biting and witty letter and Mr. R. A. Scott-James' sarcastic and lashing letters. Other papers have come to the rescue, and we read with pleasure in THE ACADEMY of June 17th a courageous and worthy commentary by Mr. Cecil Cowper on the intolerant attitude of the Spectator to its confrères. Mr. Cecil Cowper defends the right of the English Review not to be a publication virginibus puerisque, and to address itself freely to any public which it chooses to select. It would be interesting to follow the fight between these two current ideas, for it is nothing less than the war between the spirit of emancipation and the spirit of slavery. We need hardly say on which side our sympathies are to be found, and we hope that all writers and artists who desire to resist the puritanical tyranny of the Spectator will gather themselves round Mr. Harrison and the English Review. From this conflict may be born a controversy that shall take its place in history and bear invaluable consequences.

"HENRY D. DAVRAY."

THE NATIONAL INSURANCE BILL

THE warning note recently uttered by Sir Gerald Ryan, the President of the Institute of Actuaries, as to the actuarial basis of the Insurance Scheme of the Government, appears to have excited the interest of many who otherwise would have been well content to take the finances of the scheme as assured, upon the high authority of the two ex-Presidents of the Institute of Actuaries to whom the calculations were entrusted. The fact now begins to be generally appreciated by the public—as it has been from the outset by the actuarial profession and by many of the leaders of the Friendly Societies (the bodies chiefly concerned)—that there are two distinct questions, one (and the easier) being the soundness of the calculations, and the other the conditions under which the results of the calculations are to be applied. Certain assumptions must necessarily underlie all actuarial estimates, and the principal of these, in the present case, is that the Government Actuaries had to provide for one common fund applicable to the whole body of insured persons and supported by one common rate of contribution. Under the Bill, however, the insured are to be segregated in societies and “branches,” each of which is to be financially independent, and the number of which may fall little short of thirty thousand.

It is easy to see that general average conditions will fail to be realised when applied to small bodies, numbering in some cases fewer than one hundred lives, and that with such a minute subdivision of risks the widest fluctuations are possible. In a degree the Bill anticipates and provides for this feature, since the benefits or contributions are to be adjusted every three years in the case of each society or branch, according to its working. It is to be feared, however, that the framers of the Bill have not quite appreciated the difference between deviations from the standard due merely to varying qualities of administration and those which may be traced to inequalities in the risks under insurance. If uniformity in administrative efficiency could be secured there would still emerge a great variety in the claim experiences as between different societies and branches, although in the aggregate the conditions assumed by the Government actuaries might be reproduced. The triennial adjustments might go far to remedy the inequalities set up by the application of a common rate of contribution to all risks at the outset, and so might fairly reconcile the scheme to those who see pronounced injustice in the “flat rate” system. That, however, is not the avowed purpose of the adjustments, the provisions for which have been based, in the public utterances of Ministers, upon the paramount necessity of stimulating a vigilant administration. That an “approved society” may be well and carefully administered and still have to make default by reason of the pressure of its legitimate risks does not appear to have been fully appreciated. Such a case illustrates well the fundamental difference between the actuarial premises and the conditions actually set up by the Bill.

The heaviest item in the liabilities covered by the scheme is that of sickness; in the Bill this liability is separated (unhappily, as will be suggested later) into two elements—temporary incapacity called sickness, and permanent incapacity called disablement—but as “disablement” cannot begin until “sickness” has endured six months, it will be seen that the two are one in essentials. In estimating this liability the Government actuaries have employed the tables deduced by the present writer from the “experience” of the Manchester Unity of Odd-fellows in the period 1893-97. Certain adjustments have been made to give effect to the variations between the Manchester Unity and the general population as regards the distribution of occupation risks, and these are sufficiently explained by the statement that in the Manchester Unity the “normal” risks represented 785 lives out of each 1,000 coming under observation, against 466 in the case of the general population, the balance of the 1,000 in each case representing persons subject to extra risk. On the whole, this is a basis with which experts will be disposed to agree, although in passing it may be noted that the Manchester Unity includes a fairly strong contingent of the well-to-do, whose association with the society is sentimental and who are seldom on the sick-list. This class will be conspicuous only by its absence from the national scheme, and it may be said that the 785 “normals” of the Manchester Unity will be a better class, from the point of view of insurance, than the 466 “normals” of the Government scheme. Against this may be put (for a time) the fact that at its inception the Government insurance will include only those who are then actually employed or engaged in some regular occupation, and will, consequently, tend to show a better rate of sickness for a few years than if the whole body of lives, including those already sick or disabled, were brought in—which course would exhibit a more correct parallel with the Manchester Unity conditions. The extent to which the two opposing factors will neutralise each other is speculative in the highest degree, as is also the question of the validity of the application to nearly fourteen million persons of rates of sickness drawn from an experience of about 5 per cent. of that number, and that the higher stratum of the working class. Taking the Manchester Unity experience, however, as affording the best available data, the fact remains that general average rates based on widely differing risks are to be applied to a vast number of separate bodies in many of which the risks are biased by particular circumstances, and that wide divergences between the basic assumptions and the actual workings must reveal themselves.

In this connection an uneasy feeling has been present in the minds of some from the introduction of the Bill, and lately has impressed itself more widely, that in regard to the qualification for benefit the Bill may mean one thing and the actuarial estimates quite another. It is laid down by the Bill that sick pay and disablement benefit are payable to persons “whilst rendered unfit to provide their own maintenance by some specific disease or by bodily or mental disablement.” The Government actuaries suggest that this may be regarded financially as corresponding with the conditions under which benefit for these periods of sickness is usually granted by Friendly Societies “although not in all respects identical therewith.” What is implied by these last words is not quite clear, but the question arises, Are the conditions the same in both cases? The Manchester Unity sickness experience emerged under the all-important condition that a member during receipt of sick-pay should be totally unable to follow any remunerative employment, and should, in fact, be absolutely forbidden to work either for an employer or in any domestic capacity—e.g., in his garden. Do the stipulations of the Insurance Bill imply the same thing, or do they permit of partial earnings? The question is rendered the more significant by the curious separation of “sickness” and “disablement” under the Bill. This separation is quite unknown to Friendly Societies, which may find difficulty in recognising in “disablement benefit” the exact counterpart of their continuous sick-pay. With the latter they are familiar enough, but they do not treat it as otherwise than sick benefit either in regard to supervision or the supplying of frequent medical certificates.

The inference set up by the terms of the Insurance Bill is that disablement benefit is a species of “invalidity annuity” which, once granted, is more or less free of either medical or management supervision. If conjoined with this it is to be understood that partial earnings are to be permitted a claim rate far transcending that assumed by the Government actuaries may be looked for. We are not without experience of "partial incapacity" in this country. One very large centralised Friendly Society permits its members aged over sixty and in receipt of permanent sick pay to earn up to 12s. a week. The immediate result is to reduce supervision almost to a nullity because the actual earnings of a man who is allowed to earn anything at all cannot be checked. In the result, whilst the claims on this Society are very fairly comparable with the Manchester Unity experience at ages under sixty, the permanent sick pay beyond that age rises to about 70 per cent. in excess of the Manchester Unity average. A result no less unfavourable than this is likely to be set up if the Insurance Act is to permit of "partial earnings." The Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to think that every man will act as a spy upon his neighbour in this respect, but facts hardly support this expectation.

Similar differences between the actuarial conditions and the proposals of the Bill arise on the maternity benefit. The birth-rate varies enormously between different parts of the country, being as high as 33 per thousand of the population in Durham and as low as 19 per thousand in Sussex. The use of a general average rate implies an even distribution throughout the whole of the insuring bodies, but nothing is more certain than that an even distribution will not be attained in practice. Thus the community is faced with the prospect of a large number of societies going under financial penalty because their members have a high birth-rate, whilst "race suicide" in other quarters (generally amongst the more highly-paid artisans) will be rewarded by increase of benefits from the resulting monetary surplus. The same effect will be produced, though from a different cause, by the way in which the contribution for this benefit has been actuarially adjusted. The Bill provides that where husband and wife are both insured the maternity benefit shall be treated as a benefit payable to the wife, and the Government actuaries have evidently transferred to the women's side of the scheme the cost of this particular section of the maternity claims. Now, setting aside the women engaged in domestic service, the sick nurses, the clerks, and other classes which consist for the most part of unmarried women, it will be found that over 35 per cent. of all the insurable women are engaged in the textile trades—which means that the vast majority of the 35 per cent. are employed in the mills and factories of the Lancashire textile area. But the financial relief to the men due to the transference of the liability for the maternity benefit to these women is spread over the whole male population, whence it follows (1) that the men of the country generally are credited with a financial relief which they will not experience, and (2) that the men resident in the textile area will obtain a financial relief much exceeding that with which they have been credited. It will thus be found that in, say, Durham, where the sickness rate is believed to be very high, the birth-rate high, and comparatively few women employed (and the men's rate of contribution for the maternity benefit consequently too low even for a normal birth-rate), the "approved societies" will be heavily hit on all counts, and cannot fail to be in a chronic condition of deficiency. On the other hand, in the approved societies among the male Lancashire mill-workers, whose sickness claim-rate is below the average, and who will be contributing at an unnecessarily high rate for the maternity benefits (because so large a portion of the liability will fall upon the women's societies), every item in the finances will be one of profit, quite irrespective of any merits of administration.

There are many vital questions affecting the women's side of the scheme, but this point of the maternity benefit is not the least important. Every insured woman must contribute for this benefit with the other insurances, and the contribution for it appears to have been based upon (1) the number of births among employed married women and (2) the number of illegitimate births to be provided for.

Dealing first with (1), it should be clear that if women's societies all over the country are raising contributions for a general average benefit which, in fact, tends to be concentrated in a particular area, then, in default of provisions by which the money so raised is passed over to that area, the contributions in all other parts of the country will embody a superfluity, whilst in the concentration area they will be wholly inadequate. Here surely is an important departure from the actuarial conditions. On (2) it is only necessary to draw attention firstly to the variations in the rates of illegitimacy between different parts of the country, and secondly to the impolicy of exacting from every decent girl in employment a premium for a benefit operating to smooth the way of immorality. It is true, as Mrs. Bosanquet said in her article published in THE ACADEMY of June 24th, that at present any woman, however abandoned in character, can get medical aid and nursing in any Poor-law Infirmary, but surely there is a real difference between parochial relief and the "endowment of motherhood," as the maternity benefit has been picturesquely termed. The one at any rate is a charge upon the ratepayer with some consequent stigma, the other is regarded as a laudable insurance benefit.

Turning to another subject, it appears that in estimating the population coming into insurance on May 1st, 1912, the actuaries gave full effect to the decline in the death-rate, which is known to have been in progress since 1901, the latest year as to which actual population statistics are available. But, somewhat singularly, they do not appear to have considered it requisite to give effect to the probability that the future death-rates will be lower than the general average of the decade 1891-1901. It is not quite clear why this course was taken. There is strong ground for the belief (remembering the general fall in the death-rate since 1891-1901) that with all the present "invalids," whether now in the Friendly Societies or outside of them, excluded from the Government scheme, and with all the otherwise unfit driven into the Post Office class, the "approved societies" will experience mortality much below the general rate of the period named. The Government actuaries point out that "against the reduction in the general rates of mortality that has taken place since 1901 may be set the fact that in calculating contributions no account has been taken of the element of secessions." What is the bearing of this remark? We must remember that the sickness rate increases with age, and that a level contribution is more than sufficient to meet the liability in the early years of life and insufficient in the later years, and that the saving in the early years must be stored up to provide the "reserves" necessary to honour the liabilities for those who survive in the later years when the contribution is no longer sufficient. If, then, an abnormal number of persons live to the later years in any insurance scheme, the stored-up reserves will be prematurely exhausted and the scheme will collapse. Foreseeing such a possible survival in the present case, the Government actuaries take solace in the suggestion that if an abnormally small number die a certain number will lapse and (inferentially) leave their reserves behind to redress the balance. But where is such a provision in the Bill? On the contrary, it is provided that when the stipulated period of lapse arrives any sums credited to the society in respect of the contributors affected shall "be transferred to such account and dealt with in such manner as may be prescribed"—in other words, apparently, shall be alienated from the funds of the approved societies concerned and so rendered unavailable for the purpose contemplated by the Government actuaries. One of the buttresses of the actuarial estimates is thus summarily removed.

It is right to recognise that the estimates of the Government actuaries include a margin of 11·3 per cent. of the contributions in the case of men and 12·6 per cent. in the case of women, and that if no other contingency than sickness and disablement had to be considered this margin would represent nearly 25 per cent. In the case of a really general scheme in which local eccentricities of experience were neutralised by aggregation this margin would probably be sufficient. But such a margin is as nothing compared with the fluctuations against which some of the "approved societies" are destined to battle. There are two other margin items—the exclusion of benefit to persons who receive board and lodging during sickness, and the rejection of liability after the "qualifying period" of six months for sickness, or two years for disablement, of claims which originated during the currency of this period. In regard to these items the Friendly Societies are already in a state of agitation, and, having regard to the fact that the payment of contributions is compulsory, their attitude is not unreasonable. It is surely unthinkable that Parliament will decide either to pry into private arrangements between employer and employed or to enact that no disablement which arises during the first two years shall be regarded after the lapse of that period as a subject of claim, no matter how long the insured (?) person may live. Neither the Government actuaries nor any members of their craft possess the means to gauge and allow for the effect of such provisions as these, and in common justice to those from whom premiums have been exacted they ought to be eliminated. In regard to women it may be taken that the initial assets and liabilities under the scheme are of equal value on two essential conditions—the first, that no board and lodging exemptions will relieve the claims; and the second, that all the women who go out of insurance on marriage and survive to become widowed before the age of seventy will return as contributors and potential claimants. It is patent, however, that many of those who thus fall out on marriage and survive their husbands will never return as "employed" widows within the meaning of the Bill (which excludes casual workers). There is ground consequently for revision of the estimates and for consideration of the hard case of the married women who are as truly employed in the cares of home and family as those who go out to work, and with infinitely more value to the State.

Considerations of space forbid prolonged inquiry into the case of employed children; but the provision by which £800,000 a year is extracted, partly from the pockets of boys and girls under sixteen years of age and partly from their employers, cries aloud for review. Are there not other and more direct means of checking child-labour than of taxing the slender earnings of these young people? If the tax must be laid upon them, can its proceeds be applied to no better purpose than that of making good the deficiencies of their seniors? It is true that a sort of promise of special consideration eventually is made to these young people by the Bill; but if the task of separate treatment is too great to be undertaken at the outset, it is not likely to be any easier later on.

Altogether the financial side of the Bill gives much occasion for anxiety, and, with every desire to recognise the earnest work that has been put into it, the conviction persists that much remains to be done before Parliament will be justified in giving to it statutory effect.

THE ART OF WALKING

The Foot-path Way. An Anthology for Walkers. With an Introduction by HILAIRE BELLOC. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)

WE remember, one summer day in Cornwall—in a part of that wonderful county, we may say, where there are no hotels, no boarding-houses, no posters, and no motors—being tempted to stray from the honeysuckle and wild strawberries of a deep, dim lane by a glimpse of a narrow, overgrown ravine, where apparently no foot ever trod, and certainly no wheeled object (not even a farmer's cart) ever passed. Pushing aside the brambles, breasting the dense greenery which seemed to resent our intrusion into the virgin way, we discovered a sight which none but he who walks could ever see. Massed against the sky-line, springing like a vivid flame of colour from the darkness of twined stems and twisted tendrils below, towered a crowd of fox-gloves thick with bloom. We looked up at them—for each tapering, swaying spire was taller than a man—and drew breath more quickly for the sudden glory of it, bewildered with the shock of unexpected beauty. And not even the thrill of the blue sea-line which we found at the other end of that adventurous journey, or the plashing of the green, translucent water in the arches and caves and crevices of the rocky bay close by, could make us forget the great good that in the silence of that untrodden way had crept into our hearts.

Such things come to those who scorn the wheel and leave the highroad to see the world, as chance may lead them, from the finest view-point of all—the height of a man's eyes. Let the wheel, the engine, the railway take you to the country if you will; use them as a magic carpet or as the seven-league boots; but, then, having been borne to the Land of Desire, discard them. Treat them as though they never had been; get off the road, try the secret, alluring byways; get lost and never mind. Then shall you know the joy of walking.

For you, in that case, has this little book been prepared. To read it is to be placed in kinship with those great minds to whom knapsack and stick and the fine winds of heaven mean more than dining-saloon and hotel. R. L. Stevenson is here, of course, with his discourse upon "Walking Tours," and his questionable dictum that "to be properly enjoyed, a walking tour should be gone upon alone." Walt Whitman is here, "afoot and light-hearted," asking nothing but to be "strong and content" that he may travel the open road—and we may be sure, despite the large embrace of his verse, that he would explore plenty of the narrow by-paths. Leslie Stephen's delightful essay "In Praise of Walking" is here, full of his love for the mountain-lands; and, as might be expected, we read again Hazlitt's irresistible chat "On Going a Journey." Other papers have been collected from the works of George Borrow, Sir Walter Scott, Charles Dickens, Izaak Walton, to mention a few; and by no means least in charm is Mr. Belloc's introductory dissertation. His analysis of the mere physical action of walking—its extraordinary complexity so unconsciously carried through—is clever, amusing, and true. A man desires to proceed to a distant point. "Instead of going on all fours, where equilibrium would indeed be stable, what does he do?"—

He deliberately lifts one of his supports off the ground, and sends his equilibrium to the devil; at the same time he leans a little forward so as to make himself fall towards the object he desires to attain. You do not know that he does this, but that is because you are a man, and your ignorance of it is like the ignorance in which so many really healthy people stand to religion, or the ignorance of a child who thinks his family established for ever in comfort, wealth, and security. What you really do, man, when you want to get to that distant place (and let this be a parable of all adventure and of all desire) is to take an enormous risk, the risk of coming down bang and breaking something; you lift one foot off the ground, and, as though that were not enough, you deliberately throw your centre of gravity forward so that you begin to fall. That is the first act of the comedy.

"When you are walking," says Mr. Belloc, "the machine is always going, and every sense in you is doing what it should with the right emphasis and in due discipline to make a perfect record of all that is about." And he proceeds to enlarge, in the happy manner of many memorable pages of the "Path to Rome," upon the delights of approaching a little town by road. This is in itself a sufficient recommendation; in fact, this discussion "On Walking" is worthy to be read with the classic essayists on the same theme.

We are inclined to grumble that certain favourite pages are omitted—one or two beloved passages from George Meredith's pen, for example, we would fain have seen included. Chapter vii. of "Harry Richmond" is a pæan of the open air. "I lifted my face to the sky," says Harry, waking from his sleep in the tent; "it was just sunrise, beautiful; bits of long and curling cloud brushed any way close on the blue, and rosy and white, deliciously cool; the grass was all grey, our dell in shadow, and the tops of the trees burning, a few birds twittering." All through that chapter we have the true spirit of the walker, the vision of the passed villages, the sound of bells, the little experiences of the road, exhilarating and pleasure-giving. But such protestant mutterings must ever be the lot of even the most judicious compiler of anthologies. He can, perhaps, please everybody, but he can by no means satisfy everybody without running into a hundred volumes. Many readers will recognise a lengthy selection on "Walking, and the Wild," by Thoreau, with delight. If we are to judge from his writings, Thoreau ought to have been a veritable Apostle of Walking—or rather, perhaps, of sauntering; the "successful saunterer," having no particular home, is equally at home everywhere. Ambulator nascitur, non fit. "It requires a direct dispensation from Heaven," said the sage of Concord, "to become a walker," and averred that he could not stay in his chamber for a single day without acquiring some rust. These are the true walkers, who must get their limbs swinging to the march, who must continually be refreshed by the incense of the fragrant open air, for whom a room is a prison.

Size and cost control inspiration, and in its form, at its modest price, "The Foot-path Way" is a capital little book, pleasant, companionable, worthy to be possessed by all who love a tramp through fields and hills and dales. Englishmen, if they are the right sort, are walkers par excellence. Mountains inspire them, difficulties incite them, wind and rain are things to be defied. But if the gales blow too strongly, and the rain becomes too cold and pitiless, and shelter be found imperative, their travels can be made at leisure, in the armchair way, with a book so sympathetic as this anthology.

THE LAUREATE'S PROGRESS

The Autobiography of Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate, 1835-1910. (Macmillan. Two Vols. 24s. net.)

AN autobiography of Mr. Alfred Austin must be a far easier thing to write than a biography of the same distinguished gentleman. In case this statement may seem to border on the oracular, we will urge in our defence that the subject of either enterprise is the possessor of so pellucid a personality that the onlooker is fain to rest his eyes in a momentary, though metaphorical, obscurity. Next, assuming a bolder attitude, we will assert that our dictum is not without a meaning, and will endeavour to explain what that meaning is. A biographer endowed with the smallest shred of critical acumen could hardly have failed to grasp the chief notes of Mr. Austin's character—namely, simplicity and sincerity, but he might have been somewhat dépisté by the analysis of his achievements. For the Poet Laureate is a man of many capacities, and—if we may be allowed a slightly irreverent quotation—"they clash, my lord, they clash." Though we should pile irrelevance on irrelevance, the temptation to continue our citation from a writer whose loss is still a wound is so irresistible that we will do so—"This is what it is to have two capacities. Let us be thankful we are persons of no capacity whatever." There are so many keys in the trousseau of Mr. Austin's activity that the uninitiated biographer might have had some difficulty in selecting the master-key. If this metaphor is a little strange, we will try to cap it presently from the work we are considering. The autobiographer has this great advantage over a hypothetical biographer, for the former has no doubts as to his primary capacity, his real mission and vocation. He knows that he was sent into the world to be a poet, to carry the flame a stage further in the torch-race, and he regards his other interests and talents—journalism, travel, politics, dainty prose-writing, and so forth—as merely subsidiary to this high mission. The other things are useful but secondary; they form part of the outfit of the complete poet.

If we read Mr. Austin right, he would accept an amendment of the poeta nascitur dictum, annulling its disjunctive character. In fact, we should suppose that his recipe for a poet would contain three parts of "fit" to one of the essential nascitur. Let us take, for instance, the following typical reflection on politics, the occasion being further invitations to stand for Parliament, after two experiences of forlorn hopes:—

My experiences at Taunton and Dewsbury had contributed to my knowledge and understanding of political life and the national character, and therefore aided one's education on "things in general," in my opinion more advantageous to poets than a life exclusively given over to retirement. But the time dedicated by them to such instruction should be of limited duration, and not interfere with the main and greater purpose of their days.

Travel is more generally recognised than politics as a friend of the Muses, but even here Mr. Austin appears to see things from a peculiar angle. He looks back on himself climbing the lower slopes of Parnassus, and wonders at his own failure to explore the future, knowing in his maturer wisdom almost the precise time and place where each one of his poetical progeny was engendered. On an early visit to Rome, for instance—

I was not conscious of the education, alike in literature and life, I was passing through. . . . I little knew that "The Human Tragedy," not to come fully and finally to the birth till more than ten years later, was already germinating, and was waiting only for the simultaneous occurrence of the mighty European events between the years 1866 and 1871 and the much-needed expansion of my own mind.

There is a suggestion of Greek drama in this poetical autobiography. And there is a suggestion of the physical culture school in the constant feeling of the creative muscles.

Mr. Austin has occasion in one place to speak of Jean Jacques Rousseau, and he does so with some severity, contrasting him unfavourably with the virile Byron. Curiously enough, during our perusal of the Autobiography we have found ourselves thinking more than once of Rousseau. We suppose that the association is due less to a comparison of two minds than to a similarity in their methods. The ancient and the modern autobiographer are alike fond of formulating traits in their own minds and characters. But in the case of the present work we feel sometimes as though the artist, tired of posing before the mirror, is filling in details from a lay figure, modelled from average humanity. Thus he attributes his intimacy with the late Lord Salisbury to this circumstance, among others, that "my concern in politics was for the welfare of the State, not my personal advantage." To inveigh against interested politicians is rather vieux jeu, and we should be sorry to believe that patriotism was as rare as this explanation implies. We feel uncomfortable, too, in reading of the author's "excessive sensitiveness and self-respect," even in its context, when he is speaking of his difficulties as war-correspondent, and "sprightly levity" has an odd sound in self-criticism. All these things jar probably on an insular nerve, but in revenge the following episode seems to shock some more universal feeling. It is merely an inn-keeper's lovely daughter entrevue, and then snatched from the poet's gaze; our disappointment was as great as his, till we found that the morning brought its compensation; but we might have been spared the phrase "that excusable love of what is beautiful."

It will be seen that Mr. Austin is after all very English, in the fullest Great-Exhibition-of-1851 sense of the word. Nowhere is this more evident than in connection with religious questions. Brought up in the strictest atmosphere of Roman Catholicism, he eventually comes to write of his former beliefs from the most approved Protestant-Anglican outside point of view. Nor can it be seen in the present volumes when the crisis of this development occurred. In this connection we may mention that this work contains reprints of some admirable newspaper articles, not only on the Ecumenical Council of 1869-70, but also on the Franco-Prussian War. The charm of this journalism lies, we think, in the quality that the writer claims for himself at the beginning of the Autobiography—genuine spontaneity. This applies equally to the whole book. Affectation is a fault that is conspicuously absent. The blemishes, if such they may be called, of the style are always due to carelessness, and in no way retard the progress or impair the pleasure of the reader. We find ourselves mildly wondering why the author was threatened with prosecution for "the suppression of indecent opinions," or how at St. Cloud, after the Siege of Paris, the church was the only building to remain "unroofed and unblackened." A metaphor that rather mystifies us was born on a similar occasion:—"Here, if ever, was ocular demonstration that omelettes cannot be made without the breaking of eggs; but when the egg happens to be the nest-egg, oh! it is sad indeed." But none of these things do any real harm, and we for our part have got very little egg-shell into our mouth.

Mr. Austin's personal and political relations form a particularly interesting chapter of his life. His distinguished services to the Conservative party have brought him into touch with most of the statesmen of a generation. Disraeli, Lord Salisbury, and Mr. Chamberlain are among those of whom he has new things to tell us. He finds in Disraeli almost his ideal of Conservative statesmanship; his own views are very frankly and uncompromisingly anti-democratic. Of Lord Salisbury he reports some excellent mots; we may select the following from a letter of 1886:—"Then Bismarck is somewhat in the position of Richard III. at Bosworth—not only the ghost of France, but of Austria and Denmark and Bavaria pass through his troubled dreams, and wish him disaster." Bismarck and Tennyson are two other acquaintances of whom we learn something. We are impressed by the number of prophecies of Mr. Austin that seem to have come true; they are almost too numerous. And anyhow, where the future is concerned, we prefer, with one of Meredith's characters, "the sage-femme to the prophet," and the Poet Laureate has done enough in the former capacity to deserve the thanks of all who have gathered under the same standard.

POT-POURRI

Memoirs and Memories. By MRS. C. W. EARLE. With Portraits. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

PERHAPS it is too much to expect that the present volume of family history should closely resemble "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden." We read "Memoirs and Memories" with an anticipation of this kind, and were most pleased with the book when the profuse and sometimes tiresome letters of other people failed to appear, and Mrs. Earle came herself to the rescue with that humorous charm that won her success when the first of the three "Pot-Pourri" volumes was published. She writes, in a note at the commencement of the present work: "I offer my best thanks to my friend Miss Ethel Case, who with untiring patience and zeal helped me through the tiresome labours of compiling this book." That these labours were sometimes a little tiresome is occasionally obvious. When, however, we turn to the portrait and read the affectionate message from a grandmother to her grandchildren we understand. It is dedicated to those grandchildren. They will appreciate all the information concerning the Villiers and Liddell families, and be grateful to a grandmother who has set in their midst a pot-pourri fragrant with memories of the past. And we, too, are grateful; but not so much for the numerous letters from relatives and friends as for Mrs. Earle's own observations, her humour, her love of books.

Some of the best letters in this volume come from Henry Taylor. Here is one written to Mrs. Earle's mother, and was his playful way of suggesting that Grove Mill did not suit her:—

I will tell you a story. Last summer Professor Owen and his wife were sitting at breakfast in their cottage in Richmond Park with the window open and a jar of honey on the table. A wasp flew in at the window and settled on the honey and stuck fast in it. The Professor and his wife, with infinite pains, disentangled the wasp from the honey, washed it and cleaned it and let it go. The next morning they were again seated at the same table at breakfast with the same jar of honey. A wasp flew in, settled on the honey, stuck fast in it, was disentangled, washed and cleaned, and dismissed as before. A third and fourth morning and the same thing happened. Then the Professor said to the wasp, "My friend, I should like to know whether you are that identical slave of the honey-pot whom I have already three times over rescued from a glutinous grave; and now having rescued you a fourth time I will snip a bit out of the corner of your wing that I may know you again." The fifth morning a wasp flew in, stuck fast, was disentangled, washed and cleaned, and on inspection he was found to be a wasp with a piece snipped out of the corner of his wing. "Go," said the Professor, "one thing is clear—that you are not one of those fools whom experience is said to teach."

In the chapter devoted to Mrs. Earle's girlhood she gives us, in that old, pleasant way of hers, a Dublin playbill of 1793. It is too good to leave unquoted in full:—

DUBLIN THEATRE ROYAL.

LAST NIGHT BUT ONE.

On Saturday, May the 14th, 1793, will be performed by command of several influential people in this learned metropolis,

THE TRAGEDY OF HAMLET!

Originally written and composed by the celebrated Dan Hayes, of Limerick, and inserted in Shakespeare's works.

Hamlet by Mr. Kearnes (his first appearance in that character), who between the Acts will perform several solos on the patent Bagpipe which plays two tunes at the same time.

Ophelia by Mrs. Prior, who will introduce several favourite airs in character; particularly "The Lass of Richmond Hill" and "We'll all be happy together" from the Rev. Mr. Dibbin's oddities.

The parts of the King and Queen, by the direction of the Rev. Father O'Callagan, will be omitted as too immoral for any stage.

Polonius, the comical politician, by a young gentleman, being his first appearance in public.

The characters to be dressed in Roman shapes.

The value of the tickets, as usual, will be taken, if required, in candles, bacon, soap, butter, cheese, &c. &c.

No persons whatever will be admitted into the boxes without shoes and stockings

Still describing her girlhood days, Mrs. Earle tells us that on one occasion she and others of a young and gay company were chaffing about the old saying, "Monday for health, Tuesday for wealth, Wednesday the best day of all; Thursday for losses, Friday for crosses, Saturday no luck at all." Mrs. Earle writes:—"I foolishly, silly little thing that I was, turned to Lady Waldegrave and said, 'Which day were you married?' meaning, of course, to Mr. Harcourt. She answered 'Oh! my dear, I have been married nearly every day in the week.'"

Mrs. Earle writes thus of her marriage:—"I behaved very badly, and cried oceans." We are not given, nor should we desire it, an intimate sketch of her married life. Mrs. Earle felt herself eminently suited to be a poor man's wife. During the early years of their married life her husband was not only poor but ill too. However, as time went on his health considerably improved, and after getting along somehow on a very small income they were left a considerable fortune. They gradually got to know such distinguished people as Burne-Jones, George Eliot, Lewes, Huxley, and Oscar Wilde. Mrs. Earle thus describes one of the "rather formidable entertainments" held at St. John's Wood, where George Eliot lived:—"The guests sat round in a semicircle, with George Eliot in the middle with her back to the window, and talked. One day Lewes took me into his library to show me her manuscripts, all beautifully bound, and he said with pride, 'I have them all except "Scenes from Clerical Life," and that the publisher retained.' They were written without a single erasure, in a very small, neat handwriting, and Lewes told me that her method with her work was to think out a chapter and then write it straight off, and no corrections were necessary."

Mrs. Earle's remark when she saw Niagara for the first time was, "Oh, it's so beautiful, I think I shall cry!" Her companion replied, "Please don't, I think there is enough water here already." Apropos the same subject Mrs. Earle tells the following story:—

A man who lived all his life close to Niagara, with its wonderful roar always in his ears, came across Southey's poem called "The Cataract of Lodore," which is a very clever example of how the sound of falling water and rushing stream can be reproduced by words. The poem made such an impression on this man that he resolved to save up money till he had enough to bring him over to England. He then journeyed to Westmorland, and was told the way to Lodore; walking along tired out, at last he sat on a large stone by the wayside, and asked a passer-by where were the Falls of Lodore. The man answered, "Why, you's sitting on 'um."

We should like to linger over Mrs. Earle's remarks concerning certain books and their writers, but must refrain from indulging in so congenial a task. We must, however, give an account of how "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden" came to be written. It happened thus: "My foreign friend came to stay with us in our new London house in Cadogan Gardens, and, as she was furnishing a country house near Frankfort, I began telling her all I knew both as regards furnishing and gardening. She naturally got rather bewildered, and said, "Oh, I shall never remember all you tell me; if you would write it down, I should be grateful to you." It was written down, and, as the reading world knows, published in book form. We cannot agree with Messrs. Hatchard's terse comment: "I don't call it a literary success, but a social success." We believe it had the good fortune to be both. Mrs. Earle writes: "I always feel as I walk about that my end will be a motor-car or bicycle in the small of my back." We sincerely hope that so charming a writer does not at the same time possess the gift of prophecy. We hope, moreover, that "Memoirs and Memories" will not be her last book, and that she may, even in her advanced age, gratify her many admirers with yet another volume, with yet another pot-pourri, the recipe of which lies hidden in her facile pen.

THE WOODLAND COUNTY

Memorials of Old Surrey. Edited by the REV. J. CHARLES COX, LL.D., F.S.A. Illustrated. (George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.)

MESSRS. ALLEN are publishing memorials of the counties of England, and this book is a noteworthy addition to the series. Its contents are best gathered from the titles of the articles forming the memorials. "Historic Surrey," by H. E. Malden, M.A., begins with the palæolithic and neolithic ages, and brings the history down to later times, and is an exhaustive résumé of the subject. Mr. Malden has already written several books on Surrey, and his article is therefore doubly valuable. Mr. George Clinch, F.S.A., contributes the next article, a little overlapping that by Mr. Malden, on "Surrey Before the Norman Conquest." It is illustrated by other very good drawings of bronze buckles and antiquities found at various times in the county. The editor is responsible for articles on the "Forests of Surrey," and shows that Surrey is one of the best wooded counties in England, having a total area, according to the latest statistics, of no less than 58,576 acres. There is no doubt that this large average of woodland gives much of the charm to the county, and may its woodlands long continue! "Memorial Brasses in the County," by Mr. F. R. Fairbank, M.D., F.S.A., tells us, among much other interesting information, that although Surrey cannot boast of so magnificent a collection of brasses as its neighbours—Sussex and Kent—it possesses at Stoke d'Abernon, the home of the Vincents, the oldest brass in the United Kingdom. Very excellent drawings add interest to this article. "Roods, Screens, and Lofts in Surrey" form the subject of the next paper, and Mr. Aymer Vallance, M.A., F.S.A., illustrates his article by some charming sketches, to which is added an alphabetical list of Surrey villages containing examples.

"The Royal Residences of Surrey" are dealt with in a charming paper by Mr. J. Tavenor-Perry:—

Every dynasty of Monarchs in turn have made their homes in buildings which they have raised or embellished in Sarrey. From the Saxon Kings to the last Sovereign of the House of Hanover, not a few of them have been intimately associated with their Surrey residences. . . . Before the Tower of London was dreamt of, and when Windsor Castle was at most but an earthwork, Kennington Palace was already the home of the Danish Kings, and its manor is still the heritage of the Prince of Wales.

A description of "The Fortunes of Lambeth Palace," by S. W. Kershaw, M.A., F.S.A., appropriately follows, as the palace surely comes very near to being a Royal residence.

"The Wall Paintings in Surrey Churches," contributed by Mr. Philip M. Johnston, F.S.A., and beautifully illustrated, is extremely interesting. The author tells us that Surrey and Sussex together contain more ancient wall paintings than any other half-dozen counties in England, and that the Chaldon painting of the former county and the wonderful series at Hardham, in the latter one, are for age and singularity unrivalled in this country. There is a very detailed description of the Chaldon picture. The illustration on page 211 of a wall-painting at Pyrford almost suggests the attitude of a modern golf-player. Stoke d'Abernion again figures in this article.

"The Foundation of the Abbey of Bermoudsey" is described by Mr. F. R. Fairbank, M.D., F.S.A., who tells us that the Cluniac monks came into England soon after the Norman Conquest, and amongst their earliest settlements were those of Lewes and Bermoudsey. This article is linked with one by the Editor on the "Religious Houses of Surrey," particularly the Abbeys of Chertsey and Waverley, and apparently is condensed from a longer article in the "Victoria County History of Surrey," by the same author. "The Post-Reformation Foundations in Surrey" follows, and is another link in the subject treated in the two previous articles.

The final article, on "Fanny Burney's Association with Surrey," is by F. W. Kershaw, M.A. The writer suggests that her connection with the county somewhat recalls the associations of Jane Austen with Hampshire, George Eliot with Derbyshire, and Miss Mitford with Berkshire. It is very gossip and interesting. Before this concluding article is one entitled "The Story of the Hindhead Gibbet," by Dr. Cox, and we protest against the inclusion in "Memorials of Old Surrey" of such a sordid tale as this. Murders on the Portsmouth Road of drunken or unfortunate sailors were extremely common, and the only reason why the narrative of this particular murder has been perpetuated is because a stone was put up at Hindhead by some gentleman to his own honour and glory, inasmuch as the sailor who was murdered was unknown. It is not worthy, to our minds, of being included in a book treating of the true memorials of the county.

The contributors to the volume are past masters of their subjects, and the result is a well-written and well-illustrated work which deserves a welcome place amongst county histories, especially in the library of every Surrey county gentleman.

SONGS OF ERIN

Ancient Irish Poetry. By DR. KUNO MEYER. (Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE student of the Irish language is still frequently met by the objection, "But what is the use of learning Irish? There is no Irish literature." It is largely owing to the labours of such men as Dr. Sigerson and Dr. Meyer that, as the latter says in the preface to this book of translations, "the fact is becoming recognised in ever wider circles that the vernacular literature of ancient Ireland is the most primitive and original among the literatures of Western Europe."

The poems translated by Dr. Meyer are interesting, not merely as reflecting the views and emotions of a primitive people, but for their intrinsic value as literature. They have, in places, a poignant simplicity which, paradoxically, is only attained by a conscious and highly developed sense of literary art. In the "Song of Summer," for instance, after such descriptive verses as

The corncrake, a strenuous bard, discourses,
The lofty cold waterfall sings
A welcome to the warm pool—
The talk of the rushes has come.

we get this vivid human touch—

A wild longing is on you to race horses.

Dr. Meyer arranges his translations under various headings—Myth and Saga, Religious Poetry, Songs of Nature, &c. A few have already been translated by Dr. Sigerson in "Bards of the Gael and Gall;" but for the most part the poems will be new to the reader. Of the different groups, that comprising the Songs of Nature is, perhaps, the finest. In Irish poetry, both ancient and modern, the love of wild Nature is almost a "possession." In the fine "King and Hermit" it is as though the writer could not weary of enumerating all the beauties of the free forest life. The same quality is noticeable in the four descriptive songs of the seasons with their Japanese-like delicacy of touch, and in what has been called the first song of exile, "Colum Cille's Greeting to Ireland."

But the different phases of human feeling are not neglected. There is a naïve and delightful intimacy in the confession of a writer of the tenth century who laments the flightiness of his thoughts during the singing of the Psalms; "as slippery as an eel's tail they glide out of my grasp," he complains. Real pathos distinguishes "The Deserted Home," where a man sees in a blackbird's nest destroyed by cowherds the symbol of his own deserted hearth. The most striking of these "human" poems is "The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare" for her departed youth. It bears a strong resemblance to Villon's "La Belle Héaulmière," written five hundred years later, but the old Irish poet has avoided the frank coarseness of the Frenchman:—

I had my day with kings,
Drinking mead and wine:
To-day I drink whey-water
Among shrivelled old bags.

"The Tryst after Death," with its fine opening and concluding stanzas, contains a curious and minute description of a jewelled draught-board bequeathed by the dead warrior to his lady.

Dr. Meyer has been well advised in giving his versions in prose; an attempt to reproduce the intricacies of the old Irish verse is apt to result in a confusion of the sense and a certain loss of charm. Lovers of genuine literature in any form should be grateful to Dr. Meyer for such a fascinating glimpse into a treasure-house which we are glad to think is still very far from being exhausted.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Elements of Indian Taxation, Elements of the Theory of Taxation, with Special Reference to Indian Conditions.
By LEONARD ALSTON, Litt.D. (Macmillan and Co. 2s. net.)

THE subject of Indian taxation is apt to assume greater prominence when the Indian Budget is under consideration, as it invariably is during the early part of the year. From the statements received it appears that the only fiscal change proposed is a reduction of the tobacco import duty, in order to remove hardships of the country industry. Last year taxation was imposed to meet an anticipated fall in the opium revenue; but opium has shown an increase of nearly three millions sterling in 1910-11, which cannot be expected to recur. The increase has therefore been treated as a windfall, and distributed equitably and profitably. The lay mind cannot help being struck with the uncertainty of the Government's income. The Indian opium revenue is doomed to early extinction, and, unless the normal growth of income is accelerated, other taxation may be required to replace it. What form will such taxation assume? This is the practical question. Dr. Alston's little book, which he has worked up from official publications, aims at clarifying, for the student of the subject, the principles of taxation generally, with special reference to India. No objection can be offered to his enunciation of principles; his statements are easily understood, and he writes as an expert. Free Trade has hitherto been accepted as best for India; but it is more than probable that attempts will be made to reverse the policy. It cannot be too firmly laid down and insisted upon that what is suited to England is not necessarily right for India. For example, Dr. Alston's tables show some remarkable differences. In England, Customs produce nearly 24, Excise 25, Income-tax 23, Land-tax 5 per cent. of the total revenue. In India, Customs yield 9, Excise 12, Income-tax nearly 3, and Land Revenue 38 per cent. of the receipts. Such comparisons are useful as indicating the impossibility of reconciling different systems. Dr. Alston fully explains the alleged "economic drain" on India, on which false charges against British rule are so often based. His work is a condensed multum in parvo, and should be widely read and carefully studied.

Civil War. A Play in Four Acts. By ASHLEY DUKES. (Stephen Swift. 2s. net.)

CHARACTERISATION rather than strength of plot is the outstanding point of this very interesting little study of social differences. It is true that there is not much in the way of fine shades attempted; the chief persons whom the author puts before us are of such extremely contrasting types that they act as foils to each other without much effort at subtlety being necessary. Sir John Latimer, tall, dignified, absorbed in his own life and work, wealthy and tolerably contented, is rudely shaken when he finds that his son Michael has become "entangled" with the daughter of James Shannon, head of a Communist colony settled near at hand. It had been Sir John's intention that Michael should assist him in his life-work of interpreting "The Meaning of Civilisation," and, as he was an aristocrat of the old school, trouble was certain to follow when Michael showed signs of rebellion. The play concerns itself with the outcome of this love of Michael's, and the conflict between ideals diametrically opposed is cleverly suggested, the uncouth, embittered nature of Shannon being especially well drawn. "Civil War" was produced by the Stage Society in June, 1910, and is shortly to be seen, we understand, at one of the newer repertory theatres. It should have a successful run, for it deals with vital matters in a reasonable and restrained style. It is a great pity that pages 113 to 128 are repeated, in the copy under review, through careless binding.

The Great Solemnity of the Coronation of a King and Queen. With Notes by DOUGLAS MACLEANE, M.A., and an Introduction by the LORD BISHOP OF SALISBURY. (George Allen and Co., Ltd. 5s. net.)

"FORMS which grow round a substance will be true and good," wrote Carlyle; "forms which are consciously put round a substance bad." To elucidate and make interesting to the ordinary man the solemn formalities of the Coronation this book has been published. The Coronation Service can be traced back for eleven centuries, and Dr. Macleane, with many liturgical, historical, and descriptive notes, explains its value and its beauty, going into full detail with regard to the Regalia, the Oath, and the Vestments, and giving a categorical account of the Coronation of King Edward VII. The whole book is most interesting, and should be treasured by all who wish to realise the true significance of the ceremony which is made the occasion for so great an outflow of national rejoicing.

The Church of the Knights Templars in London. A Description of the Fabric and its Contents, with a Short History of the Order. By GEORGE WORLEY. Illustrated. (G. Bell and Sons. 1s. 6d. net.)

Notes on the Temple Organ. By the late EDMUND MACRORY, Q.C. Illustrated. Third Edition. By M. MUIR MACKENZIE. (G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

VISITORS to the Temple Church could not take with them a better little guide-book than the first of these small volumes. It will tell them practically everything that is known concerning the ancient edifice and its contents. The book deals very fully with the vexed question of the recumbent effigies, and contains a useful Appendix upon the Temple organ.

The last-mentioned topic is dealt with at greater length in the second of the two volumes here noticed. Edmund Macrory's well-known notes are capably edited by Mr. Muir Mackenzie, whose footnotes are very welcome. An Appendix contributed by Mr. F. Rothwell, who carried out the recent reconstruction of the organ, deals in detail with the stops made by Father Smith, the original maker of the famous instrument.

FICTION

Winding Paths. By GERTRUDE PAGE. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

MRS. GERTRUDE PAGE has evidently a deep admiration for her principal heroine, Hal Pritchard, but we think she rather over-estimates that lady's perfections. One gets rather tired of being told what an exceedingly wideawake and broad-minded person she is, and the suave impertinence with which she points out to her stiff-necked brother the paths of reason and sense arouses a strong desire to administer the snub vigorously. To be quite frank Hal is an unlikeable person, and we wonder at the fascination she appears to exercise upon those whom she meets. Sir Edwin Crathie, a Cabinet Minister of the "unscrupulous type" beloved of lady novelists, finds her impudence charming, and, as his own manners are those of a rather ill-bred and forward schoolboy, they get along very well together. Nor apparently does a long series of silly gibes make Aylmer Hermon, the golden-haired giant, like her the less; in the end he finds it in him to fall in love with her, after a preliminary adventure with Lorraine Wilson, a lady who is supposed to be a great actress, but only succeeds, as far as the reader is concerned, in being a great nonentity. In short, Mrs. Page's numerous characters are not very valuable acquaintances, and her scenes of "free-lance" life in London are distinctly dull. Our authoress is an experienced and facile writer, who is certainly not careless or unworkmanlike; she is quite up-to-date and even mildly topical, but we do not see that her book can make any one much wiser or more charitable than one was before.

People of Popham. By MRS. GEORGE WEMYSS. (Constable. 6s.)

WE had best admit at once that Mrs. George Wemyss has no particular story to tell. There are in her book no big scenes, no "set pieces," nothing for which the reader braces himself, no climax and no anti-climax. Characters jump up and bow, utter a few droll words, and vanish in an echo of laughter. Persons of more importance, who have dominated many chapters, are moved aside without a word of apology, perhaps to enter again later, perhaps to appear no more. The scenes are laid in a village, of which so little is told us in the formal descriptive way that we do not now know whether it stands on a hill or in a hollow. Enough that we remember a high street, a shop or two, some charming houses, a manor and a place in which to picnic. We visit them all, and always in good company—such wise, witty, and cheerful company as is the eternal justification of the novel. There is not a person in the book whom we should not like to know; and although it is impossible to mention many, the cream of the society is perhaps to be found in Jane, the maid, Lady Victoria and Poppy, Mrs. Durnford, the Howard children and Miss Dorinda, whose shopping excursion to London supplies some of the funniest pages we have ever read. "People of Popham" is a book that only a woman could have written, and only a kindly and humorous woman at that. If the reader will allow his or her memory to select the books of which the same thing may be said, he or she will at once see powerful reasons for procuring the present volume.

Justus Wise. By A. WILSON-BARRETT. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

PROBABLY every reader of fiction occasionally likes a slight diversion from the usual style of book the principal features of which, in the ordinary way, centre round the love affairs of several people. If so, very good fare is provided for them in Mr. A. Wilson-Barrett's latest romance, "Justus Wise." Mr. Justus Wise is, as he himself informs us, a "Confidential Agent, patronised by Royalty and the nobility," and also at the beginning of the very first chapter absolutely at his wits' ends to know how he is to continue to rent the offices he is occupying, as no clients come his way. One morning, however, when lighting the fire in the inner office, a body is discovered up the chimney, and on being pulled down proves to be that of a middle-aged man who apparently has been dead but a few days. Following immediately upon this discovery, a client appears, and thence all sorts of mysteries present themselves. The Confidential Agent is kept busy investigating, hunting people down, and racing round the town in motor-cars. Adventure follows adventure until in the end everything is made clear, right rewarded, and wrong punished. The interest in the story is well sustained, and, although mysteries deepen and plots thicken, the reader is steered clearly through them all, and has no reason to be bored if his tastes run in the direction of stirring detective stories.

The White Owl. By KATE HORN. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

It is quite evident that Miss Horn has very little sympathy with London and those people who are compelled by fashion to inhabit that city during the "season," for in "The White Owl," as in other of her books, our author sends her heroine into the sweet, pure air of the country—this time in order to regain the health she had lost whilst doing her duty in her aunt's house in town. In spite of the fact that there is no originality in the plot, this wholesome tale of love, intrigue, and rural life moves along in a very interesting and amusing manner. There are no dull pages in the book, while Mrs. Parfrement, a worthy farmer's wife who chaperons the invalid to Sicily, causes many a pleasant smile. All ends happily, and there is the necessity for the ringing of many wedding-bells, and not only for the young people, for Miss Horn has a pretty knack of occasionally uniting those who have spent many years of their life in loneliness whilst waiting for the one who was to be so dear to them. We look forward to more stories from the same pen told in a similar bright and healthy manner.

THE SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL

"THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR" was the play chosen for presentation at His Majesty's Theatre on Monday last. Sir Herbert Tree has staged this play before, and it is well known that Falstaff is one of his favourite parts. On Monday he acted the amorous knight even better than on previous occasions, and his performance delighted a crowded audience. Sir Herbert was extraordinarily well supported by a very strong caste. Miss Ellen Terry and Miss Violet Vanbrugh were quite excellent as Mistress Page and Mistress Ford respectively. Miss Viva Birkett was a charming Anne Page—delightful to look upon. Mr. Arthur Bouchier as Master Ford was entitled to unstinted praise in a character of secondary importance. Two admirable character-studies were those of Mr. Walter Creighton as Master Slender and Mr. Edward Sass as Bardolf. Mr. Creighton was quite as good in his presentation of Master Slender as he was in that of the Prince of Aragon in the "Merchant of Venice," which is high praise. Bardolf, as acted by Mr. Sass, was a clever performance. It promoted sympathy to watch his unctuous appreciation as Falstaff quaffed the sack, coupled with his keen apprehension that never a drop would fall to his share. We must not omit a word of praise to Mr. Henry Hewett as Nym, Mr. O'Neill as Pistol, and Mr. Leon Lion as Simple. The play, compared with some of Shakespeare's masterpieces, is perhaps a trifle, but it is extremely entertaining, and as staged and acted at His Majesty's will, we think, attract to itself a full meed of public appreciation.

"THE PARISIENNE" AT THE ROYALTY

To praise the actors and to regret the play is apparently the only way out of the difficulty confronting us after witnessing Madame Yavorska's production of "The Parisienne"—the difficulty of criticising French satire in English guise, and of mitigating our disappointment. We cannot think that Madame Yavorska has been well advised in reviving for London this twenty-year-old comedy of Henri Becque. Despite her charm, her wonderfully expressive gestures, her skilful presentation of subtle, fleeting moods, and (last, but not least!) her exquisite dresses, the whole thing roused little enthusiasm, left unpleasant afterthoughts, and only showed once more what has been proved a dozen times—that French stage humour, with its predilection for inversions and perversions of the relationships of husband and wife, nearly always fits badly in its English costume. True, Becque's play has its moments of keen irony, of real comedy, of pretty trifling; also of sheer farce—as when Clotilde tantalises Lafont with the letter behind her husband's back, holding it provokingly just beyond his reach; but we question the value of it and the wisdom of staging it here. And it was fairly obvious that the hearty calls at the end of each Act were due, not to the appeal of the play, but to the excellence of those who interpreted.

Madame Yavorska as the inconsequent and rather wicked Clotilde, who seemed to have two hearts—one for her husband, Du Mesnil, and one for her lover—had a part which brought out the lighter side of an art that we have seen more seriously expounded in her Ibsen season, a part, however, upon which we are sorry she should waste her fine talents. She was imperious, pleading, defiant, persuasive, sorrowful, provocative by turns; her dresses drew whispered comments, we dare assert, from every woman present; her scenes with the two men were excellently stage-managed. But her success was obviously one of personality triumphing over difficulties, and we venture to say that with almost any English actress in the character the play would have fallen flat. Lafont, the lover, was energetically taken by Mr. Charles Bryant—a shade too energetically at times, perhaps, but on the whole well; Mr. F. Kinsey Peile was irresistible as Du Mesnil; the smaller part of Baron Simpson, to whom Clotilde turns in her husband's financial embarrassment, received sympathetic treatment at the hands of Mr. Eric Maturin; and to Miss Aimée de Burgh as Adèle, the maid, due meed of praise must be given.

"The Parisienne" was preceded by a piece described as "A Classical Farce in One Act," by Mr. W. L. Courtney, with which Mr. Charles Bryant, Mr. Eric Maturin, Miss de Burgh, and Miss Frances Welstead (as a "Voice") did the best they could. "Pericles and Aspasia" may be intended as a light skit on modern London, and is possibly meant to be humorous; but the introduction of cigarettes, a typewriter, a telephone, electric light—the mention of a motor-car, the week's washing, the cook who has left—the exploitation of modern slang, such as "josses," "pal," "johnny," "deuced pretty girl"—the allusion to Socrates as "Socky," and to Euripides as the author of "Damn and Super-damn"—all these, depending for their effect on contrast with the ancient Greek atmosphere, make rather sorry fooling for grown-up people. Surely Mr. W. L. Courtney is capable of better things than "Pericles and Aspasia"! In a farce, be it classical or not, we expect a few hearty laughs. As a matter of fact we could only show our appreciation now and then by a somewhat wry smile, although in justice to all concerned we must put on record that certain ripples of silvery laughter broke continuously from the back of the house, and flowed graciously over the bewildered occupants of the stalls.

THE COURT THEATRE

THE IRISH PLAYERS

It was at least adventurous, and adventure has always its fascinations in a work-weary world. The Irish Players are inevitably associated in the mind with the things that tend to simplicity: with remote villages that have not lost the glory of life, the wonder and habit of humour, and the richness of musical speech. With Lady Gregory this simplicity is simply broad and rustic, with none of the self-conscious meanings that the words "broad" and "rustic" have come to wear in our midst; with Synge it was a half-brackish instinct that thrust past externals to the inwardness of souls; with Yeats it was touched with phantasy or sublimated to a poetry of dreams and essences; with T. C. Murray in "Birthright" it has become fierce, dark, and primal, and even when Mr. Lennox Robinson in "Harvest" desired to be sceptic, he had to be sceptic at the expense of this self-same simplicity. It was simple throughout, with a simplicity that sprang from the genuine founts of inspiration, avoiding the bucolic on the one hand and the mime and meretrix on the other.

Against such a background, then, what shall be said to the Gorgeous Exotic? Yet it was this that they chose to open their concluding week with. A warning note was struck in the fact that on entering the theatre one's nostrils were assailed with the heavy odour of incense; yet even so the mind was ill-prepared for what was to follow in the head-piece of the evening, "King Argimenes," by Lord Dunsany. On the programme the period was advertised as "A long time ago," and therefore we presume, since Time was dismissed, Space also was dismissed with equal scorn, and the country depicted was situate nowhere and sprang nowhence.

Now this is admirable. It has always been our conviction that drama (as distinguished from the novel) is ideal; and that therefore the Greeks, in seeking to pronounce the unities of space and time, were vaguely and imperfectly seeking to express this ideal nature of drama. But in ideal conditions all things are ideal; attire, for instance, is becomingly ideal, simple, and unobtrusive. In no ideal conditions would an ideal character wear a conical hat of almost three feet high in a flaming orange hue. Perhaps, indeed, in ideal conditions a king would have four wives (an apt selection of many more doubtless), but we are very sure that he would never berig them in such extraordinary garbs. He himself, King Darniak, who held King Argimenes as a slave over whom he gloated, was very strongly Assyrian; there were in his make-up marked resemblances to Asshur-bani-apli, especially about the artificial hirsute adornments, though we are very sure, judging from his effete deportment, that he had nothing of the fire and energy of that distinguished warrior. But his wives resembled nothing on earth. All ages and all arts combined to make them bizarre and fantastic, in the aforesaid orange hat disappearing into darkness, and other strange apparel. We are very sure Sara Allgood, Kathleen O'Brien, Maire O'Neill and Maire Nic Shiubhlaigh, in their wildest nightmares, have never thought to be clothed in this wise.

This was the centre-note of the play. Play, however, it could hardly be called; being rather a fantastic production that threw his Majesty's into the shade. Fourteen different characters figure in the persons of the plays, which is a goodly assembly in the productions of the Irish players; yet among all these there is only one who has any part to fill at all, and that is King Argimenes, he striding through his unopposed way in a manner unexampled on earth. He, be it said, is a slave; and the first scene discovers him at "The Dinner Hour on the Slave-fields of King Darniak," conversing earnestly, as he digs, with Zarb, "a slave born of slaves," but in no way different, for all that, from the other slaves of King Darniak. He converses of his misfortunes, does King Argimenes, and digs; and when he has conversed sufficiently and dug sufficiently, he finds an opportune sword of ancient shape and outline, which fills him with lust of conquest, and duly impresses Zarb, the slave born of slaves. Intermittently the while the guard passes by, to whom he has to give an unflattering obeisance. At last he strikes off his own fetters (with such surpassing ease that we wonder that the idea never before came to him) and goes off single-handed to slay all the King's guard, while Zarb remains behind to gather together the other slaves. They too seem to have as little difficulty in striking off their fetters; and they seem, moreover, to have been left in a strangely unguarded condition.

At this moment a most unfelicitous thing occurred. While the slaves are describing King Argimenes' victory to us a curtain is drawn across for a change of scene. Through the joint of the curtain Zarb peers, and continues to describe the glorious and single-handed victory. But it was difficult to hear him; for the noise of scene-shifters swelled through the air. It certainly was not provocative of becoming gravity to have Zarb's account of King Argimenes' prowess intermingled with the voice of the foreman of scene-shifters in urgent instructions to his men, and his men in noisy delivery of their burdens on the boarded stage. When the next scene is shown King Darniak and his gorgeous wives and his sumptuous and fantastic court are discovered. When they go off to sup, King Argimenes rushes in with his slaves and hews Darniak's god to pieces. Finally, too, Darniak is slain ("off-stage"), and Argimenes is victor, while we are left to wonder if Lord Dunsany really only intended to sketch out a brief outline for the purpose of permitting Mr. Nugent Monck to lay waste his phantasy in the strange largesse of exotic production.

With almost a shock of reality there succeeded to this Synge's "Well of the Saints." If "Riders to the Sea" be his purest and "The Playboy" his most beautiful achievement, "The Well of the Saints" is certainly his greatest work. The conception of Martin Doul and Mary Doul cured of blindness by a passing saint with his wondrously gathered holy water, and waking each to discover the other old and ugly, whereas they had been led to imagine themselves the beauties of the countryside, waking, too, not to the delight of the visible world, but to toil, and penury thrice penurious, is very characteristic of Synge's mordant vision of life. Incidentally it threw a sidelight on the ruin the company have made of "The Playboy" by playing it as farce. For while one is not less characteristic of the author's mind than the other, "The Well of the Saints" is less malleable in its production than "The Playboy." The result was that, in spite of an obvious eagerness on the part of the audience for an occasion for tittering, scarcely a laugh broke the course of the play. Synge had the rare faculty of mixing his laughter with such bitterness of tears that mirth, while ever present, has rarely an opportunity of moving through to the noise of lips. It is kept always pensive and thoughtful.

In this play more than any other one is brought continuously against the firm edge of the uncannily shrewd thought running through all Synge's works, a shrewdness so typical of his nation's psychology. It is so, for instance, when Timmy the Smith complains to Martin Doul, whom he has compelled to work hard for him, that now he and his wife, Mary, have recovered their sight they have set "every person in this place, and up beyond to Rathvanna, talking of nothing, and thinking of nothing, but the way they do be looking in the face." It comes out quietly in the gentle hints that are given that, though Martin and Mary have separated owing to their discovered ugliness in each other, Mary will be for ever taking useless errands that should lead her daily within sight of Martin. So in the concluding Act, when Martin mocks at the strange solace Mary had found, they both blind again, but with the added discovery of their ugliness, Mary strikes to the centre of him, saying "You were saying all times you'd a great ear for hearing the lies in a word. A great ear, God help you, and you think you're using it now." Sara Allgood and Arthur Sinclair, as was to be expected, played Mary and Martin Doul, with Maire O'Neill as Molly Bryne and Sidney Morgan as Timmy the Smith.

In the concluding programme of the visit there were given Mr. Yeats' familiar "Kathleen Ni Houlihan" and Mr. Murray's "Birthright"—a meeting of the old and the new in very deed. The something strangely unsatisfactory in "Kathleen Ni Houlihan" was satisfactorily smoothed out of the way by the dream movements of the acting. It was good to see Miss Maire Nic Shiubhlaigh back in her old part of Delia Cahel. The more we see of "Birthright" the more we are convinced that it is a very fine and noteworthy achievement. The acting of the four central figures has a coherence and balance rare to discover in the theatre; and the acting of that really fine actress Miss Eileen O'Doherty, in the concluding movement, is one of the supremest things in the whole season, only to be eclipsed, in fact, by Miss Sara Allgood in the "Riders to the Sea." Among the new plays given this year, in writing and in acting, the crown of the achievement must undeniably go to "Birthright."

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR—III.

By FRANK HARRIS

WE had spent so many hours in the Church of Brou that we were compelled to hurry if we wished to reach Dijon that night, and so we took the most direct road over Louhans and Auxonne instead of the main road, which passes through Chalons, Chagny, and Beaune. For we both knew it would be dark long before we reached Beaune, and once there, we should not be able to go on without seeing the famous Hôtel Dieu, or Hospital, with the lady nurses in the quaint costumes of the fifteenth century—white in summer and blue in winter. (How beautiful this French name for a hospital, "God's Inn.")

Besides, I longed to see the famous Primitive picture in fifteen panels of "The Last Judgment," by Roger van der Weyden, and the great Flemish tapestries of the fifteenth century, and the Aubusson of the sixteenth. There is wonderful Gobelin tapestry, too, to be seen at Beaune, and wooden galleries, two storeys high and three hundred years old, to say nothing of the Church of Notre Dame, which dates from 1330, and possesses tapestries of the fifteenth century which tell the story of the Virgin in many colours.

Clearly we should have to stop at Beaune if we came near it, and so we fled temptation, as Beaune lies on the direct road, and can easily be visited another time; and now we want to spend some hours in Dijon in the morning, and go out of our way to Vezelay and yet sleep in Paris that night, which means doing something more than 250 miles—a long drive even for a powerful car.

How rich is this noble country of France in works of art and historical associations! Every few miles we are pulled hither and thither by our desire just to see this or that masterpiece! Italy alone is perhaps richer in works of the Renaissance, but every epoch in France has had its own art and its own master-workmen, and the result is incomparably richer and more interesting than can be found in any other country.

And of all the cities of France, except Paris, Dijon is the one in which you can best study the succeeding epochs of a nation's art.

The sun was darting the last level rays in our eyes as we took the north road from Bourg with over one hundred miles still to do before sleeping in Dijon. The road was almost perfect, as only a French road is: no caniveaux and only one level-crossing; and so we pushed the accelerator home and called on the machine to do its best. In a little over two hours we lifted the lights of Dijon on our left, and soon slipped through the streets to our hotel, noticing only that the brave Mercedes was not even warm.

It is difficult to know where to begin to write about Dijon, for its art wealth is so extraordinary that one feels inclined to say it must be visited to be even imagined. The old town itself is a jewel-casket. It was the capital of the Dukes of Burgundy for just three centuries—from 1179 till the death of Charles the Reckless in 1477. For these three hundred years Dijon was as politically important as Paris itself, and this period covers the best of Gothic architecture and art, and reaches into the full bloom of the Renaissance. For this time, at least, Dijon seems to me the most interesting city in the world, more interesting even than Florence, for the art of Florence is derivative. It is all tinged with classic tradition and fashioned on classic models, whereas the art of Dijon is all pure Flemish, has come to birth by native impulse, and has the full savour of the race.

First of all let us just glance at the architecture. When Dijon, which had always been Catholic, surrendered to Henry IV. in 1595, after the famous victory of Fontaine-Française, the great fighter and lover called it the "city of beautiful spires," and the praise is justified. Though Dijon has not a single church to compare with that of Chartres or of Amiens, its Cathedral, which was once the Abbey Church of Saint-Bénigne, is really interesting in spite of the fact that it belongs to no single style or time. It is not even a true Gothic Cathedral at all: the foundations of it are so old that it follows the plan of the last Roman-Byzantine churches. On this foundation an old Gothic church was erected, most of which disappeared or was pulled down to make place for the new church of 1280; the finest parts of this, too, were destroyed in the Revolution. I prefer the smaller church of St. Michel, which is almost pure sixteenth century. This church also suffered greatly in the Terror, but there are very interesting things in it, notably the great doors and the base of the statue of St. Michel, where you find not only Jesus and the Magdalene, but Venus, too, and Hercules, with the bulls of Geryon—the frank paganism of the Renaissance. The finest church in Dijon is beyond question the church of Notre Dame. It was commenced in 1178 and finished about one hundred years later. It still remains the masterpiece of the Burgundian School. But, alas! the façade of it was defaced by the sans-culottes, who didn't like any images except their own, and, worse still, it was restored towards the end of the nineteenth century according to the plans of Viollet-le-Duc.

But if there were no churches at all, Dijon would still be visited for its house-architecture. Street after street takes one into the remote past. Here is an echauguette of the early seventeenth century; there the house of the Cariatides, with carved wooden figures supporting the front of the second and third floors; a gorgeous well in the courtyard of the Tribunal of Commerce belongs to the same time; while the portal of the Hotel Vogüé and a tower at the angle of the Hotel des Berbis are both wonders of the best period of the Renaissance. I know no town that in so small a space reminds one so often of past centuries and calls up historic events with such magic of suggestion.

The art-centre of the town, however, is to be sought in the old Palace of the Dukes of Burgundy, which is now at once the hotel de ville, the museum, and the post-office. The old Palace was begun in 1364 and finished in 1468. Of this building the tower is still standing, and the body of the building, which contains the famous Salle des Gardes and the great kitchen. The old well in the courtyard belongs to the same century.

But before describing these, let me get done with less important treasures. The picture-gallery is very interesting in its way, with fifty pictures which deserve study. There is a portrait of a woman by Clouet, and the head of a laughing child by Franz Hals, which are simply unforgettable. In another room the best Henner I've ever seen and three Teniers, and a splendid landscape by Ruysdael; to say nothing of a dozen canvases by Greuze and Chardin and Nattier which would be worth noticing in any company.

But the Burgundy school is famous for its sculpture and not for its paintings. And there are certain examples even of modern work which must not be passed over. Rude was a native of Dijon, and all his best things are here, notably a Hebe exquisite in girlish slimness, a thousand times more individual and therefore more attractive than the vaunted Henner.

A terra-cotta bust of Napoleon, by Houdon, struck me more than anything, partly, of course, because it is one of the few contemporary busts, but more because of its own surpassing quality. Houdon is known to Englishmen chiefly by the marvellous seated statue of Voltaire in the Comédie Française, the face a wonder of realistic presentment: the mocking soul of the man seems to have formed his every feature, so that it is a mask of grinning sarcasm. This head of Napoleon is at the other pole of art, and shows the sculptor's width of range. It is, of course, beautiful, though perhaps the nose is a little too large for perfect symmetry. The wonder of the head is its enigmatic, mysterious expression; the power and pride of the regard. This, one feels, is the head of the man who even after defeat conquered twenty millions of people without needing to strike a blow.

I make no apology for telling here a story of Napoleon which has always affected me greatly. It seems to me one of the most characteristic stories of the greatest man of action since Cæsar, and it will probably therefore be of interest to men for centuries to come. At the beginning of his career Napoleon was sent to take the command of the army in Italy. He had to pass through Lyons, which was held by General Augereau, who had already given proof of his talent for war, besides showing remarkable force of character and desperate courage. Augereau prepared to meet the young Corsican who had already made himself talked about and was now sent from Paris, and put above him, a senior officer, by the law-makers. He surrounded himself with his staff, saying to them: "You shall see how I'll receive this young man; he won't impose on me, I promise you. I'm not afraid of him."

When the doors were thrown open, and Napoleon entered hurriedly, Augereau remained insolently seated. Napoleon took in the position at a glance. Stopping short, he folded his arms and fixed his eyes on the general. In spite of himself, Augereau rose to his feet and bowed. With head thrown back and a curt nod Napoleon communicated his wishes, disdaining further notice of Augereau's poor attempt at bluff.

The story seems to me worthy to stand with the finest things told of Cæsar, with Plutarch's account of how he disposed of Metellus at the Treasury: "Young man, it would be as easy for me to kill you as to tell you to stand aside," and of how he lorded it over the pirates, and this other story which I've read somewhere, though I have forgotten where. As a young man Cæsar owed more money than any one else ever owed in Rome, millions and millions of sesterces. When he crossed the Rubicon a Roman rode up to him, saying:

"That must have been an anxious moment even for you, Cæsar."

"Not for me," replied Cæsar, smiling, "but, perhaps, for my creditors."

The tale is very modern and ironic; characteristic, too, of Cæsar's aristocratic contempt for money. There are a dozen instances of Napoleon's comprehension of the value of money which are just as characteristic of his poverty-stricken upbringing.

This bust of him by Houdon is the only head I have ever seen which gives me the sense of power that must have been in Napoleon Bonaparte.

THE STORY OF A BOOK

IV.—FAME

It was some little time before the public, the mysterious section of the public that reads works of fiction, discovered that the Publisher, aided by the normal good-humour of the critics, had persuaded them to sacrifice some of their scant hours of intellectual recreation on a work of portentous dulness. Then—for the literary audience has its sense of humour—they amused themselves for a while by recommending the book to their friends, and the sales crept steadily up to four thousand, and there stayed with an unmistakable air of finality. If the book had had any real literary merit its life would have started at that point, for the weary comments of reviewers and the strident outcries of publishers tend to obscure rather than reveal the permanent value of a book. But six months after publication "The Improbable Marquis" was completely forgotten, save by the second-hand booksellers, who found themselves embarrassed with a number of books for which no one seemed anxious to pay sixpence, in spite of the striking heliotrope binding. The Publisher, who was aware of this circumstance, offered the Author five hundred copies at cost price, and the Author bought them, and sent them to public libraries, without examining the motive for his action too closely. There were moments when he regarded the success of his book with suspicion. He would have preferred the praise that had greeted it to have been less violent and more clearly defined. Of all the criticisms, the only one that lingered in his mind was the curt comment, "The author had nothing to say, and he has said it." He thought it was unfair, but he had remembered it. At the same time, in examining his own character he could not find that masterfulness that seemed to him necessary in a great man. But for the most part he was content to accept his new honours with a placid satisfaction and to smile genially upon a world that was eager to credit him with qualities that possibly he did not possess.

For if his book was no longer read his fame as an author seemed to be established on a rock. Society, with a larger S than that which he had hitherto adorned, was delighted to find after two notable failures that genius could still be presentable, and the Author was rather more than that. He was rich, he had that air of the distinguished army officer which falls so easily to those who occupy the pleasant position of sleeping partner in the City, and he had just the right shade of amused modesty with which to meet inquiries as to his literary intentions. In a word, he was an Author of whom any country—even France, that prolific parent of presentable authors—would have been proud. Even his wife, who had thought it an excellent joke that her husband should have written a book, had to take him seriously as an author when she found that their social position was steadily improving. With feminine tact she gave him a fountain-pen on his birthday, from which he was meant to conclude that she believed in his mission as an artist.

Meanwhile, with the world at his feet, the Author spent an appreciable part of his time in visiting the second-hand bookshops and buying copies of his book absurdly cheap. He carried these waifs home and stored them in an attic secretly, for he would have found it hard to explain his motives to the intellectually childless. In the first flush of authorship he had sent a number of presentation copies of his book to writers whom he admired, and he noticed without bitterness that some of these volumes with their neatly-turned inscriptions were coming back to him through this channel. At all the second-hand bookshops he saw long-haired young men looking over the books without buying them, and he thought these must be authors, but he was too shy to speak to them, though he had a great longing to know other writers. He wanted to ask them questions concerning their methods of work, for he was having trouble with his second book. He had read an article in which the writer said that the great fault of modern fiction was that authors were more concerned to produce good chapters than to produce good books. It seemed to him that in his first book he had only aimed at good sentences, but he knew no one with whom he could discuss such matters.

One day he had found a copy of "The Improbable Marquis" in the Charing Cross-road, and was glancing through it with absent-minded interest, when a voice at his elbow said: "I shouldn't buy that if I were you, Sir. It's no good!" He looked up and saw a wild young man, with bright eyes and an untidy black beard. "But it's mine; I wrote it," cried the Author. The young man stared at him in dismay. "I'm sorry; I didn't know," he blurted out, and faded away into the crowd. The Author gazed after him wistfully, regretting that he had not had presence of mind enough to ask him to lunch. Perhaps the young man could have told him how he ought to write his second book.

For somehow or other, at the very moment when his literary position seemed most secure in the eyes of his wife and his friends, the Author had lost all confidence in his own powers. He shut himself up in his study every night, and was supposed by an admiring and almost timorous household to be producing masterpieces, when in reality he was conducting a series of barren skirmishes between the critical and the creative elements of his nature. He would write a chapter or two in a fine fury of composition, and then would read what he had written with intense disgust. He felt that his second book ought to be better than his first, and he doubted whether he would even be able to write anything half so good. In his hour of disillusionment he recalled the anonymous critic who had treated "The Improbable Marquis" with such scant respect, and he wrote to him asking him to expand his judgment. He was prepared to be wounded by the answer, but the form it took surprised him. In reply to his temperate and courteous letter the critic sent a postcard bearing only five short words—"Why did you write it?"

This was bad manners, but the Author was sensible enough to see that it might be good criticism, especially as he found some difficulty in answering the question. Why had he written a book? Not for money, or for fame, or to express a personality of which he saw no reason to be proud. All his friends had said that he ought to write a novel, and he had thought that he could write a better one than the average. But he had to admit that such motives seemed to him insufficient. There was, perhaps, some mysterious force that drove men to create works of art, and the critic had seen that his book had lacked this necessary impulse. In the light of this new theory the Author was roused by a sense of injustice. He felt that it should be possible for any one to write a good book if they took sufficient pains, and he set himself to work again with a savage and unproductive energy.

It seemed to him that in spite of his effort to bear in mind that the whole should be greater than any part, his chapters broke up into sentences and his sentences into forlorn and ungregarious words. When he looked to his first book for comfort he found the same horrid phenomenon taking place in its familiar pages. Sometimes when he was disheartened by his fruitless efforts he slipped out into the streets, fixing his attention on concrete objects to rest his tired mind. But he could not help noticing that London had discovered the secret which made his intellectual life a torment. The streets were more than a mere assemblage of houses, London herself was more than a tangled skein of streets, and overhead heaven was more than a meeting-place of individual stars. What was this secret that made words into a book, houses into cities, and restless and measureable stars into an unchanging and immeasurable universe?

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

MUSIC

PROVIDENCE in her wisdom appears to have decided that it is not good for any country to enjoy an uninterrupted succession of great men in art. We must not be greedy, she seems to say, and expect to have everything at once. If we are granted great men of science, for example, or heaven-sent statesmen, we are not to think it strange if no artists in the grand style, whether painters or musicians, or poets in prose and verse are vouchsafed to us at the same time. It is true that we of Great Britain have no reason to complain of an illiberal Providence in regard to the bestowal of painters and poets. When we contemplate the offspring of our British Muses, we can say as complacently as Lady Bertram did to Fanny Price on the occasion of Crawford's proposal, "Humph! we certainly are a handsome family." But when we look up our roll of musicians in the grand style there is much less reason for satisfaction, and we may be driven to console ourselves with the doctrine that it is not good for us to have everything at once. Critics may assure us that had it not been for Handel, who diverted the stream of musical inspiration from the proper course, the river, whose upper waters knew such gods as Byrd and Tallis, Purcell and Gibbons would now have become a flood worthy to be mentioned in any book of geography with the mighty German rivers themselves. Their explanation, however, accept it as eagerly as we will, is but a cold comfort. The doctrine of the law of compensation is more flattering to our pride. We really should have been too much favoured a nation had we been given Beethovens as well as Shakespeares, and Mozarts as well as Turners, to say nothing of our Newtons and George Stephensons.

We have been led to indulge in these salutary reflections it having recently been our privilege to lend a sympathetic ear to the lament of some distinguished American cousins over the musical unfruitfulness of their magnificent country. "Emerson is not our only great philosopher in prose," they truly declare; "Sargent and Whistler are not our only great painters; and as for inventions, what does the world not owe to us! But why have we no composers? We are young, and cannot, of course, pretend to look back and find a Purcell, but there can be no reason why we should not have at least an Elgar or a Max Reger!" We did our best to soothe the pained hearts of our friends, and shortly afterwards went with feelings of unusual interest and expectation to an orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, there to hear a programme of pieces by Mr. Henry Hadley, an American composer of whose gifts and success we hoped to be able to give an extremely encouraging account to his compatriots. How much we wish it were in our power to say that in Mr. Hadley America has at last got her Elgar. The English composer (who may now sit in the Temple of Merit between Thomas Hardy and Lord Morley) certainly has something of his very own to say, and language of his very own to say it in. We may not hold that the thoughts he expresses so well are very deep or likely to be abiding, but they are his own, and there are not, we believe, two opinions as to the grace and lucid ease with which he can express them. But we could not discern any markedly personal thought or any peculiar felicity of language in Mr. Hadley's music. There was nothing in it to offend; there were frequent elegances of orchestral device; there was sometimes a bright heartiness of spirit, very pleasant to note in these days when Music, like Virtue in the novel of "Vanity Fair," according to Lord Rosebery, is too apt to "sit gloomily in a garb of whitey-brown."

We were allowed to hear a symphony which bears the title of "North, East, South and West." That the spirit of the North should be conveyed to us by a movement allegro energico, with a grave prelude and epilogue, may be all very proper, though our acquaintance with the Eastern States of America is insufficient to teach us why they should utter so plaintive a wail andante dolorosamente. One must have a slow movement, no doubt, in a symphony, but it need not be dolorous. The middle section of this movement in dance rhythm, and adorned with "barbaric colour," seemed strange to us amid its surroundings till we remembered that America is a country of surprises. "Darky" tunes and "rag-time" syncopation provide material for the allegretto giocoso, and who shall complain if Mr. Hadley thinks he may follow where Dvorák led the way? But we should like to utter a gentle protest against the notion that America should seek to found a national school of music upon its negro melodies, as older countries have evolved their music out of their folk-songs. Negro tunes are not American tunes any more than are the Indian tunes upon which, we believe, certain musical professors wish to build, in rivalry with those who declare for the "darky" foundation. Perhaps Mr. Hadley sees salvation in the use of both these founts of melodic inspiration, for in his last movement, "The West," he treats us both to an Indian tune and an Indian drum. His rhapsody "The Culprit Fay" has nothing distinctively American about it. Clever enough in its rather obvious way, it might have been written years ago by Sir Frederick Cowen, or to-day by many a young scholar of our College and Academy. The tone-poem "Salome" showed Mr. Hadley's talent at its best, and this we should like to hear again.

On the succeeding evening it was Britain's turn to show what she could produce in the way of composers. That brilliant being Miss (or ought we to write "Dr.") Ethel Smyth conducted a programme of her own music, some of it being music which is coming to be well known. Miss Smyth's strains are much more thrilling than Mr. Hadley's. What vigour, what impetuosity, what a sense of the picturesque do we not find in them! Here is a burning soul, consumed, as it seems, with desire to let its light and heat warm up the cold world. Nor can one deny that Miss Smyth is thoroughly equipped. She can clothe these surging thoughts of hers in a language that is personal and vivid, and she narrowly escapes writing music that is great. We confess to some impatience with Providence for not having granted to Miss Smyth the power to write great music. She ought to be the Charlotte Brontë of music; sometimes in the "Wreckers" and "Der Wald" she almost persuades us that she is, or is going to be, but at the end we are not convinced as we should wish to be. Does Miss Smyth, we are tempted to ask, write too impatiently? does she put down her thoughts just as they come? is the musician in her stronger than the artist? has she really not got complete control over her language and the form of it? Much as we admire most of her music, we feel that there is something wanting to make it magnificent, though it has many elements of magnificence. We could only partially judge of her new Henri de Requier songs, which a French writer has found so exquisite. Mrs. Swinton did not sing them well, and their accompaniment was too heavy. The chief popular success of the concert was the rather sensuous "Benedictus" from the Mass in D. It is quite pretty, but, compared with the composer's later work, it sounded old-fashioned and second-rate. But Mme. Blanche Marchesi and her pupils sang it so fervently that that portion of the audience which, to use Thackeray's words, "find second-rate poetry pleasanter than your great thundering epics " insisted on its being repeated.

As we write, the news comes that the famous conductor Mottl is dead, and we mourn very sincerely the loss of such a man. It was natural that he should be a first-rate conductor of Wagner, but we own that our gratitude to him is chiefly owing to his splendid work for, and devotion to, Mozart. Those performances in the little Court Theatre of Munich will ever be one of the most cherished of the writer's memories. Richard Strauss is finely in sympathy with Mozart's operas, and conducts them with great power. But Mottl seemed to get nearer to the heart of Mozart than any one else.

THE LOST THINGS

By HILAIRE BELLOC

I NEVER remember an historian yet, nor a topographer either, who could tell me, or even pretend to explain by a theory, how it was that certain things of the past utterly and entirely disappear.

It is a commonplace that everything is subject to decay, and a commonplace which the false philosophy of our time is too apt to forget. Did we remember that commonplace we should be a little more humble in our guesswork, especially where it concerns pre-history; and we should not make so readily certain where the civilisation of Europe began, nor limit its immense antiquity. But though it is a commonplace, and a true one, that all human work is subject to decay, there seems to be an inexplicable caprice in the method and choice of decay.

Consider what a body of written matter there must have been to instruct and maintain the technical excellence of Roman work. What a mass of books on engineering and on ship-building and on road-making; what quantities of tables and ready-reckoners, all that civilisation must have produced and depended upon. Time has preserved much verse, and not only the best by any means, more prose, particularly the theological prose of the end of the Roman time. The technical stuff, which must, in the nature of things, have been indefinitely larger in amount, has (save in one or two instances and allusions) gone.

Consider, again, all that mass of seven hundred years which was called Carthage. It was not only seven hundred years of immense wealth, of oligarchic government, of a vast population, and of what so often goes with commerce and oligarchy—civil and internal peace. A few stones to prove the magnitude of its municipal work, a few ornaments, a few graves—all the rest is absolutely gone. A few days' marches away there is an example I have quoted so often elsewhere that I am ashamed of referring to it again, but it does seem to me the most amazing example of historical loss in the world. It is the site of Hippo Regius. Here was St. Augustine's town, one of the greatest and most populous of a Roman province. It was so large that an army of eighty thousand men could not contain it, and even with such a host its siege dragged on for a year. There is not a sign of that great town to-day.

A suburb, well without the walls—to be more accurate, a neighbouring village—carries on the name under the form of Bona, and that is all. A vast, fertile plain of black rich earth, now largely planted with vineyards, stands where Hippo stood. How can the stones have gone? How can it have been worth while to cart away the marble columns? Why are there no broken statues on such a ground, and no relics of the gods?

Nay, the wells are stopped up from which the people drank, and the lining of the wells is not to be discovered in the earth, and the foundations of the walls, and even the ornaments of the people and their coins, all these have been spirited away.

Then there are the roads. Consider that great road which reached from Amiens to the main port of Gaul, the Portus Itius at Boulogne. It is still in use. It was in use throughout the Middle Ages. Up that road the French Army marched to Crécy. It points straight to its goal upon the sea coast. Its whole purpose lay in reaching the goal. For some extraordinary reason, which I have never seen explained or even guessed at, there comes a point as it nears the coast where it suddenly ceases to be.

No sand has blown over it. It runs through no marshes; the land is firm and fertile. Why should that, the most important section of the great road which led northward from Rome, have failed, and have failed so recently, in the history of man? Where this great road crosses streams and might reasonably be lost, at its pontes, its bridges, it has remained, and is of such importance as to have given a name to a whole countryside—Ponthieu. But north of that it is gone.

Nearly every Roman road of Gaul and Britain presents something of the same puzzle in some parts of its course. It will run clear and followable enough, or form a modern highway for mile upon mile, and then not at a marsh where one would expect its disappearance, nor in some desolate place where it might have fallen out of use, but in the neighbourhood of a great city and at the very chief of its purpose, it is gone. It is so with the Stane-street that led up from the garrison of Chichester and linked it with the garrison of London. You can reconstruct it almost to a yard until you reach Epsom Downs. There you find it pointing to London Bridge, and remaining as clear as in any other part of its course: much clearer than in most other sections. But try to follow it on from Epsom Racecourse, and you entirely fail. The soil is the same; the conditions of that soil are excellent for its retention; but a year's work has taught me that there is no reconstructing it save by hypothesis and guesswork from this point to the crossing of the Thames.

What happened to all that mass of local documents whereby we ought to be able to build up the territorial scheme and the landed régime of old France? Much remains, if you will, in the shape of chance charters and family papers. Even in the archives of Paris you can get enough to whet your curiosity. But not even in one narrow district can you obtain enough to reconstruct the whole truth. There is not a scholar in Europe who can tell you exactly how land was owned and held, even, let us say, on the estates of Rheims or by the family of Condé. And men are ready to quarrel as to how many peasants owned and how much of their present ownership was due to the Revolution, evidence has already become so wholly imperfect in that tiny stretch of historical time.

But, after all, perhaps one ought not to wonder too much that material things should thus capriciously vanish. Time, which has secured Timgad so that it looks like an unroofed city of yesterday, has swept and razed Laimboesis. The two towns were neighbours—one was taken and the other left—and there is no sort of reason any man can give for it. Perhaps one ought not too much to wonder, for a greater wonder still is the sudden evaporation and loss of the great movements of the human soul. That what our ancestors passionately believed or passionately disputed should, by their descendants in one generation or in two, become meaningless, absurd, or false—this is the greatest marvel and the greatest tragedy of all.

THE THACKERAY EXHIBITION AT THE CHARTERHOUSE

THIS being the Thackeray Centenary, nothing more adequate could well have been thought of than an exhibition in which a variety of matter could be displayed with Thackeray as its centre of interest. Certainly a visit to the Charterhouse is more than worth while at the moment. There is, for example, to be seen that perennial source of interest to the enthusiast, whether for or against Thackeray, manuscripts in which the evidence of his genius shines clearly and radiantly to the eye of the lover, and in which the eye of the scornful can discover what it will. For in a day of machines and typewriters and dictaphones we are unfortunately losing that intimate acquaintance with human nature and human character that handwriting alone can supply. Not only are there manuscripts, however. There are sketches and drawings, wrought by the same hand which achieved the cadence of sentence, which are doubly graphic, inasmuch as they give us their author's own pictorial conception of his characters. He had sometimes a quite vivid sense of beauty in curve and outline. A chief matter of interest, however, are the various portraits and busts of Thackeray, noteworthy among them being a water-colour copy of an 1835 miniature, which Mr. Pierpont Morgan has had done for this exhibition, and which, we understand, he has presented to Mr. W. J. Williams. In fact a considerable portion of this exhibition, which is more than well worth while a visit, owes its success to the zeal and industry of Mr. Williams.

LITERATURE AND MORALITY

THE relationship of literature and morality has for long been a vexed question which it appears to be wellnigh impossible to settle. The present essay does not profess to solve the problem, but seeks rather to indicate the lines along which clearer thought of the whole matter may be attained.

It will be necessary to indicate somewhat precisely what is included in the term "literature." Professedly didactic works are of course excluded by their very nature. What we are anxious more especially to deal with is that great borderland in which may be found many writings capable of exerting profound moral influence without being directly ethical in aim or intention. In this debatable realm are to be noted the great mass of fiction of which our age is so prolific, with much modern verse, and a good many of the essays that appear in the periodicals of to-day. The principal controversialists in this debate can be roughly divided into two classes—those, on the one hand, who deny all moral function to literature, the school of "l'art pour l'art;" and those, on the other hand, who advocate the novel with a purpose and similar literature. No doubt there are few in England, at any rate, who would take up an extremist position in the first class, though scarcely the same thing could be said of France, where artistic congruity is chiefly aimed at. Of the second class it is to be said that its devotees are not so numerous nor so fervid as they were in the almost oppressively moral period of the mid-Victorian era. Many old-fashioned people who survive from that period must experience pain at the increasingly flippant tone of much modern literature, and must wish that many whose artistic gifts are supreme would spend those gifts on topics less decadent. Many of the writers of to-day seem almost atrophied in their moral sense. What are the causes that underlie this tendency, which may be described as not so much immoral as non-moral?

Chief among them may be placed the growth of the scientific spirit, which aims at that absolute lack of bias so necessary for scientific inquiry. Such a spirit of entire impartiality is doubtless not completely attainable, human nature being what it is. This tendency towards the unbiassed has infected the artistic temperament. No one can read the unimpassioned description of types of character which abound in modern fiction without feeling that to the writer these types are so many specimens for curious inquiry, but that they can never be the objects of either his enthusiasm or his compassion. There is much that is akin to vivisection in the novel of to-day—a certain heartlessness of description and a studied coldness of tone. Who that has read them can forget the glittering cruelties of John Oliver Hobbes' earlier works? Such writers rarely seem to be in love with their characters. There is a curious and icy detachment about their point of view which may be artistic, but is scarcely human. All this seems to be an outgrowth of that scientific spirit which is as far as possible a pure intellectualism and devoid of all emotion. Such an attitude is especially notable in the works of Mr. H. G. Wells, who is, of course, himself a scientist; to him men and women seem chiefly so many curious and beautiful specimens to be patiently observed, accurately described, and carefully classified. Many of the characters in Ibsen's prose dramas seem delineated in this coldly calculating fashion. Where this spirit prevails in a writer, and pervades his work, morality never enters save as a secondary consideration.

Another cause for the non-morality of much modern literature is to be found in the increased sense of artistic congruity and fitness shown by most present-day authors. One reads of Garrick playing Macbeth in Georgian costume and full-bottomed wig, and thrilling his audience even under such unfavourable circumstances. That was a triumph indeed; but it indicates the lack of this sense of artistic fitness which we are now considering. Another illustration might be found in the paintings of the Early Italian Schools, which depicted Scripture events and persons in the circumstances and costumes of contemporary mediævalism. Such conceptions are rendered impossible to-day not only by their artistic incongruity, but also by the growth of the historical sense. The painter of historic subjects is to-day an archæologist as well as an artist; the same thing is also practically true of the writer of historical fiction. We are afraid of perpetrating an anachronism or of blundering in our facts. There must be no discords in the harmony of our narrative. The increase of this spirit is doubtless largely due to the intensely critical atmosphere of our age; and here it may be remarked that a period of criticism like the present rarely produces works of first-rate importance. The masterpieces of literature are produced in periods when the positive and the joyous are in the ascendancy as against the calculating and critical. The sense of the artistically appropriate prevents also the personal views of the author from ever appearing. There is no wedging-in of moral reflections or disquisitions into the story. The utmost we get is a stinging epigram or a neatly turned aphorism. The modern novelist usually tells a plain tale. He has no interest in the moral welfare of his readers. To him it would seem that a question of taste is of far more importance than a matter of ethics. All this is the result, directly or indirectly, of that "art for art's sake" creed to which reference has already been made.

A profoundly modifying influence in modern literature is that which springs from our new knowledge of man's nature through psychology. Before the advent of this knowledge the colours were more distinct, the boundary lines more clearly marked in the inner life of man, and the whole of that life was the subject of an easy dogmatism. The mental faculties were all neatly parcelled-up and labelled. Men believed that intellect and emotion were separable entities, and that the one could be exercised without affecting the other. Reason, passion, judgment, and curiosity were all plainly mapped out in the older mental science; thus the dramatists and novelists of that time created distinct types, each ruled by one or other of these faculties or emotions. But now the boundaries are all down, the distinctions seem almost removed in that inner realm. The colours melt into one another like rainbow hues; instead of a dividing line there is a "fringe" of consciousness, as the psychologist calls it. Most modern photographers do not value chiefly clearness of outline and perfectly defined detail; they strive after "soft" effects and abhor hardness of detail. The differing shades of the picture must melt into one another, not change abruptly. In like manner, with the coming of the psychologist, has our view of the inner world of man's life been changed. Reason cannot be exercised without emotion, nor can emotion hold supreme sway without some modifying influx from reason. The two merge imperceptibly into each other, so that no one can set an absolute boundary to either. This conception of man is infinitely more complex than the older view, and hence it becomes correspondingly harder to chronicle it. The villain of literature to-day is not completely villainous, nor is the hero entirely heroic. Indeed, some modern novels have neither hero nor villain in the old sense of the words, but only persons slightly differentiated from each other by a minute superiority or an infinitesimal evil. The old well-marked types have practically gone. Instead of them we have subtle blendings, delicate gradations of colour—bad characters with admirable traits, good characters with some fatal flaw. No doubt in all this there is a greater regard for the probabilities of actual life, but one longs at times for a clean, straight, plain, outspoken character, without subtlety and without guile. Many of these novelists and writers seem to imagine that because the inner life of man lacks determinateness and definition, so the ethics of life have become a subtly blended mass—a sort of spiritual cloudland, having neither foreground nor horizon. No doubt morals are more complex and interfused than our fathers imagined, but there are certain great regulative facts which must for ever be clearly defined.

It is perhaps well that in these days there seems to be a stronger sense of the homogeneity of life and morals. Novels might conveniently be divided into two great classes, novels of character and novels of action. The perfect novel would, we might suppose, be a perfect blend of these two classes. Character would be convincingly delineated without the novel's becoming purely psychological, and without robbing it of that vitality of action often so sadly lacking in the novel of character. Perhaps it is too much to expect that this ideal will ever be completely achieved, bearing in mind the frailty of our mortality, but there seems to be a distinct move in this direction. Anyhow, in real life action and character are indubitably intertwined, even as life and morals are one in the great complex of human existence. When our novelists can grasp this more fully they may be able to work out their artistic and ethical salvation. We should then be spared the dreary puppets of the novel with a purpose on the one hand and the shadowy personalities of the psychological novel on the other. The moral is always unmistakable in real life for him who has the eye to see it. It would seem that the artistic temperament is often blind to this particular aspect of life. This, indeed, seems to be the snare of the one who pursues after beauty and artistic congruity. Any true presentation of life by one of balanced artistic temperament will point its own moral with sufficient clearness,

THE MAGAZINES

THE most noteworthy feature in the magazines this month must needs be the reply by Mr. Austin Harrison, the editor of the English Review, to Mr. St. Loe Strachey's now famous attack in the Spectator. In our editorial attention has already been drawn to this, and therefore it will not be necessary to devote much space to it. It is necessary to say, however, that the line of defence that Mr. Harrison has seen fit to adopt is one so triumphant that it pours complete ridicule on the initial attack. Perhaps, indeed, a reply was scarcely necessary, for the whole Press rose so unanimously in protest against, not alone against the Spectator's unhappy prudery, but the violent and unseemly terms in which it was conveyed, that this was in itself the best and most effective reply that could have been desired. Having wished to reply, however, Mr. Harrison could not have done so with better dignity than by giving his list of those who have been responsible for the "garbage dumped upon the nation's doorstep." The indiscrimination in the choice of names only abets the dignity; and Mr. Harrison would almost have been wiser not to have appended any words of his own to them.

In the same magazine Miss May Sinclair has a lengthy story entitled "The Intercessor." It is a powerful and extraordinary tale, but, despite its prodigious length from the standpoint of a magazine, it more than justifies its place. There are other tales by Mr. Eden Phillpotts and Mr. Herbert Shaw. In his article "Substance in Poetry" Mr. J. M. Robertson has made considerable progress on his article last month entitled "Form in Poetry." It is nevertheless perplexing to see him irked by the attempt to place the sanction of poetry, as distinguished from the particular manner in which that sanction may be delivered. Partly the reason is, of course, that Mr. Robertson, from his ethical standpoint, is in war against supernatural sanctions. For an illustration of our meaning we may perhaps say that Mr. Robertson's article is not a short one; yet it never once gets to grips with the thing he is after, but cannot see; whereas Shelley in one sentence struck the very centre of the question, and illuminated the whole matter when he said that "Poetry redeems from decay the visitations of the divinity in man." The substance of poetry is in truth divinity, and if, for example, we are fascinated by the macabre, it is because we see there divinity in distortion and revolt, which is what we mean when we speak of diabolic beauty in Beardsley's work. It is strange to note how frequently Mr. Robertson comes near to this without seeing or saying it. Mr. Abinger has an article on "The Police and the Public," which arouses more expectations than it fulfils. Its chief burden seems to be an attempt to allay that public disquiet which he himself aroused in the late Stinie Morrison case; and we wonder why. Mr. Darrell Figgis has an article which he entitles "Falstaff's Nose." Taking his argument from little-known biographical documents, he seeks to disprove Dr. Theobald's famous emendation of Falstaff's dying words. We prefer Mr. Figgis in his more purely critical work. Still, he certainly seems to prove his point.

In the Nineteenth Century there are two exceedingly interesting articles of literary importance. Priority goes to Mr. Herbert Jenkins' identification of the place of William Blake's grave. For ourselves we do not think that the localisation of tombs is any necessary philippic to the study of literature. As we read Mr. Jenkins' article we could not help passing in mental review the sight of the men we saw attending Milton's Tercentenary Celebration, most of whom had probably only managed once or twice to struggle through some fifty lines of "Paradise Lost." The perpetual memory of Blake is in the minds of those who read and love him. But on the lower fields of record there seems very little doubt that Mr. Jenkins has indeed identified the location of Blake's grave in the famous "Nonconformist God's Acre" of Bunhill Fields, Robert Southey's "Campo Santo"! And since our other poets have not wanted good headstones in the place of good love and earnest reading, we hope Blake will not do so. The other article is "Elizabethan Drama in the Making" by Sir Edward Sullivan. Its subject is that strange document, so replete with unhappy indications of its author's character, and yet withal so indispensable to all students of Elizabethan Drama, "Henslow's Diary," in its recent edition under the hand of Walter W. Greg. In one or two points Sir Edward Sullivan makes some perplexing errors; as, for instance, his suggestion that Edward Alleyn retired from acting so as to take "a more active partnership with his father-in-law (Henslowe) in the business of theatre proprietor and stage manager." As a point of fact the Diary itself shows quite clearly that Alleyn was always responsible for the directorship of the company that was first under Lord Derby's patronage, and latterly vowed fealty to the Lord Admiral; and his retirement was probably to his wife's estates in Sussex. Nevertheless it draws attention admirably to a somewhat neglected source of information. In view of the present situation in Morocco, accentuated by Germany's latest move, it is exceedingly interesting to read an article by Sir Harry Johnstone on "France in North Africa." An informative article is by Mr. Arthur Robertson on "The Railways of India;" and Mr. Arthur Herbert discusses "Count de Gobineau's Ethnological Theory," a theory, among many, that seeks to establish racial inequality in terms of colour.

The Fortnightly Review has not much this month of distinctive merit. It has established the habit of being exceptionally topical, and frequently this is achieved at the expense of real interest. Articles, for instance, such as "Diaz: the Maker of Modern Mexico," or "The Investiture of the Prince of Wales," or "New Imperial Burden-Bearers," or even "The Real Barry Lyndon," fail to strike a very quick interest, altogether apart from the fact that they seem very obviously to be journalistic exercises written round certain specified subjects by writers who have nothing particular to say in them, and who worked up their subject for the occasion. Of quite a different character is Mr. Ernest Newman's equally topical article on "Wagner and his Autobiography." As a writer on Wagner's music Mr. Newman is well known; indeed it might be said that his book (though, unhappily, out of print) is the English classic on the subject. Therefore it is all the more interesting to hear him on the Autobiography. Unfortunately it is true that the Autobiography has been to many of us the destruction of a dream. It is good, of course, to know the truth; but is it good to have "Tristan and Isolde" spoilt for us, and by no less a person than its author? In "Acceptances" Mr. Alfred Noyes seeks to say a thing that has our very hearty sympathy, though he often annoys us by his incoherence and petulance. Yet it is admirable, however it be done, to have a man cry a halt to those who expectorate vilely on the holy things of life.

In the Atlantic Monthly the chief article is one by Mr. Havelock Ellis, entitled "The War Against War." Its title explains its scope, and it is characterised by all that well-known writer's perspicuity of thought and style, though we hold ourselves aloof from his assumption that the instinct for war is necessarily unwholesome and undesirable. Ruskin's essay on this subject is, among other things, too apt to be neglected. Mr. Ching-Chun Wang is full of interest in his article on "The Abolition of the Queue."

We have neglected dealing with the Cornhill Magazine

because it is a Thackeray Centenary number, and next week some space will be devoted to the Thackeray Centenary, into which this will adequately fall. Its chief interest is the lately discovered "Cockney Travels," to which fit appendages are found in "Thackeray and his Father's Family," by Mrs. Warne Cornish, and "Sylhet Thackeray," by F. B. Bradley-Birt.

The third number of The Moslem World, a new review, issued quarterly, maintains the high standard of merit with which it commenced. It is published for the Nile Mission Press by the Christian Literary Society for India, established in London. The editor's address is Bahrein, in the Persian Gulf. It is an outcome of the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, and purports to be not a magazine of controversy, much less of compromise. It is avowedly missionary. The editors hope to interpret Islam in all its varied aspects, ancient and modern, and in its deepest needs, ethical and spiritual, to Christians; to point out and press home the true solution of the Moslem problem—namely, the Evangelisation of Moslems; to awaken sympathy, love, and prayer on behalf of the Moslem world. The twelve articles cover a wide field, dealing with Islam in Constantinople, Malaysia (with an excellent map), Morocco, Nigeria, besides literary papers and a survey of recent periodical Literature and Islam. The vitality of Mohammedanism and of missionary efforts is clearly manifested. The review will appeal to all concerned in Mission work and interest many others.

BELIEF AND CONDUCT

"BUT, after all, it doesn't matter what a man believes or doesn't believe; the only thing that's of any consequence is what he does. 'For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;' you know what Pope said."

I suppose we have all heard this sentence, or something very like this sentence. Or, if we have not heard it, it must be because the principle which it expresses is so widely received that the proposition has become a truism; everybody is so sure that it does not matter a pin's head what a man believes that it is no longer necessary to keep on saying so; the phrase would be treated as a sort of "Mr. F.'s Aunt" commonplace, a variant of her great discovery that there are milestones on the Dover-road. In short, unless we are utter reactionaries, in which case what we say is of no consequence, we are all quite sure that beliefs do not matter. We all know how ridiculous the opposite opinion has long been considered; the climax of absurdity is supposed to have been reached in those early Christian disputes which raged round ὁμοιούσιος and ὁμοούσιος: there were once people so silly that they made the question of one diphthong rather than another an affair of importance. This diphthong business, as I say, is supposed to indicate the very depth of bigoted and insane folly; though, by the way, there is only the difference of two letters and a comma between "I did" and "I didn't." And one can imagine very considerable issues, even issues of life and death, hanging upon that trifle in the witness-box and in the judgment-seat of the Old Bailey.

But the doctrine that belief and beliefs are of no consequence has been long regarded as axiomatic; and yet, if we examine it, this dogma, like other dogmas, seems to be a little strange to the natural man, to the unregenerate being who has not been purged of his errors at the founts of Liberal thought, who has not been initiated in the sublime mysteries of Modernism. For, if we accept the "belief of no consequence, action of every consequence" ruling in its entirety, we cannot help inquiring as to what are the sources of action; we are forced by our very nature to ask, "Why does A do this, and B do that?" "Why does Jones go to Marienbad, and Smith to Inverness?" "Why does X smoke cigarettes, and Y a pipe?" When we say that a man does so-and-so we at once lay ourselves open to the question, Why does he do so-and-so? It is not to be avoided. And the answer will have to be that he does this and not that because he believes that this and not that will be the more pleasurable or more beneficial or more righteous. The nature of the reason does not matter to the argument; the point is that there must be a reason. Or if there is a man who acts without any reason, we say that such an one is "irrational:" we put him out of court, we class him somewhere below thistledown and autumn leaves. If a man were asked, "Why did you cut off your horse's head and give it to the pigs?" and answered, "Honestly, I haven't the remotest idea why I performed the act you mention," he would be set down as a madman.

Putting the lunatic asylum on one side, then, every action proceeds from a reason or set of reasons—otherwise beliefs. "I notice you don't speak to A," one man will say to another; "why not?" "Because I believe him to be a treacherous scoundrel, a Papist in disguise, a Mormon missionary." Again the reason does not matter, but there must be some reason, some belief on which the action or avoidance of action is founded. And this being so, how can it possibly be true that what a man believes does not matter? Note that beliefs vary in nature: you may say, "I don't care to associate with the fellow because I saw him cheat at cards, and happen to have read his conviction for a peculiarly detestable crime." There you have a belief founded on logical process. Or your wife may say, "I don't like him because I hate the sight of him;" which is an intuitive process. But in either case there is mental conviction, or belief, as the antecedent to action. You may be right in your belief or wrong in your belief; it may be logical, or super-logical, or infralogical; but belief of some kind or another there must be before you cross the room, or light the fire, or knock a man down; and this being the case, it is surely the height of absurdity to say that while deeds matter, beliefs do not matter. To maintain such a doctrine is equivalent to discharging the man who pulled the trigger without a stain on his character, while you condemn the bullet to be hanged by the neck until it is dead. Clearly, the "beliefs don't matter" doctrine is a declaration that thought is of no consequence; it is an affirmation that the universe, men included, is wholly physical, from which mind and the action of mind is to be excluded. And the odd thing is that this apparent absurdity and falsity is often or always maintained by the disciples of what is called "Free Thought." These people say in effect: "What people think isn't of the faintest consequence, and therefore there is nothing so precious or so necessary as free thought." One may carry the principle all through the scale of things, and maintain analogously that a tiger's savagery is of no consequence, though his teeth and claws are of every consequence; even that cell-formation in a seed is immaterial, the only important things being oaks and daisies.

Theoretically, then, the "truism" of the first paragraph of this article is contradictory nonsense; practically it needs but little skill in history to show its rank absurdity. Torquemada believed that it was his duty to burn heretics, so he burned them; the Puritans believed that it was their duty to hang Quakers, so they hanged them; Robespierre believed that aristocrats and people who differed from him should be guillotined, and consequently he guillotined them. In each of these cases the beliefs of the persons named were very evidently of the greatest importance. And if it be objected that these beliefs were all practical in their nature, and that it is the mere theoretical belief that is insignificant, it is to be answered that it is impossible to draw any such line of distinction; that a position which is apparently pure theory may at any moment resolve itself into hard practice. The French Revolution began with the most abstract and remote theories about Nature and man—resolutions, as it were, in vacuo—and these pale benevolent abstractions soon translated themselves into red scaffolds and red battlefields and action in its acutest forms. Let us say, if we will, that the beliefs of eighteenth-century Deism were right, and the creeds of Catholic Christendom are wrong; there is something, though not very much, to be said for such a position as that. But there is nothing at all to be said for the position that the beliefs of Deists and the creeds of Catholics are of no consequence.

These remarks on an untrue truism have been suggested by a very striking citation in a very striking book: "The Superstition called Socialism," by Mr. G. W. de Tunzelmann.*

The passage quoted is from Mr. Robert Blatchford's "Not Guilty," and runs as follows:—

A tramp has murdered a child on the highway, has robbed her of a few coppers, and has thrown her body into a ditch.

Do you mean to say that tramp could not help doing that? Do you mean to say that he is not to blame? Do you mean to say he is not to be punished?

Yes, I say all those things.

Here, it seems to me, we get to the root of the matter. Is this belief of Mr. Blatchford as to the immunity which, he thinks, ought to be enjoyed by a filthy and murderous scoundrel of no consequence? Let us ask the question of the father and mother of that "child on the highway."

The whole case lies in a nutshell. Mr. Blatchford says that his ruffian should not be punished for his action; presumably Mr. Blatchford, as a practical man, will do his best to get the laws of England altered, so that the tramp may go on his merry way singing—outraging, raping, robbing, murdering as he will, and when he will. And are we to say then that what Mr. Blatchford believes does not matter?

It is a pretty conclusion, is it not, to the liberal thought, to the advanced thought of the past few centuries? It is a fair fruit indeed to be gathered from that freethinking tree that has flourished so long and so bravely. With what specious arguments, with what clear and self-evident reasonings did the apostles of freedom, the enemies of creeds and constraints begin their great mission. We have all heard their brave appeals to trust the people, to believe in human nature, to tear away the veils that priests had woven from our eyes, to look at the world and find it very good. Rabelais said that "do as you please" was the motto by which men might be ruled. Think of all the long and splendid array of arguments: Blessed Reformers, stern Puritans, zealous Whigs, fervent Radicals, red-hot believers in Nature and the Rights of Man, Socialists bubbling over with zeal for poor oppressed humanity; all the host of those who rob Peter to pay Paul, and hope to catch larks if ever the heavens should fall chant to us their great hymn of the race of men liberated from oppression, and going on its sweet and holy way with mirth and gladness. And at the end comes this grand triumphant ergo: the crooked shall be straight and the rough places plain, the wilderness shall blossom like the rose, there shall be pools of water in the dry places, and the wandering tramp shall rape and kill and rob upon the People's Holy Mountain.

We have set out to plant a New Heaven on a New Earth, and we have adumbrated a society from which the most bestial savage would fly in horror.

THE OLYMPIA FLOWER-SHOW, 1911

OLYMPIA and Holland House are as different as chalk from cheese, and at this year's Summer Flower-show one naturally missed the charming surroundings of the latter. However, in our uncertain climate, there is a good deal to be said for holding the show in a place where one can at least keep dry.

It is impossible, having regard to the vastness of the exhibits and the number of exhibitors, to do more than give a few general impressions. Roses, of course, bulked very largely, and were staged in excellent condition. Sweet-peas were also prominent, and received considerable attention. The newer shades of orange and scarlet were especially attractive. Amongst many capital exhibits that of Messrs. Sutton and Sons was greatly admired for its tasteful arrangement. Every conceivable variety of delphinium was to be seen, but, unfortunately, increased vigour does not appear to connote increased beauty, and many of the newer doubles are distinctly coarse. Mr. Amos Perry, the well-known specialist in these flowers, had two immense groups upon either side of the main entrance. Speaking generally, the quality of the hardy flowers displayed was good. A novelty in the way of arrangement was Messrs. Wallace's terrace-garden, with painted background and herbaceous borders. Messrs. Hobbies had a nice little rose garden, but, speaking for ourselves, we do not commend the use of wire or iron arches for climbing-roses. Wooden pergolas, examples of which were to be seen in many parts of the hall, are, to our mind, both artistically and horticulturally preferable.

There were many fine groups of carnations; no flowers can be staged more attractively. We were also struck with the excellence of Messrs. Gunn's phloxes. Rock-gardening was to the fore, as usual, and a careful observer had an opportunity of seeing some of the choicest Alpines. Two magnificent lots of ferns were displayed by Messrs. May and Hill respectively, and their delightful cool greenery suggested a freer use by exhibitors generally of some sort of living foil. Mere masses of gorgeous colour are apt to become oppressive after half an hour's survey, and spoil the eye for daintier beauties. One of the finest features of the exhibition was the beautifully executed Japanese garden of Messrs. Carter and Company. This type of garden is fraught with delightful possibilities for those whose space is limited but whose purse is long.

As is customary at this Show, there was a large collection of horticultural sundries on view in the side galleries.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By LANCELOT LAWTON

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

If Beaconsfield were alive and in power to-day Germany would doubtless be given forty-eight hours' notice to quit the roadstead of Agadir. The moment is certainly one that calls for prompt and decisive action. Above all it is a moment when the circumstances are peculiarly favourable to a triumph for British diplomacy, providing always there be no faltering. The Government have given a solemn assurance to the nation, and have again and again repeated this solemn assurance, that the British Fleet is supreme and unchallengeable. Naval experts present on the recent occasion of the memorable Coronation Review unanimously endorsed this verdict. Despatches from Paris make it clear that France is leaning upon Great Britain. If we declare for strong action our partner in the Entente Cordiale will be willing to go hand-in-hand with us. The attitude of Russia is plainly defined in the comments of the officially inspired Press. Thus, for example, the Novoe Vremya bluntly declares that a Power acting as Germany has done excludes herself from the society of nations; while the Bourse Gazette strenuously urges that neither Russia nor England can permit Germany to arrogate to herself the right to decide the fate of the Moroccan question.

Without exaggeration it may be said that the whole world waits on the word of England. Apparently both Russia and France are prepared to follow our lead. It remains for us to revitalise the Triple Entente, and through its means to administer to Germany such a rebuff as will once and for all convey to her the knowledge that we stand for the sacredness of the given word and for the common amenities of nations. Let there be no fear on this score. Germany does not want to fight; she is not prepared to go to war with the three Powers of the Triple Entente. And finally the diplomatic situation throughout the world was never more unfavourable to her policy than it is at the present moment. Geographically it is a far cry from Northern Africa to the Middle East, but it is manifest throughout the Chancelleries of Europe that Albania and Morocco are, for the time being, very closely associated with each other. Germany, desirous of maintaining her self-imposed rôle as Turkey's only friend among the Powers, has refused to lend countenance to the protest of her ally, Austria-Hungary, concerning the harsh methods employed by the Turks in suppressing the Albanian revolt. In this circumstance it is not difficult to account for the marked coolness existing between Germany and the Dual Monarchy over the Moroccan affair. Before deciding to send a gunboat to Agadir, Berlin did not sound the Vienna Government with a view to gaining its diplomatic support, and the inspired statements of Foreign Office organs render it apparent that had there been any overtures of this kind from the Wilhelmstrasse, they would have been none too well received. The latest announcement that Russia, Austria, and Italy have arrived at a common agreement in regard to the Albanian situation, and that concerted intervention at Constantinople on behalf of the insurgents may be looked for, will cause not a little heartburning in Berlin. Plainly stated, the position of Germany at the present moment is an unenviable one. In the Middle East she stands as the champion of tottering Turkey and the apologist of Turkey's barbarism; while ranged against her on behalf of humanity and Christianity are all the Powers, including, let it be emphasised, her two partners in the Triple Alliance.

And, in spite of bombastic fanfares of her Press, we find on calm survey that her action in Morocco has only tended to add to her discomfort. The Powers of the Triple Entente are solidly arrayed against her. Austria and Italy, far from being enthusiastic in her cause as good and faithful allies should be, are distinctly lukewarm in their attitudes. Neither of these Powers possesses any interests worth fighting for in the Shereefian Empire, and they could only give support to Germany's actions on the condition that they received ample compensation elsewhere. Here again we find that Germany is ill-placed and unhappy. For the Balkans are the only part of the world where Austria and Italy could reasonably hope to gain a quid pro quo, and, in regard to the Balkans, Germany is already committed to maintaining the status quo by virtue of her friendship, or—to speak with a greater degree of accuracy—her commercial and financial arrangements, with the Ottoman Empire. Germany at present is therefore isolated. Surely the moment has arrived for checkmating finally the policy of calculated effrontery which she has pursued during the last twenty years. Who can forget the Kaiser's congratulatory wire to President Kruger; the occupation of Kiao-chau, which threatened the partition of China, and was one of the principal causes contributory to the Boxer rising; the memorable Daily Telegraph interview; the sabre-rattling in support of Austria-Hungary during the Bosnia-Herzegovina crisis; the sudden descent of the Kaiser upon Tangier which preceded the Algeiras Conference; the futile attempt at Potsdam to drive a wedge in the Triple Entente; and finally the bolstering up of Turkey at the expense of the oppressed Albanians? On former occasions our partners in the Triple Entente, Russia and France, have invited us to join them in vigorous action against the cynical aggression of Germany. We did not feel, however, that the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina directly affected our vital interests, and as soon as Germany declared herself to be on the side of Austria we gave way. Over Morocco we struck a bargain with France, our share of the spoils consisting of a free hand in Egypt. Consequently our interests in the Shereefian Empire ceased to be territorial in aim and remained purely commercial in character. It is easy to imagine that, without good cause, a war in connection with Morocco—one, moreover, solely in support of France—would not be popular among the masses of this country. But the high-handed action of Germany has completely changed the situation. If she is allowed to retain Agadir she will possess a coaling station in the Atlantic. A naval base of such strategic location—"round the corner," as it were, from Gibraltar—would completely upset our existing scheme of world strategy.

As a consequence of her latest arrangement with Turkey in connection with the Baghdad Railway, Germany has already secured an outlet in the Mediterranean, and as she now seeks permanently to occupy an Atlantic harbour on the Moroccan coast, surely the day has passed when she can any longer mask her fixed intention to challenge one day British sea supremacy. At last an occasion has arisen which gives the partners of the Triple Entente common ground, an occasion when, in other words, a strong and successful protest to Germany will benefit not merely one, but all three, partners. Indications point to the fact that Germany herself is conscious of the weakness of her diplomatic position. While her Press is persuading itself that the Government has acted with courageous initiative, a distinct note of nervousness is evident in the stage-management of the whole incident. The first semi-official announcement declared that the despatch of the gunboat Panther to Agadir was merely "a first measure," and reports crept into the inspired Press of the possibility of the landing of troops and an occupation of the hinterland. Apart from the very serious considerations arising from the Balkan situation, the moment of the coup d'état was in other respects well chosen. A change of Government had only just taken place in France; and, moreover, the President, accompanied by the newly-appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs, was about to pay a visit to Holland—an undertaking which could not be otherwise than distasteful to Germany. Fortunately, however, the French Government have maintained a calm that is positively disconcerting to Berlin. The Minister of Foreign Affairs plainly gave the German Ambassador to understand that his communication was distasteful, and after a further conversation with him at a garden-party, left with the President for Holland. At the same time it was announced from Berlin that "the Emperor William is leaving shortly for his cruise in Northern waters, that the Imperial Chancellor is staying at his country seat, and that the Foreign Secretary is likewise absent from Berlin;" while a Madrid correspondent telegraphed that the facts that Senor Canalejas, the Premier, has left town for Otero, that King Alfonso has not thought fit to suspend his shooting-party at Gredos, and that Señor Garcia Prieto, Minister of Foreign Affairs, passed the week-end in the country, induce me to believe that the news has not caused a grave impression in official circles." While London, Paris, and St. Petersburg are conducting an interchange of views Germany has decided to replace the gunboat at Agadir by a cruiser, and has issued an official version of the incident, timorously declaring that "the ship will leave the harbour as soon as peace and order in Morocco are restored." There will be no war, for the simple reason that England does not to-day possess a Beaconsfield. And Germany knows full well that her dramatic intrusion in the affairs of Morocco will not be regarded as casus belli, because although realising that her own diplomatic position in the world is weak, and therefore acting with some show of caution, she has not been slow to gauge the growth of the peace-at-any-price movement in Great Britain. As a matter of course she will be asked for assurances that it is not her intention permanently to occupy Agadir. And these assurances she will readily give. There the incident will end.

THE AMERICANISATION OF CANADA

FOR a good many years past it has been the custom to bring within the range of serious discussion the possibility or otherwise of Canada's ultimate absorption by the United States. It has been pointed out that there is a natural tendency among the communities of the British Dominion to become more and more receptive to American influences, and that this natural tendency has latterly developed a very positive form of imitation. Not altogether unreasonably is the conclusion drawn that agencies far beyond human control are slowly but surely bringing about the irrevocable marriage of two States and of two peoples. But, unhappily for those who favour the annexation or assimilation theory, there is the undisputed fact of Canada's growing nationalism, a phenomenon which has recently been discussed in the pages of United Empire, the official organ of the Royal Colonial Institute. Writing in that journal on the Americanisation of Canada, Mr. Harry S. Gullett, himself an Australian, has some very pertinent and wholly sane things to say in contradiction of the old arguments. "You spend weeks and months," he writes, "in the Western States of America which are in the closest touch with the new Canadian provinces, and in those provinces themselves, and never for a moment are you oppressed by the thought that Canada is becoming Americanised in the national sense. Those people who see, or pretend to see, omens of annexation or absorption miss the first principles of the relative positions of the two peoples. . . . In a quarter of a century Canada will smile at the thought of successful invasion and forceful absorption. And, if we except the force of arms, America has about the same chance of annexing Canada as Germany has of annexing America. It is conceivable that Canada will one day become an independent Republic on the closest of alliance terms with the United States; it is not conceivable that she will become a subordinate part of the Republic of America."

MOTORING

THE great and rapidly-growing inconvenience resulting from the congestion of traffic on the principal London thoroughfares must have forced itself upon the attention of every one who has occasion to get about in the Metropolis, and most people will have wondered what the end of it is to be. Apart from the irritating delays constantly met with by all who utilise the taxi or the motor-'bus as their ordinary means of transit, the actual loss entailed upon the carrying companies by the frequent "holdings up" must be incalculable. Of course the trouble is essentially due to the mixing up of slow horse-drawn traffic with that of the faster motor, and the real remedy will, no doubt, be ultimately found in the total prohibition of the former on the streets of the Metropolis. Apparently the time for this drastic action is not yet ripe, but in the meantime something might be done to palliate the evil by passing a by-law making it compulsory for slow-moving vehicles to keep to the left (or near) side of the road, and it is gratifying to know that this is likely to be done in the near future—thanks largely to that invaluable institution the A.A. and M.U. For some time past the Secretary of the Association has been in communication with the Home Office and the L.C.C. on the subject, and he has now received a reply to the effect that a Committee of the Council has prepared a draft by-law on the lines indicated, and submitted it to the Home Secretary for his approval. This furnishes another instance of the vigilance and activity of the Automobile Association on behalf both of motorists and the general public.

To the county of Kent, which is already said to possess the best roads in the country, belongs the honour of being the one selected for the carrying out of the first thorough and scientifically organised experiments undertaken to find out the best and most dustless road-making materials and methods. Twenty-three sections of the road between Sidcup and New Eltham, each having a superficial measurement of 800 square yards, have been allotted by the Road Board and the Kent County Council to paving contractors for treatment, and each of the sections is to be subjected to a different process. The rival claims of a score or so of the numerous materials and methods of road-making and surface-treatment will therefore be submitted to a fair test of comparative merit for the first time. Each section will get the same amount and variety of traffic, and every three months the road under treatment—about two miles in all—will be inspected by the surveyors and the amount of wear on the respective sections carefully recorded for the information of the other road authorities in the kingdom. This method of ascertaining the best way to adapt the main roads of the country to the new conditions of traffic and locomotion is a sound and reasonable one, and motorists especially will feel gratified at the prospect of ultimately seeing something tangible for their money.

One of the motor vehicles which is securing a notable degree of popularity this season is the 18·22h.p. six-cylinder Belsize, which made its initial appearance about a couple of years ago and aroused considerable interest by its remarkably low price combined with its up-to-date specification. At that time it was generally assumed that the acquisition of a six-cylinder car, with its flexibility of engine and luxurious ease of running, necessarily involved an outlay of something approximating a thousand pounds; but the Belsize, with quite sufficient power for all ordinary purposes, was listed at under £400, and although improvements suggested by experience have since been embodied from time to time it has not been found necessary to increase that price. The writer is now informed by Mr. J. H. Adams, the able and popular manager of the Belsize Company in the South of England, that further material improvements have recently been made in the specification of the chassis. An additional speed, making four and reverse, with direct drive on top, has been provided, and worm-drive—which is increasing in popularity both amongst motorists and car manufacturers—can now be substituted for live-axle drive, at the option of the purchaser. These innovations will, no doubt, be appreciated by the admirers of the Belsize, and enhance its reputation as the ideal six-cylinder for the motorist of moderate means—the representative of the class for which the North Country firm has always especially catered.

Motorists will be interested to learn that a new tyre, which makes somewhat sweeping claims to super-excellence in the matters of durability and resilience, has just made its appearance. It is called the "Victor," and emanates from the well-known Challenge Rubber Mills, of Eagle Wharf Road, London, N. Up to the present this firm has confined itself to specialising in the re-treading of tyres, in which it does one of the largest businesses in the country, and in the manufacture of various devices for protecting them from puncture and burst, and securing the longest possible service from them. The most notable of these devices is the Victor Vest, which has been aptly described as a new foundation for an old tyre. This is generally regarded as the most important factor in promoting tyre economy that has made its appearance up to date, and is now so well known that a detailed description is hardly necessary. But it may be said that it is an inner casing, made of Para rubber and specially-woven Egyptian cotton fabric, which completely lines and supports the inside of the cover. Its extended edges are carried over the beading and finish flush with the tyre-walls outside, so that it affords complete protection to the tube at every point, and also effectively reinforces the walls and bead of the cover. Another important point is that, although rendered immovable and friction-free by its attachment to the outside walls of the tyre, the Vest can be easily detached when the cover has been worn to its utmost limit and transferred to another cover. Its price, which ranges from £1 to £3, according to size, is very moderate in view of its practical utility, and there is no doubt that it adds materially to the longevity of any tyre, and enables motorists to secure many hundreds of miles of further running from tyres which would otherwise be relegated to the scrap-heap. If the new Victor tyre prove equally good it will soon be regarded as a formidable competitor by the recognised standard makes.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE gods evidently consider that it is good that the City should be disturbed at regular intervals. We had just recovered from the Coronation when the German Emperor flung down his challenge. The shock was unpleasant. But it did not last long. There is a great deal of common sense in the City, and most of us soon saw that the whole thing had been prearranged. This destroyed its virulency. No doubt the whole thing was timed to synchronise with the visit of the French President to Amsterdam—a polite reminder to the Dutch. Germany is a great nation with an expanding trade. She must be allowed room or she will explode. The disagreeable part of the business was the bear selling of Consols by insiders, who knew what was going to happen. I hope some member of the House of Commons will ask a question upon this point. Leakage of official secrets is disgraceful, and speculation in advance still worse.

We have had a varied supply of new companies, most of which have been coldly received. Perhaps the worst was the Greek Loan, which was taken in Paris and neglected here. The Calico Printers, who have built a building, let it to themselves, and sold it to the public, and guarantee the interest on both debentures and preference shares, issued the quaintest prospectus we have seen for long time. However, the Coats' people were behind it and would find the money, however the public might view the issue. The Mawchi Tin proposition did not appeal to any one. Boots' made a fresh issue of capital, and the present shareholders no doubt took all they were offered, for the business is well managed. Canadian issues come out almost daily, and the Canadian promoter appears to think that the English will go on finding money for over-capitalised companies. But the end is near.

CONSOLS have recovered a little from their heavy fall. A great many of the bears bought back when the German virus was made public. This proved very conclusively that they had gone short, expecting such news. The Birkbeck officially deny that they have sold any Consols. This also proves that the sales of the past fortnight must have been bear rates. If political people can make up their quarrels I should not be surprised to see a rise in Consols. They fell two points in one account—a serious matter at their present low level.

FOREIGNERS have been weak, and some of the Russian speculative securities more than weak. The St. Petersburg people have had a shock which I hope will give them a lesson. The Russian gamblers have bought far more than they can pay for. They declare that they will turn out the English board in Jena, and make it a purely Russian company. Tintos seem to have recovered quickly. The position here is strong both from the technical point of view and also on the copper side. Peru Prefs have been weak and wobbling. The latest returns are good, but there are many bulls still to unload.

HOME RAILS have had to endure various scares. The shipping strike was a nasty business, and the Coronation traffics showed a loss on seventeen lines of over £117,000—a serious drop. But the half-yearly figures are good all round, and even the conservative North-Eastern directors will have some difficulty in refusing to raise their dividend. But I understand that they consider 6 per cent. quite good enough. The stock at present prices is very cheap. Great Western's increased traffics will allow of a larger distribution than last July, and Lancashire and Yorkshire should also pay more. Brums are cheap in spite of the Coronation loss. All the Southern lines have done well, and South-Easterns might surprise us. But all the figures of the English lines are excellent, and none of the stocks are overvalued.

YANKEES are tabled higher by some of the London houses who have branches in New York, and it is now definitely stated that the Canadian Pacific have acquired the block of shares in the Erie that belonged to the Harriman estate. They are said to have done this under agreement with Morgans, and that they intend to obtain still larger interests. There has been some big buying of options in Eries to the end of the year. If the story be true, then both Eries and Canadian Pacifics must move up—though to an outsider the prices to-day look high. It may be remarked that the C.P.R. strenuously deny the story. During the slump last Monday, when Paris was selling Atchisons as hard as she could, American operators in London were buying. It would therefore seem that the Yankee gambler meant to make an autumn boom. Crop reports vary very much, but on the whole are good. Cotton is looking well, but here the future is also uncertain. Steels are a weak spot, but if the rest of the market rises they must also follow. Rocks are to be boomed, and if talk could give the Americans courage to buy we should see a huge rise. But a long experience of the Yankee Market leads the cynic to doubt mere talk and follow the money.

RUBBER is as dull as the Rubber Exhibition itself, and though the dealers did their best to mark up prices they soon desisted, for they found themselves putting shares on their books. This annoys a rubber-dealer, and he shuts up at the first sign of public selling. It is evident that we shall see a great reduction in dividends, and companies like Perak are acting wisely in conserving their cash and carrying forward large sums. Had this been done in the boom all the plantations would have been in a splendid position to-day. But almost all the Malay companies divided up to the hilt and are quite unprepared to face a slump.

OIL SHARES have been weak, and it has been almost impossible to sell Maikop shares. Many people complain of the wide prices made and the difficulty in finding out the exact quotation. This is always the case in "one-man" markets. The oil market is composed of a congeries of jobbers, each of whom is willing to sell shares for his own shop but reluctant to buy back again. Shell, Spies, and one or two others are the exceptions. Red Seas, which should have risen on the news that the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum had at last agreed to exploit Gernsah, fell. The market thinks the deal over-capitalised.

KAFFIRS were sold from Paris, but recovered. They are too cheap to-day, and, good as the leaders are, I think no one should buy a mining share unless he can see a clear 10 per cent. after allowing for amortisation. Neither should any one buy Kaffirs that have short lives. The yields on these appear high, but purchasers always forget the life and see their mine gradually dying and the price gradually dwindling. The cheapest shares to-day appear to be Knights, Kleinfontein, Randfontein Central, and Village Deep.

RHODESIANS are being supported. No attempt is made to mark up prices, but the dealers keep things steady. The magnates are preparing for a boom, but it must not be forgotten that the Rhodesian mines are quartz properties, and of necessity patchy. Lonelys are high, but the mine looks well. Giants are trying to find the lost reef. If they succeed, the shares will rise, for the mine has now four years' ore in reserve.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Marconis are the only talk, and bulls here are vastly annoyed at the delay in issuing the report. I hope all my readers got out. Telephone deferred should not be sold. We may find that these shares are worth more than the dealers imagine. Mr. Delyannis, of Atlas Bank fame, is promoting the Mesopotamia Exploration.

"OUR CRITICISMS OF MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have noticed that lately your paper has contained very strong, in fact, three-star articles directed against our Home Secretary, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, M.P. Am I right in assuming that the Cecil Cowper, or "C. C." who signs these articles, is the same person as the Cecil Cowper who is a magistrate for Surrey, and as such should, I presume, pay the utmost respect to the Home Secretary and his wishes, however lightly expressed? If so, some one is at fault—either the Home Secretary or the J.P.; which is it?—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

A SHOCKED CITIZEN.

THE PARLIAMENT BILL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Is a Government, by virtue of its representative power, justified in abusing the constitutional limit of its popular representation?

To answer this most important question, wherein the whole crux of the present political deadlock is contained, it becomes necessary to have a proper understanding as to what is meant by the terms "representative power" and "constitutional limit," for, apart from the pure use or meaning of these terms, all arguments must develop sophisticated forms.

Now the representative power of a Government is that power by which it is freely elected to office. The representative power of a Government can have nothing in common with the representative power which opposes it. Likewise, the constitutional limit of a Government is that limit by which it is not freely elected to office. The constitutional limit of a Government can have nothing in common with the constitutional limit which elects it.

Thus it is a form of sophistry which must prove representatively or politically disastrous to hold that the "representative power" of a Government is a form of representation which, as far as the Commons is concerned, is free to do as it likes. There is, for instance, a form of the popular will which every Government must respect and listen to, otherwise its "representative power" is tyrannic.

Again it is a form of sophistry which must prove not merely "representatively or politically," but, in a national sense, disastrous to hold that the "constitutional limit" of a Government is a form of constitutionism which, as far as Law or Order itself is concerned, is unrestricted. There is, for instance, a form of constitutionism upon which every Government must be grounded, otherwise its constitutional limit is a myth.

The vital significance of our question, therefore, is made apparent. If a Government, by virtue of its power through which it was freely elected to office, is not justified in abusing the constitutional limit of its popular representation—that is to say, in assuming absolute control of the executive without the "entire" consent of the nation—then such an extreme act of policy as that which would virtually coerce the Monarch (by the proposed creation of 500 peers), can be neither more nor less than an act of a tyrannical Government.

What, then, becomes of our boasted freedom? The Parliament Bill aims at a revival of the very state of affairs which existed in the country before the Great Charter was instituted.

Now, what would the result have been if the Lords and Commons had made concessions, or, in other words, had compromised at Runnymede?

It is for the present so-called Liberal Government to answer this question, for if, in the interests of the whole people, they sympathise with the firm stand made against a peculiar or selfish desires of a monarch, what consistency of national or whole interests leads it to oppose the firm stand (if it may be so called) made by the Lords against the peculiar or selfish desires of a Government majority?

But, apart from such impurity in the profession of government, it is more than doubtful whether even the peculiar desires of the Government are voiced by its entire majority. As a matter of course, it is wholly irrelevant of the question under discussion to make even a suggestion as to what should or should not be Government policy. This letter is simply meant to discover a sheer masquerade of rule—Front Bench comedy. With a classical embodiment there would be, at least, an intellectual stimulus to be gained from such a form of disguise; but when it becomes magnified, by methods of Press publication, into a form of vulgar or mediocre sensationalism, under such blatant headlines as "Further mutilation by the Lords," "Insolent invasion of common rights," "Peers throw down the gauntlet," "Wrecking the Veto Bill," &c., &c., it is surely a sign that we have reached a state of affairs which, but for the rescuing power of a bold, firm, and true leadership, can only end in a national disaster. Experience should surely act as our guide. England was saved from the terrible muddle of the Long Parliament by the popular recall of an exiled monarch. In the present instance she can only be rescued from the muddle of an iniquitous coalition of Parties by a return to her old methods of rule—methods by which Party government was made subject to Party opposition. We are suffering at the present time, not from any act of subjection to Party opposition, but from the evils of Party omnipotence, that is to say, from a form of tyranny created by a coalition of Party sects.

England has never suffered, nor can it suffer, from a Party system which possesses national instead of merely individual interests. Therefore it is imperative for the salvation of the country that the present Government should meet—not merely with Party opposition—but with national opposition. Hence our present need for a national, and not merely a Party, leader. Hence, also, from this the difficult and delicate position of the reigning Sovereign becomes apparent, consequent through the very form of Ministerial tyranny.

True patriotism will be discovered by the help given to the Crown, and it is a sign for congratulation that the Lords appear, at the eleventh hour, to be conscious of the serious nature of the crisis, and of the necessity for giving the nation at large a strong lead.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THERE is great rejoicing in the Liberal fold over the result of the West Ham election. In Liberal circles it is thought apparently—now that the election is over—that the fate of the Empire hung in the balance attendant on its result. We are really a little sceptical on this point. We think that the electors of West Ham were won over by the glamour of the Insurance Bill, about the benefits of which better-instructed workmen are profoundly nervous, unless the original draft of unsound Mr. Lloyd George can be hammered into a coherent and cohesive legislative act. The electors of West Ham appear to us to have realised that they had a second string to their bow. Failing the Lloyd Georgian panacea, the Hirsch millions might very reasonably be expected to promote re-afforestation in the purlieus of Hainault.

The reformation of Piccadilly Circus from an architectural point of view, and the alteration of it from its present shape to an "oblong square," as one paper humorously puts it, seems hardly necessary. Half the charm of London is due to its irregularity, and surely a rectangular "place" on strictly geometrical lines, with a statue of King Edward VII. in the centre—such is the proposition before the Westminster City Council—would be a poor substitute for the present Circus, with its charming centrepiece surrounded by vivid flowers. It is one of the spots to which the exiled Englishman looks back with longing: by day or night it brims with life and colour. Straightened up and prim, it is unimaginable. London is in danger of being mauled about too much. We do not cast any aspersions upon the opening of congested districts; this process is part of the necessary growth of a large city, and may be likened to the thinning-out of a sturdy plant; we complain, rather, of alterations such as the one under consideration, which seem to have small reason beyond the restless craze for change. The relief to the traffic which might occur by the addition of a few square yards of space would hardly compensate for the spoiling of a sight which is worth travelling many miles to see. And, since those in authority invariably get into trouble when they erect a new building or give the city a fresh monument—blessings on our inartistic English souls!—let us be careful before we encourage too heedlessly the reconstruction of a quarter so thoroughly effective from a spectacular standpoint as Piccadilly Circus.

As a matter of fact, Piccadilly Circus, and most of the other busy centres of London, would soon change their appearance very pleasantly if we were favoured with a few more degrees of heat or a few more weeks of the present temperature. We should all be revelling in the café habit. Little tables, bearing cool drinks, would appear under striped awnings; they would encroach upon the pavements, and the eye of the law would wink at the misdemeanour. Continental visitors would no longer grumble at having to sit in hot, airless rooms when their thirst needed satisfying, or at being compelled to make a pilgrimage to Hyde Park if they desired to take lunch in the open. Compared with the state of affairs in New York, our spells of unusual heat are quite tolerable, but a summer such as the present, which bids fair to prove exceptional, always finds the Englishman unprepared. He can hardly believe his senses when the sun shines fiercely upon him for more than two consecutive days. He goes about town wiping his brow, and remarking sapiently that it is hot; his friends wipe their brows in sympathy, and observe that they think it is hotter than yesterday, and that, in their opinion, it will thunder before long. Here and there a genius dons a suit of white; here and there one, with the fine old sea-dog spirit, will brave the desperate adventure and rush off to take tea in Kensington Gardens; but on the whole enterprise is curiously lacking. It needs, probably, another ten degrees. At eighty in the shade we are merely limp; at ninety we should realise that something must be done; things would happen right speedily; we should deck our streets with embroideries of dainty little tables; we should eat, drink, and be merry in the open air. And then, being England, it would rain.

"The Literary Pageant," a shilling volume of stories, verses, and illustrations somewhat on the lines of "Printer's Pie," is published this week by Mr. T. Werner Laurie in aid of the Prince Francis of Teck Memorial Fund of the Middlesex Hospital, and is certainly excellent value, if only for the contributions by W. W. Jacobs, William de Morgan, and W. J. Locke. "The Heart at Twenty," by Mr. Locke, is an acute and amusing little study not without its note of pathos. The list of distinguished names in "The Literary Pageant" is much too long to reproduce, but work by Owen Seaman, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Arthur Morrison—to mention but three more—is sure of a welcome. The illustrations are highly artistic, some of them, in colour, well worth preserving.

THE MOTH AND THE MOON

The Moth was born by the river's breast,
Born in the sun, with soft, brown wings,
But the sun remembered the ardent West
And sank where the last lark sings.

Shyly the Moon her face unveiled
Fain for the passion and power of night,
And the brave little Moth unsteadily sailed,
So strangely fair was the sight.

But the pale, proud river, whispering, told
Of a Moon deep down in her lucent tide,
And the trembling Moth grew blithe and bold,
Plunged in for a kiss—and died.

Then the Moon forsook her spacious bower,
Dethroned her stately stars, and wept.
On Earth they said "'Tis an evening shower ;"
But the listening river laughed, and crept
By meadows and rushes, until it found
The place where the poor, frail Moth lay drowned ;
Then laughed again, and slept.

A GREAT NATIONAL MEASURE ?

WE desire to extend a cordial welcome to the Oxford and Cambridge Review under its new direction. In next week's issue we shall notice its contents generally in a manner worthy of their value.

For the moment the article by Sir William Bull, to whom we have deputed the responsibility of editing a series of articles on the National Insurance Bill for THE ACADEMY, arrests our attention. The fairness and weight of the articles which are appearing in this journal have been freely recognised, and these qualities are equally apparent in Sir William Bull's contribution to the Oxford and Cambridge Review. We for our part have observed the utmost reticence in criticism of the National Insurance Scheme.

When the measure was introduced we perceived at once, that it was in effect a draft, but a draft which with patience and goodwill might be moulded into a beneficent enactment. The author of the scheme deserves all possible praise for the labour—and we believe it was a labour of love—which he has bestowed upon it. His conduct of the measure in Parliament has also been correct and courageous, as well as conciliatory. We have been compelled to write so many unpleasant criticisms of the Chancellor, that it gives us unfeigned pleasure to bestow praise where praise is due.

A vast scheme such as that we are considering should in effect be riddled with criticism before it is placed on the Statute Book, and we hope sincerely that no desire for haste will be allowed to mar that which may be a fitting memorial of a courageous statesman seen at his best in his most worthy and responsible guise,

Sir William Bull in the Oxford and Cambridge Review handles his theme of State Insurance in relation to Unionism with impartiality and justice. It is quite true that Mr. Disraeli foreshadowed the justice and necessity of such a measure, long before Socialism put forward a catalogue of fantastic demands. Sir William Bull quotes Mr. Disraeli's famous speech at the Crystal Palace in 1872 :—

" You know how that effort [the effort of the Tory party to elevate the condition of the people by the reduction of their toil and the mitigation of their labour] was encountered—how these views were met by the triumphant statesmen of Liberalism. They told you that the inevitable consequence of your policy was to diminish capital, and, this again would tend to the lowering of wages, to a great diminution of the employment of the people and ultimately to the impoverishment of the Kingdom."

The ideal of Disraeli—and we know it from his novel "Sybil"—was to improve the condition of the necessitous classes by wise legislation, humane legislation on the leash of solvency. That ideal was scoffed at by a Liberal party of Conservative tendencies, and nothing was done.

The old-age pension scheme—of course on sound contributory lines—was a prominent article of Unionist equipment. Its great champion, Mr. Chamberlain, fought for it through good report and evil report. The Liberals banned the measure, they swore by bell, book and candle they would never touch it. Mr. Chamberlain went on. In the Report of the Royal Commission on the Aged Poor, he was the steadfast adherent of the measure.

The Old Age Pensions system which is now the law is unsatisfactory, it was passed in a hurry to make a legislative show. It is insufficient in amount, and commences too late, the very vices which those who understood the problem from years of labour upon it, predicted. A child could plan a scheme where the entire cost is thrown on the State—the taxpayer. It required the efforts of a statesman and much deliberation to construct a contributory scheme which would provide an adequate pension to commence at a time of life when the recipient might have a prospect of enjoying for some years an adequate provision.

We have dwelt thus on the shortcomings of the Pensions Act, because we do not wish haste and immaturity to be the distinguishing features of the Insurance Scheme.

Sir William Bull writes :—

" My main objection to Mr. Lloyd George's scheme is that it professes to insure the uninsurable, and this as a concession to the Socialist idea for symmetry in State action, for identical treatment of all classes," and he proceeds : " It is of vital importance that the principles which should govern the settlement should be those of Conservative Social Reform, and not those of Socialism."

To that statement of the case we heartily subscribe, and we are not without hope that the Chancellor will display the tact, firmness, and balanced judgment which will result in a great and worthy enactment on those lines being placed on the Statute Book.

SOCIALISTS AND THE INSURANCE BILL

MANY people have formed an impression that Mr. Lloyd George's State Insurance Bill is distinctively a Socialist measure. That the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in sympathy with many of the political ideas commonly called Socialistic is a generally received opinion well warranted by the Chancellor's words and deeds. But vagueness of thought induces many people to regard practically all State regulation of the lives of the working classes which is intended to be beneficial to that class as a form of Socialism. It is manifest, when the subject is considered, that State regulation does not imply a Socialistic conception of the State, and the fact that such regulation mainly concerns the wage-earning class and is beneficent does not alter the distinction between State regulation of action and Socialism.

There is no country in the world where State regulation of the details of the life of the people is carried to a greater extent than in Russia, yet no one would say that Socialism is the guiding principle of the Czardom. In most Continental countries State regulation, most of it with a purpose which is at least ostensibly beneficial, has a wider scope than in this country. Yet generally such State control is independent of any tendency to Socialism, and is regarded with no especial favour by Socialists.

In Britain during the greater part of the nineteenth century the doctrine of laissez-faire was more thoroughly accepted than on the Continent. The system which has been described as "anarchy plus the police constable" came to be regarded as natural and even inevitable. The prophets of the system believed in their plenary inspiration, and, what is more remarkable, induced almost the whole nation to accept their wisdom at the valuation of those who expounded it. Every one who is acquainted with the facts knows well that State and municipal regulation, far-reaching and stringent, was the custom of this country for centuries; and those were the centuries in which the foundations of the nation's greatness were laid. It is no doubt true that the control of manners and customs by authority was sometimes excessive, and any one who is interested in noting the quaint thoroughness with which this control was sometimes brought to bear will find an interesting example in the municipal rules governing the once prosperous town of Kenfig on the Bristol Channel. Kenfig has been buried by the encroaching sand, but its historian has rescued its municipal records, and these, which were published a year or two ago, show how carefully the paternal rulers of the place governed the usages of their fellow-townsmen. This is merely one instance of the long-established and well-recognised condition formerly prevalent throughout the country.

The political theorists of the nineteenth century turned their backs upon the wisdom of their fathers. They preached unrestricted competition, and induced the nation to practise it with results that no one can regard as wholly satisfactory. One of the consequences of their success in imposing their authority on British thought was that it became the habit of most English people to regard any kind of State intervention in social or industrial matters as an innovation, and latterly these "innovations" have generally been regarded as prompted by Socialist propaganda and devised according to Socialist principles.

In order to understand the attitude of Socialists to the National Insurance Bill, the essential difference between State regulation and the nationalisation of all wealth must be borne in mind. It seems at a first glance that Socialists should have welcomed Mr. Lloyd George's plan. It must be owned that the preachers of fraternity à outrance are a carping race and prone to ingratitude. This is an interesting point in Socialist psychology which has not hitherto been explained. But it must also be admitted that Socialists are not really under an obligation to acclaim the Chancellor's Insurance Bill with panegyrics. It does indeed recognise a responsibility on the part of the State towards wage-earners who are sick and workmen who are unemployed, but such a recognition is a reversion to the old British conception of the duties of society and the scope of public authority rather than an admission that private property ought to be socialised.

The oldest Socialist body in the country is the Social Democratic Party, formerly the Social Democratic Federation. Under the leadership of Mr. Hyndman the Social Democratic Party has persistently stood for what may be called the high-and-dry Socialism of the old school. Socialists who have departed from orthodoxy and do not consider themselves bound by the doctrines originally delivered to the disciples of Marx are prone to speak slightly of the S.D.P. as a bigoted and unprogressive sect, but it is only fair to admit that Mr. Hyndman's organisation represents Socialism as it is understood by the great majority of Continental Socialists, and is consistent in its adherence to original Socialist principles which less zealous comrades have prudently abandoned under stress of attack. The organ of the S.D.P. is Justice, and the attitude of Justice to the National Insurance Bill may be gathered from the following passages in a recent issue:—

Mr. Lloyd George is to be congratulated on the universal chorus of approbation with which his scheme of invalidity and unemployment insurance has been received by all parties. We regret not to be able to join in the chorus; but we regret still more that Labour representatives and Socialists should have done so. That Liberals and Tories—who deplore destitution and misery as much as any one can, and who would do anything to relieve it (at no expense to themselves); who believe in providing everybody with nice omelettes without breaking any eggs, and who profess a "kind of Socialism" which, while it "will make the poor richer, will not make the rich poorer"—that these should hail Mr. George's scheme with delighted approval is easily understood. But that Socialists, who must know that such aims are illusory and unattainable, should join with them is incomprehensible.

At their very best any such schemes of insurance as that now before us have the fatal demerit that they deal with effects and not causes. They are "palliatives" in the worst sense, in that they are designed to palliate and make tolerable the existing social order; they are not stepping-stones to something better, or aids to enable the working class to strive more effectually for something better. On the contrary, they are intended to strengthen, consolidate and perpetuate the system of exploitation by tempering its worst evils, and thereby to make exploitation bearable for the exploited. Briefly, they are not merely not Socialism, they are anti-Socialist in their design and intention, and are characteristic of the difference between social reform and Socialism—or, rather, between the social reform which makes for Socialism and that which makes against it.

The present scheme, as it stands, is a deadly, and probably a deliberate, blow at trade union organisation. It is at once a final surrender of the principles of laissez-faire Liberalism, a concession to Socialist agitation, and a deliberate attempt to head back Social Democracy.

The Social Democratic Party stands for Socialism as it first appeared among us. The Fabian Society represents Socialism at the end of the process of evolution to which it has been subjected in this country. The Fabians, as everybody knows, are not noisy revolutionaries; they use the flexible weapon of statistics and gather proselytes in the class-room rather than at the street-corner. But the Fabian Society is as much opposed to the National Insurance Bill as the Social Democratic Party. At the annual Conference held last week the Society passed a resolution in the following terms:—"That, whilst this Conference would welcome the introduction of a measure dealing rationally with maternity, sickness, and unemployment, it considers the Bill now before Parliament ought to be opposed." The use of the word "rationally" in this connection appears to be an unkindness which Mr. Lloyd George might well regard as wanton.

The Socialism of the Independent Labour Party is neither that of the Social Democratic Party nor that of the Fabians. It is in the main Socialism seen through Trade Union spectacles, and Socialism thus apprehended is a tendency rather than a principle. The Independent Labour Party is politically the most powerful of the Socialist organisations, and it is as critical with regard to the National Insurance Bill as its kindred bodies. The organ of the Independent Labour Party is the Labour Leader, and on the first occasion when it had an opportunity of discussing the Bill the paper contained a leading article which damned the Chancellor's scheme with faint praise and certain other articles which condemned it outright. Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., was permitted in this connection to offer observations on Mr. Lloyd George's capacity as a statesman which were exceptionally acrid, even allowing for the acerbity with which Socialists usually write. In subsequent articles the Labour Leader continued to publish articles hostile to the Government's plan, and prominent in opposition to it was Mr. George Lansbury, M.P., who represents a large section of Christian Socialists. Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., has also risen to testify against Mr. Lloyd George's scheme. Mr. J. Keir Hardie, M.P., has some encouragement to offer to Mr. Lloyd George, but his approval is tempered by criticism, and he writes significantly: "I was glad to hear the Chancellor say that the measure would help to alleviate the suffering due to poverty 'until the advent of the complete recovery.' I presume he meant Socialism by this." Mr. Hardie, therefore, supports the plan rather because he thinks it is leading towards Socialism than because he accepts it on its merits. Moreover, the Independent Labour Party has formally pledged itself to support a non-contributory scheme, and in relation to Friendly Societies the Labour Leader recently gave prominence to the assertion that the Chancellor's Bill "destroys them for ever."

The Clarion is the organ by which Mr. Blatchford exerts his still commanding influence on the Socialist movement, and recently Mr. Victor Grayson has been allowed to voice the policy of the Clarion. Mr. Grayson abounds in invective, and the Insurance Bill has called forth all his fecundity. Writing on the Bill, he tells us—"The worker is to pay for his own political and economic undoing, half the amount directly and the other half indirectly." It need hardly be said that such a text gives the author of it an excellent opportunity for strong and long denunciation, and the Clarion, like the Labour Leader, has continued to publish articles vehemently condemning Mr. Lloyd George's proposals, and attributing to the Government an intention to deal fraudulently with the working class. If we turn to the New Age we find that the National Insurance Bill has had a similar reception in its pages. The New Age is a weekly review written for the Socialist "intellectuals," and it expresses the opinions current among those who pass into the Socialist movement from the world of art, science, and letters. Dealing with the Chancellor's Bill, the New Age declares that it is "mainly concerned in seeing the measure die." The Ministerial scheme, according to this organ of Socialism, is likely to destroy Trade Unionism. The New Age further asserts that "no single economist in England has approved" the Bill, and believes that the policy of Mr. Lloyd George will accelerate the progress of the nation towards "the Servile State." With full justification the New Age claims that it has done its best "to demonstrate the defects of the most humiliating, improvident, and unstatesmanlike Bill ever presented to Parliament for consideration."

One of the organs of the Socialist extremists—the Socialist Standard—describes the Insurance Bill as "the Liberal party's bold bid for popular favour and cunning attempt to beat the Labour party at its own treacherous game." In fact, opinion among all sects of Socialists is practically unanimous in condemning the Government's scheme. One need not pay much heed to the argument that the Insurance Bill tends to reconcile the mass of wage-earners to the Servile State. Socialism, whether it contemplates administration by State officials or by elected Committees, must involve servility for the individual; a slavery none the less crushing and unbearable because those imposing it would claim beneficent motives and ideals; and it is unlikely that Socialists are really alarmed by a menace to freedom.

The strength of the Socialist opposition to Mr. Lloyd George's scheme lies in the resolve which is steadfast throughout the movement that the State shall pay. The workman is not to contribute to benefits which he is to receive; the entire burden is to be thrown upon the community as a whole. It is well that the Socialist attitude should be so clearly defined in this connection. Many people suppose that they can give a vague support to Socialism in the hope that it may be used to ameliorate the conditions of the poorer class without committing the Legislature to the principles of Communism, but that is a mistake. Kindly people who allow themselves to lapse into loose thinking should realise that Socialism means the abolition of private property. If they assist Socialists, they are in fact assisting not such measures as the National Insurance Bill, but the cause of "the Social Revolution."

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR—IV.

By FRANK HARRIS

LET us begin to visit the Palace of the Dukes of Burgundy in the kitchen. It was designed and built about the middle of the fifteenth century, and in its spacious, unadorned simplicity affords an excellent image of the time. A great flagged place on the ground floor, fully 40ft. square; this square surrounds a smaller square, which is really a large groined vault, rising from eight columns. The centre runs up 40ft. or 50ft., and is open to the sky to let the smoke out. In each of the four sides is a vast chimney large enough to roast an ox or boil vegetables enough for a regiment. But fine cooking too was known in the fifteenth century, and between these plain fireplaces we see the marks of two great furnaces, no doubt specially adapted for preparing sauces and baking the smaller dishes. The place too can be traced where the great warming-table stood. Here the chief cook sat throned on his chaîere, whence he could oversee and command his twenty-five cooks with all their attendant valets—portiers, souffleurs, and happe-lopins, or turnspits—to say nothing of the host of maids and marmitons for menial services.

From the kitchen we go up to the great Salle des Gardes, just noticing on the way the splendid staircase, which dates from the early half of the eighteenth century. The guard-room is a superb room, nobly proportioned and well lighted: it is, perhaps, 90ft. long by 35ft. broad and as many high. In the great windows are stone seats where the officers used to sit and amuse their leisure by watching the crowd in the courtyard below. The first thing in the room to catch the eye is the great chimney-piece, which was built in 1504. It is the most magnificent Gothic chimney-piece in the world; it needs a photograph to give an idea of the simplicity of the chimney itself, and the effect of the massive slabs of unadorned stone contrasting with the elaborate richness of the ornamentation above, which runs up nearly to the ceiling. The exquisite curves and spires make one think that the stone itself has blossomed into flower.

But the room is not so extraordinary as what it contains. All these Dukes of Burgundy, from Philip the Bold to Charles the Reckless (Téméraire), were of their time, and went about with the constant preoccupation of death. The same obsession which gave birth to the beautiful monuments in the church of Brou came in the tombs of these Burgundian princes to still more magnificent utterance. In 1383 Philip the Bold established the Chartreuse (monastery) de Champmol. The word chartreuse comes from chartre, which means a prison, or place of confinement, and is therefore intimately, if half-unconsciously, associated with that last prison of the grave. This Chartreuse of Champmol was built by Philip in middle life as a setting for his own tomb, to be used meantime as an oratory, or place of prayer. It has now been turned into a lunatic asylum. But the Gothic gate is still to be seen, and the tower and porch of the oratory, where later the tombs were placed. To give his ideas form Philip brought artists from Flanders—Jean de Marville and others, and, above all, Claus Sluter, who worked for him from 1385 till his death in 1406. Philip's tomb was completed in this period. Half a century later John the Fearless and his wife, Margaret of Bavaria, had a tomb built for themselves on the same pattern, though still more richly decorated. These are the two greatest monuments in the world inspired by death.

Imagine an oblong of black marble some 12ft. long by 8ft. broad and over 5ft. high. On this sarcophagus the white marble effigy of the Duke lies as if he had just died. His feet rest on a lion and his head on a cushion between two angels, who kneel behind him with outspread wings and hold his helmet. All round the sides runs a sort of cloister, with figures in alabaster enclosed in little columned niches. The tomb of John the Fearless and his wife Margaret is a little longer and broader, but not quite so high; the figures of husband and wife are placed side by side. In all other respects the two great monuments are alike. There is a certain honest realism in the presentment of these royal persons. Every detail of the costume is exact. The fingers of John and his wife are covered with rings. Yet, in spite of the realism, there is a great dignity in these marble figures—partly, of course, the dignity of the suggestion of death, partly the dignity which always lies in immobility.

But it is the little statues underneath which form the wonder of these tombs. Here the sculptors have let themselves go and pictured the world of men as they saw them. Side by side are bishops and deacons, monks and knights, fat men and lean, free-livers and students—all sorts and conditions of people. Here you can study not only the faces and occupations of the men who lived five hundred years ago, but the petty details of dress and ornament; the shape and substance of brooches, bracelets, rings; the form too of books and the silver used in Church services down to the big red beads of the rosaries; the figure of the sacristan who is thrusting his book into its leathern bag is a masterpiece of observation. In fact each tomb is a sculpture-gallery; and they both stand now one after the other in this wonderful Salle des Gardes of the ancient palace. I cannot help wishing they were still in the Chartreuse de Champmol; but men are slow to learn that beautiful things should be seen in the place designed for them.

It is sadder still to notice that the tombs have been greatly damaged. Many of the figures were defaced, some broken up, in the Revolution. It was resolved entirely to destroy "these monuments of despots" and convert them into "emblems of liberty and equality." It was only the piety of some art-lovers that rescued these wonderful monuments for our admiration.

There are in this Salle des Gardes three other pieces of primitive work which deserve study. They are three enormous Gothic retables of carved wood, gilded and painted; two of these are the work of Jacques de Baerze and were executed in 1391 to the order of Philip for the oratory of his great Chartreuse. These retables are each about 16ft. long by 6ft. or 7ft. high; the upper part is taken up with Gothic architecture, while the lower part presents scenes from Biblical history. Though much damaged and badly restored, they are probably the finest wood-carvings in existence. On the back of one of them a Dutch artist has painted the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Presentation in the Temple, and the Flight into Egypt. There is still another Gothic retable, in five panels, in this room, which was brought from the Abbey of Clairvaux; it belongs to the first half of the fifteenth century and is in excellent condition.

Before leaving the tomb of Philip I ought to have noticed that two of the alabaster figures on it were sculptured by Claus Sluter himself; for he is really the greatest primitive sculptor of whom we have any record. His best works are still to be seen in the Chartreuse of Champmol: the Portal of the church and the Well of Moses, or the Well of the Prophets as it perhaps should be called. The Portal is the earlier work, and shows astounding courage and the astounding reverence for art in that age. On the left side of the great door is a statue of Philip himself kneeling with his patron saint, John the Baptist, behind him; on the right side is the stone presentment of his wife Margaret, escorted by St. Catherine. The Duke's face, with the heavy rudder-nose, strong jaw, and prominent, square chin, is plainly taken from life, and the sculptor has put in the lines and wrinkles with pitiless honesty. No ideal presentment this, but the real man, of dominant, hot passions and purposeful persistence. Sluter has dared more even than this—he has ventured to represent the Duchess, who was renowned for her ugliness, as realistically as the Duke. There she is, the moult noble et crueuse dame, with her harsh, coarse features; and right opposite to her, in the middle of the Portal, a lovely Virgin, by way of contrast.

It was an age of faith, if you like, but it was therefore an age of truth, when the artist was encouraged to depict his patrons as they really lived and moved. The modern journalist, on the other hand, who believes in nothing beyond his dinner, endeavours to please the great by flattering them ignobly to their faces as the happy possessors of all the graces and all the virtues.

The statue of the Virgin and Child in this Portal seems to be regarded as Sluter's masterpiece, but I prefer his later work, though this is very fine. I was struck particularly by the naïve realism of the Virgin's pose; the figure thrown back from the hips, as if to balance the weight of the Child. The naturalism of the pose lends a touch of life to the ideal beauty of the Virgin's face.

Near the chapel is the greatest monument of this fourteenth century to be found in the world—the great Well of Moses, which is wholly the work of Claus Sluter. The Well is some 25ft. in diameter, in the middle of it a pedestal, which was once crowned with a great stone crucifix. The pedestal is still to be seen, decorated with statues of Moses, David, Jeremiah, Zachariah, Daniel, and Isaiah. These figures alone would be sufficient to place Sluter among the great sculptors of the world. He worked before any of the Florentine masters, before Michelangelo or Donatello—without assistance from antique models—yet he reached, I think, a higher form of art and certainly a more modern and intimate form than any of the great Italians. For these prophets of Claus Sluter are living men and something more. He went about for years filled with reverence for their Biblical characteristics and then caught from life features and gestures to express them; again and again he has found a fine artistic symbol for his feeling. For instance, Sluter portrays Moses in all majesty as the prophet who descended from Sinai; the rays of light on his forehead are shown as horns; in his right hand are the Tables of the Law. David, on the other hand, is an Oriental monarch with large face and short beard, and hair standing out underneath his French crown; in his right hand a harp. He has a look of ineffable, self-satisfied content on his fat face. By way of contrast, Jeremiah is presented as a little man without beard or moustache, absorbed in reading a great book held in his right hand. The variety of life in these different figures is amazing, and would do honour to an observer of our own day.

In order to classify Sluter let us measure him with one of the greatest of modern sculptors. We have in this museum of Dijon two studies of the Christ—one by Rude and the other by Sluter. A casual glance shows the superiority of the early master. The Christ of Rude is simply the head of an Adonis with features a little sharpened; the expression is rather of weariness than of pain. Take away the crown of thorns and it would be impossible to divine whom the face was intended to represent.

The Christ of Claus Sluter is a masterpiece. The thorns are treated in so broad a way that they take on the semblance of a real crown, and give an air of breadth and majesty to the upper part of the face. The almost closed eyes, on the other hand, with the raised eyeballs and the half-opened mouth, are the perfect artistic symbol of mortal agony. The contrast between the majesty of the broad brow and crown and the swooning face gives one some idea of Sluter's achievement. There is more than a suggestion of the double nature of Jesus in this masterpiece, and, strangely enough, the complex expression is intensified by the defacements—the chippings and stains—of time. To say that Sluter's work is incomparably better than the work of Rude is still inadequate praise. This head of Christ is in sculpture what the head of Christ by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, is in painting—a thing unique and wonderful, conceived in love and reverence, of an intense emotional appeal.

Henceforth to me Claus Sluter is one of the master-spirits of all time. There is the most sincere realism in his portraits of the people he knew, such as the Duke Philip and his wife; an astonishing knowledge of life and the differences of character in his presentment of Moses and the Prophets; a fine sense of beauty in his Virgin and Child, and in the noble design of his Portal and Well, and, finally, an extraordinary divination and reverence in his Christ. One of the great creative artists was Claus Sluter.

Some day or other, when I have leisure to spend in Dijon, I shall try to find out something more about the man whom Philip the Bold praised for "les bons et agréables services qu'il lui a fait et lui fait chaque jour." This bold, free-living Duke, too, who loved the daring sculptor must have been worth knowing. It takes some greatness in the patron to recognise greatness in the artist.

FALLACIES ON ART

Latent Impulse in History and Politics. By R. N. BRADLEY, B.A. (Murray and Evenden. 6s. net.)

MR. BRADLEY is puzzled because, as he says, "you can talk Socialism, evolution, criticism with your friend, and he will prove everything and bring to it the best of intelligence, yet in the thing upon which you think he would want to be sure of his ground [religion] he stops you at the first trench." This attitude towards religion strikes the author as very curious. He inquires of himself whether it be "weakness and cowardice," or whether it be due "to the blind spot on the retina." "Here you are," he seems to say, "holding to some religious system or other. You admit that this system is of the most vital importance—according to you it is the one subject of importance—and yet you are unwilling to discuss it, to prove it, and to search it to its very roots at any moment with anybody who likes to put the matter to you."

Well; it seems to me that Mr. Bradley's enigma, when clearly expressed, resolves itself. Religion is of the most vital interest; therefore it is not a matter to be openly and freely discussed at any time with anybody. If Mr. Bradley were to meet a Justice of the High Court who had just sentenced a man to death, or given judgment in a civil cause of the highest consequence, it is highly improbable that the said Judge would welcome open and free discussion of his sentence or of his judgment. The Justice might be lively about lawn-tennis, communicative on cricket, talkative on tactics; but if he were asked some question as to the great case over which he had presided it is likely that he would lapse into determined silence. The matter proposed would affect him too nearly and too vitally to be discussed at all; its very importance banishes it to the regions of silence and reserve.

Mr. Bradley explains his own difficulty by saying that religion is a matter not of the head, but of the heart. This is not true; religion is a matter both of head and of heart; it has employed the whole intelligence of some of the greatest intellects that have ever existed. Still, in the suggestion of "heart" there is a certain grain of truth on which I will presently comment. But the question is a much more complicated one than Mr. Bradley seems to believe. There is in the first place the general principle that has been already stated; the greater the importance of any matter, the less its suitability for off-hand discussion. Patriotism is highly important: so important that men innumerable have confirmed by experiment the dictum that it is sweet and comely to die for country. Soldiers and sailors are the people most nearly interested in this question; but Mr. Bradley, if he be wise, will not go up to captain or to soldier or to sailor and ask them if they think there is any real sense in this fighting business of theirs, or in their archaic profession of being ready to die for King and country. It is probable that such an interrogation would rouse feelings of considerable irritation in the hearts of those addressed. Their dulce et decorum dogma is too important to be investigated by them. Then, apart from the importance of a topic, there is the reason of the heart, to which the author has himself pointed. As I should prefer to put it, religion is an age-old instinct; it has represented a craving which is in the very nature of man; it is in the spiritual or ideal world what the gratification of natural desires is in the sensible world. A thirsty man will drink, a cold man will do his best to get warm; it is only persons of the highest "scientific" education who, parched with thirst, would welcome the suggestion that red pepper was what they really want. No man will gladly suffer his instincts to be opposed; hence another reason for the general dislike of free discussion of religious dogmas. And here it may be remarked by the way that, when Mr. Bradley speaks of discussion, he apparently means one man saying to another, "Your religious beliefs are ridiculous and out of date."

There are still further reasons for the reluctance to admit incredulous and scoffing strangers into the inmost places of one's heart. Firstly, these places are inmost and intimate; unless, under very special circumstances, it is indecent to talk of them with any man. Coventry Patmore, that master of wisdom, has demonstrated the analogies that exist between things above and things below; it is sufficient to say here that all lovers have secrets which are not for free discussion. And, in the last place, a man certainly "wants to be sure of his ground" where the faithfulness of his wife is concerned; but I believe that if Mr. Bradley carry out his own logic, and propose to argue this point with any individual man, and (to use his own phrase) expect that that man will discuss the question "without heat," then Mr. Bradley will find that there is a flaw in his ratiocinative processes.

Turning to another page in the book, I come upon the following passage:—

The tendency of peoples and individuals to busy themselves with arts, plays, games, and music is a strange thing in a world of utility, and much labour has been spent on its explanation.

Mr. Bradley suggests that, in the first place, the survival of the artistic tendency is in itself a proof that it is by no means useless; and secondly, he seems to adopt Schiller's explanation that play is a school for the struggles of life; and thirdly, he affirms that play and art, "the child of play, are the result of a superabundance of energy and motive power."

Now, I should very much like to have Mr. Bradley's definition of the word "utility," as used by him in the phrase "a world of utility." Does he mean that history as a whole shows that the sole aim of humanity is to satisfy its animal instincts either under crude or under refined conditions? Apparently he does mean this; and, if so, he is defining the world in terms which are directly opposed to the whole facts of the case. Either the united vices of gluttony, profligacy, and avarice make up the ideal man or they do not; we know that they do not; we know that a man who devoted his entire being to these three ends would be an unnatural monster; perhaps the worst man that ever lived has done better than this. So the world is not "a world of utility" at all; the phrase is mere nonsense; the man that the author conceives as normal has no existence, and if he could exist he would not be a man, but a sort of impossible tertium quid or monster, suspended in a void between the sphere of men and the sphere of the brutes, devoting the human intelligence to the securing of the ends which are of sole importance to the wild hog, the ape, and the mountain goat. This equation of the world with utility being shown to be nonsense, it is hardly worth while discussing the proposition that the arts existing, they must serve utility. I would only observe that I should like to see a demonstration of the suppressed premise—"everything that exists is useful"—and also that I have never seen a more pitiable defence of Art than this: that it helps in the struggle for life; in other words, that the exploiter of his weaker brethren, pacing the National Gallery or reading Homer, goes forth on his daily task of infamy and oppression strengthened and enabled for his work. Taking a milder example, it may be said once for all that the great poets and musicians and painters of the ages did not execute masterpieces and operate marvels that Tom, Dick, and Harry might earn an honest living and all be able to buy warm great-coats for the cold weather: I dare not justify the Odyssey by saying that Nausicaa has helped baby to get a fortnight at the sea.

Now for this doctrine that art is a superabundance of energy—that is to say, that the material, or merely hoggish and goatish, good having been provided for, a man finds time hang heavy on his hands, and, for want of anything better to do writes, paints, carves masterpieces. Now, if this were true, we should expect to find the artistic graces most strongly developed in the men of action, the men of affairs, the men of politics. But, as a matter of fact, this is not the case; the almost universal rule is that the supreme artist devotes his life to his art. Napoleon did not utilise his between-battle times to the composition of masterpieces of any description, and from his admiration for "Ossian" we may probably deduce an entire absence of even the critical faculty. There is, therefore, no reason to suppose that art is the result of superabundance of energy and motive power. It is, doubtless, like everything else, the result of energy; but of an energy of its own order; it is not created by that reserve of force which remains over to a man after his appetite has been satisfied and his back clothed. In fact, Mr. Bradley's theory is the complementary fallacy to the doctrine of the late Professor Lombroso, who held that art was a kind of by-product of disease; an odd growth, as it were, that might sprout from the roots of epilepsy, or flourish in congenial company with the bacillus of tuberculosis.

For the one theory as for the other there is just as much to be said—that is, nothing at all. As for the equation of art with play; that, too, is false. Not wholly false, since at certain points the two spheres of art and play intersect and join together; though there is little that is sportive in the "Œdipus Tyrannus" and "King Lear," each is called a "play;" the word finding its appropriateness in the fact that the action of the drama is thus distinguished from the action of life. But art and play are by no means to be identified on this account, since the object of art is the creation of beauty; and in the majority of cases play aims at nothing of the kind. Sophocles, if you like, was "playing" when he wrote his tremendous drama, and the man who calls for the box of dominoes at the café is also "playing," but it is clear that there is nothing to be gained by founding any argument on this one word used to express two things which are utterly different.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

STIRRING TIMES IN DAYS OF YORE

Recollections of a Parisian (Docteur Poumiès de la Siboutie) Under Six Sovereigns, Two Revolutions, and a Republic (1789-1863). Edited by his Daughters, MESDAMES A. BRANCHE and L. DAGOURY. Translated from the French by LADY THEODORA DAVIDSON. (John Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE author of "Recollections of a Parisian" must have been a minute observer of the events which happened during his lifetime, and, glancing at the title of his work, one will readily understand what an interest it presents. For in it we find, as described by one who was a witness of the facts alluded to, many curious sidelights thrown on certain phases of French history too well known to be mentioned here. These memoirs, of which Lady Theodora Davidson has given us an English version, are in truth sometimes inexact as to the facts dealt with; but that could hardly have been avoided, as they convey the impression of having been noted by the author without further research to ascertain whether the renderings of the stories he thus transcribed were correct or not. His book is, in short, an agreeable bavardage, brightly written, containing many amusing anecdotes, for Dr. Poumiès certainly possessed the knack of telling "a good story." His profession brought him into contact with the leading personalities of his time, and being by nature—so we gather from his work—an interested spectator of the tragi-comedy called Life, he has thoughtfully recorded the traits or events which he believed might prove particularly entertaining for future generations.

Docteur Poumiès begins by giving a detailed description of his family, and in doing so exposes the situation in France at the eve of the First Revolution; and he thus gives some curious details as to the nature of the effervescence reigning amongst the rural population at that period. He also gives some amusing information as to the ways of living of simple, well-to-do people, and he says: "The food was coarse but abundant. It consisted of rye and maize bread, chestnuts, radishes, and roots; meat was seldom seen, except on special high days and holidays. Butter was so little used that a sister of my grandfather, who died at the age of ninety, told me in 1832 that she had never tasted any!"

When speaking of the execution of Marie-Antoinette, he quotes the words of a lady of rank, who, as he quaintly expresses it, "rose from the lowest rung of the ladder to the high station she afterwards adorned":—

The Queen was quite alone in a market-cart between Sanson and his assistants. Her hands were tied behind her back. She wore a white camisole, and a cap on her head, which had been tied on crooked (!) She reached the Place de la Révolution by way of the Rue Royale, and was driven right round it to the guillotine, which was erected on the spot where the obelisk now stands. She was as white as a sheet, and trembled so that she had to be helped out of the cart. She was lifted rather than assisted on to the scaffold. Sanson tore off her cap, and in a moment all was over.

The Empire furnished Dr. Poumiès with the subject of one of the most interesting chapters of his work, abounding in curious anecdotes and remarks. He describes the climax of Napoleon's popularity, the extraordinary brilliancy of his Court, and the frenzied enthusiasm with which the people welcomed the news of the King of Rome's birth. We soon see, however, thanks to Dr. Poumiès' records, that the favour Napoleon enjoyed with the population of France began to diminish as his insatiable demands for recruits continued to augment, and the author of "Recollections of a Parisian" makes even the following statement:—

A curious characteristic of that epoch was the great number of hunchbacks and cripples to be seen amongst the students. Conscription, the volunteer service, and the military schools monopolised the flower of our young men, leaving behind only the weak and sickly, whose physical disadvantages unfitted them for service. It may be said, in passing, that this influence exercised great influence on the population of France. The sons of those men inherited the disabilities of their fathers, and manly beauty and height suffered perceptible diminution. The standard of the army has several times been lowered.

After having successively dealt with the Restoration and the reign of Louis-Philippe, during which there was a severe epidemic of cholera, of which Dr. Poumiès in his quality of physician gives a striking description; after having retraced the principal events of 1848, our author next turns his attention to the Presidency of Louis-Napoléon. But although giving many anecdotes of the President, he omits to speak of the Coup d'Etat of December 2nd, 1852, and passes to an account of the entry of the Emperor into Paris. In conclusion he declares—

This day of rejoicing has been one of the gayest Paris has ever seen. . . . I must admit that even the dissentients, who would have preferred a President to an Emperor, were quite ready to agree that the Government of Louis-Napoléon was the only one that offered a fair prospect of peace and comfort.

Alas! the words of Dr. Poumiès were to be brutally contradicted in the near future!

The "Recollections of a Parisian" form a delightful volume which we are sure will meet with as much appreciation from those thoroughly versed in French history as by those who ignore certain details of some political events of the last century. It is all the more captivating because written quite simply, without affectation or search after style or effect. The personality of the author can always be felt in his annotations, and is most sympathetic, for he possessed both wit and humour, if we may be permitted to judge by this short entry in his diary—

March, 1855. I have just published a small volume of poems called "Les Moments Perdus." In a dedication addressed to my friends and colleagues I wrote—"I dispense you from either acknowledging this little work, thanking me for it, reading it, or even discussing it with me."

Shall not these lines be the best witness of the original character of M. Poumiès de la Siboutie, and do they not, indeed, give one a desire of reading the work of such a remarkably modest author?

Crime and Insanity. By DR. C. A. MERCIER, F.R.C.P., F.R.C.S., Author of "Text-book of Insanity," &c.

THERE was never a day in which there was less reason for any man to remain in ignorance of the main matters of interest in the world. In "Every Man" the choice of the world's reading has been made accessible at the modest price of a shilling. A short while ago Messrs. Williams and Norgate issued the first ten volumes in their new venture of placing original copyright monographs on matters of universal interest by specialist authors at the disposal of readers at that same price. We shall soon begin to look askance at any volume that demands a larger payment, for here, now, is the second ten, which in themselves cover a sufficiently wide scope of interest, but in connection with the earlier ten form the basis of a home university indeed. The choice of that title was bold; but it has been more than indemnified.

In this day of emigration Africa is attracting increasing attention. Canada and Australia are losing some of their glamour; while the interests in Africa are in the ascendant, particularly Rhodesia and Uganda, which, as Sir Harry Johnston says in his volume, "The Opening up of Africa," he, with Sir Alfred Sharpe and Mr. A. J. Swann, supported by the great Cecil Rhodes, endeavoured to link up; but failed in that endeavour owing to the interposition of Germany. No better or more competent man could have been chosen for the subject. He would have been better advised, we think, had he treated it in rather a less recondite way. Still, it is wonderful what he covers. His book sketches from prehistoric times to the present day, where so much of it has been painted red, in accordance with Rhodes' ambition. In the historical field Mr. W. H. Davis' name needs no introduction. He and Professor Oman are probably the two modern Englishmen most fitted to speak of the Middle Ages. In so short a review as this is, it is, of course, impossible to treat his volume on "Mediæval Europe" as fully as it deserves, or as we should have liked to have done. So praise must suffice in the stead of analysis. Those who know the subject will wonder how it could possibly be treated in 60,000 words. Yet it has been done; not only have all the essentials met their due, but the whole atmosphere of the time has been conveyed in a wonderful way. Its value is increased by the fact that there seems to have been no volume on this vital subject accessible at a reasonable price.

One of the features in this library is the fact that each subject is treated by its most competent authority in England. There is no one more fully equipped for a treatment of "Mohammedanism" than Professor Margolionth. He is the Professor of Arabic at Oxford, and is the author of an exemplary, if too unappreciative, book of Mahomet. In his present book he traces the military conquests of Mohammedanism, and analyses carefully and fully its theory, practice, its sects and orders, and its literature and art. In "The Science of Wealth" Mr. Hobson has a subject that many of his readers would desire to speak more competently on from experience; failing which they will turn to Mr. Hobson, and discover that it is not personal wealth he is thinking of at all, but the distribution, structure, and purport of the wealth of a nation. It is, in fact, a study in economics. Within its limits it is an excellent book. Its faults are the faults of its subject, which is at best a chop-logical one. "Health and Disease" is an important theme, and, again, it is in adequate hands. How it avoids the mere platitudes of hygiene, and strikes deeply into the true philosophy of its subject, will appear from the titles of its two opening chapters, which are "What is Health?" and "The Causes of Death." "Overcrowding and the Structure of the Home" he treats of carefully; as also the important subject of "Immunity."

We wonder how many will be able to follow Mr. Whitehead through his "Introduction to Mathematics." It caused us to furbish up the odd corners of our neglected mathematical education, and finally left us gasping. In his "Symbolism of Mathematics" we glowed; as also in his "Trigonometry." But the Conic Sections and the Differential Calculus! And for a shilling! It is amazing. In the "Animal World," by Professor Gamble, and "Evolution," by Professors J. Arthur Thomson and Patrick Geddes, we touch subjects that are accessible in other cheap editions. Yet neither book is a mere handbook. It is the charm of this series that each volume is touched with individuality. The book on Evolution treats of many matters that are only now receiving detailed attention, such as Mendelism. Moreover, in both books, special subjects are easily turned up; such is the system of arrangement.

"Liberalism" in the hands of Professor Hobhouse forms an interesting subject. His treatment is limited by the fact that he considers his subject as an organisation for all time, instead of regarding it as subject to fluctuation as the Whiggism out of which it grew. He does not wholly avoid necessary criticism; but in treating of Cobden he does seem ever to have canvassed the conception that the logical outcome of his principles would be a brutalised Nietzscheism. To the last volume, that by Dr. Mercier on "Crime and Insanity," we turned with the greatest eagerness, and were not a little disappointed. The sociological aspect of crime he treats fully and completely; but the metaphysical aspect of crime, the only really interesting aspect, and that which is closely allied to certain profound forms of insanity, he altogether neglects. One would never gather from his book that sometimes a sociological crime may happen to be a metaphysical duty. But that is incidental.

If a man were to master all these volumes, what a formidable conversationalist he would be.

MAHOMEDAN INDIA

History of the Rise of the Mahomedan Power in India, till the Year 1612 A.D. Translated from the Original Persian of MAHOMED KASIM FERISHTA by LIEUT.-COLONEL JOHN BRIGGS. Four Vols. (R. Cambray, Calcutta; Kegan Paul and Co. 30s. net.)

THIS is a reprint, not an original work; but, as it was first published in London so long ago as 1829, and has been out of print for sixty years and more, it has an appearance of newness, though presumably it has been accessible in reference libraries of any pretension to students of Indian history. The reissue has been brought out by an enterprising Calcutta firm of publishers who had already reproduced similarly the "Seir Mutagherin" (Manners of the Moderns), written in 1780 by Gholam Hossain, a noble courtier, also a valuable though lengthy account of the period between Aurangzib (who died in 1707) and Warren Hastings; it, too, was translated by Briggs. We may hope that the publishers will meet with sufficient response to encourage them to continue the series of reissues in which they have made such a promising commencement.

One object of all history is to get at the truth of the past. The facts must be correctly known before deductions are possible. And of no history is it more important for us to obtain accurate versions than of that of our Indian Empire. There are always before us the questions whether British rule is an improvement on the native governments, whether contemplated measures are antagonistic to native ideas, what lessons can be learnt from the mistakes as well as the successes of our predecessors in power. General Briggs records a warning against misconception of the Indian character, and claims for this history that it will be instructive, "if it be merely to show the certain effects of good and bad government among a people whom our ignorance disposes us to consider as devoid of moral energy, and who are prone to submit without resistance to the grossest oppression." Why was Akbar successful, and Aurangzib a failure? Their religious policies differed. The Portuguese failed in India because they persecuted the natives on religious grounds. The facts show, for instance, the grave seriousness attaching to religion in a country where it moves the whole population.

No history can be entirely contemporaneous. A writer must depend, as Thucydides avowedly did, on what he can collect from trustworthy sources. The genesis of the history before us is well known, and may be briefly stated. The author, Ferishta, was a Persian, born probably in 1570 on the border of the Caspian, but was taken, while a youth, by his father to Ahmadnagar, in the Indian Deccan. After some vicissitudes he, still being under twenty, reached the Court of Bijapur, one of the five independent kingdoms of the Deccan formed from the dissolution of the Bahmani dynasty. Welcomed by the King and Minister, he spent the remainder of his life there, was sometimes engaged in military expeditions, but devoted himself mainly to the composition of his great work. He mentions the Portuguese factory at Surat in 1611. Whether he died in 1611 or 1623 is uncertain, probably 1623. His history, written in Persian, is divided into twelve chapters, dealing with the events of thirteen independent kingdoms during some centuries, and the Saints of India. His introduction gives a very imperfect view of the Hindu period previous to the Mahomedan invasion, but from that time his work is valuable, beginning with the Ghaznevide dynasty about 977 A.D. He acknowledges his indebtedness to thirty-five original manuscripts consulted by him, which he names, while he quotes from some twenty other authors. In general he avoids prejudice and partiality, but is not entirely exempt from sectarian bitterness. He has been considered the most trustworthy of Oriental historians. In writing of Bijapur he specially denies having misrepresented facts for the purpose of obtaining pecuniary rewards. In the eighteenth century portions of Ferishta's work were translated by Colonel Dow in his "History of Hindustan" (known to Gibbon), and part was utilised by Captain Jonathan Scott in the "History of the Deccan." It remained for General Briggs, at Sir James Mackintosh's instigation, to translate the whole of Ferishta's production, and to add to it considerably by his account of the conquest, by the kings of Hyderabad, of certain territories now included in the Madras Presidency; by including a chronological epitome of the wars of the Portuguese in India as connected with the history of the Deccan; by tables of comparative chronology and genealogical tables of the Royal Families of each dynasty; by an alphabetical list of the proper names, titles, and Oriental words, with explanations attached, a similar list of geographical names, and a number of valuable notes throughout. He has, however, omitted the Saints of India, and, by using an earlier edition to translate from, he has missed some of Ferishta's latest additions. General Briggs (1785-1875) was in the East India Company's Madras Army, served in Persia, Satura, Mysore and Nagpur, and retired in 1838, and was F.R.S. He had intended to write a complete work on the Mahomedan Power in India, but his library was burnt in the sack of the Poona Residency by the Peshwa in 1817. His capacity as a translator may be accepted, though manuscript Persian is very difficult to handle when the diacritical points, which alone render orthography possible, are omitted.

The study of Indian history is hardly to be recommended as an exhilarating occupation; but apart from this it may be perused for instruction and utility. In Indian history particularly the number of names, often uncouth and always unfamiliar, is appalling; not even a Macaulay could retain them in his memory, and we deliberately avoid them as much as possible. But it is useful to understand what Ferishta tells us of the origin, rise, and extent of power of the Indian kingdoms, their internal administration and policy, and, lastly, the dissolution of all those whose end he lived to witness. Again, the inaccuracy of Indian historians is almost proverbial. They appear to regard their task as affording opportunities for braggadocio, for the glorification of a race, a dynasty, or an individual; they indulge in flowery language and rhodomontade which obscure the sense and possess no substance; their figures and dates often cannot be trusted: for instance, we have the duration of the Brahmanical Yooqs (periods of the world's existence) extending to millions of years, though no explanation of the calculation is offered or possible, as can be afforded in the modern estimates framed on geological facts; the number of soldiers engaged in battles is hopelessly exaggerated; an Oriental has no regard for time. But, while bearing these drawbacks in mind, we must remember that we shall get nothing better in the shape of Indian history than Ferishta has provided, and no one is likely to try to supersede General Briggs as a translator, though we understand that there is a lithographed edition of Ferishta, dated 1831. Our historian has shown great research in consulting authorities, but no chain is stronger than its weakest link; it is impossible now to test the veracity of the primal authorities.

Ferishta's work covers mainly the centuries from about 1,000 A.D. to the death of Akbar in 1605. Thus it narrates the invasion of Tamerlane the Tartar (1398) and his slaughter of 100,000 inhabitants of Delhi. Babar, who founded the Mogul Empire at Delhi after the battle of Panipat in 1526, was fifth in descent from Tamerlane, and Akbar was grandson to Babar. Before Ferishta's death the English had not asserted themselves generally in India. His history therefore treats of the pre-English period, and for that it will always be an indispensable authority. With these handy volumes the work of future historians will be facilitated. The publishers deserve to succeed in their enterprise of making them accessible.

THE BANDA ORIENTAL

Uruguay. By W. H. KOEBEL. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

HERE we have another volume of the South American Series, in which the several Republics of that Continent are being separately described. It is well that their amenities and potentialities as fields for the investment of capital should be thoroughly known. Mr. Koebel visited the country in 1910 and studied his subject carefully with local assistance. The State might with advantage be better introduced to the English public than it has been, considering that fifty millions sterling of English money are invested there, and its railways are chiefly under English management. But the South American Republics have not altogether had a good reputation, and they are far away. The history of Uruguay possesses some special features which may be briefly summarised.

Uruguay, on the East Coast of South America, between Brazil and Argentina, was discovered by the Spaniard Juan Diaz de Solis in 1512. The Spaniards were unsuccessful in several attempts to subdue the aboriginal Indians, the Charruas and others, but eventually prevailed at Montevideo, founding it in 1726, and in 1777 expelled the Portuguese who had settled at Colonia. In 1810 the South American War of Independence against the Spaniards commenced, and in 1814 Montevideo fell to the insurgents. The Spanish power in Uruguay was extinguished in 1824. On May 1st, 1829, the Independence of the State was formally acknowledged by Brazil and Argentina, both the Portuguese and Spaniards having been expelled.

But then began the period of internal struggles between rival competitors for power which have never ceased. It would be tedious to mention even the names of the adventurers, Generals and Presidents, who fought for office with alternating success and failure. Mr. Koebel compiled a list of 120 battles, but fortunately does not publish it. "Indians and Spaniards, Spaniards and Portuguese, Uruguayans and Spaniards, Uruguayans and Portuguese have fought together on countless occasions." The marvel is that, with so much recurring disturbance, civilisation has made so much progress. It speaks volumes for the energy and virility of the people, who are now composed of very mixed elements. The division of political parties into the Blancos and Colorados, the Whites and Reds, starting with the establishment of the Republic eighty years ago, is simple: the parties are divided by no political principle. The Colorados, the urban party, have been in power since 1864, and maintain themselves by controlling both the importation of weapons and the supply of horses to possible insurgents; the Blancos, the rural party, continue the apparently hopeless conflict with unabated ardour.

In spite of the constant revolutions the country is being developed. In his Appendix Mr. Koebel has furnished ample financial and commercial statistics, but a curious omission is noticeable in his book: he has nowhere stated the number of the population or even estimated it, though the area is given at 72,000 square miles. In fact, the Census of 1908 showed the population at 1,043,000—that is under fifteen persons to the square mile throughout. There are but few large towns; the capital, Montevideo, has only 400,000 inhabitants. In short, the Uruguay State, commonly known as the Banda Oriental, is chiefly pastoral, the Campo, or country, forming the greater part. But agriculture, especially the cultivation of wheat, is making progress; viticulture and fruit-growing are in some quarters established industries; seals are caught in numbers, and their skins and oil exported; the minerals are promising, but require working. There are seven railways, with a capital of fourteen millions, and 1,432 miles of line open, paying something over 4 per cent. interest, partly under Government guarantee, and seventy-eight miles under construction. Quite lately a Government loan of three millions for the State construction of 497 miles of light railways was announced. The imports from Great Britain still exceed those from any other country, but the ratio of increase is not proportionally maintained. Great Britain is losing ground, because her merchants do not cater for the Uruguayan trade with the same attention to detail, the same study of the requirements and knowledge of the languages as the Germans, French, and Americans adopt.

In a pastoral country, as Uruguay is, cattle-grazing and breeding naturally constitute the chief wealth; the estancias, or farms, abound in the Campo. In 1909 a census of the live stock showed a total of twenty-four million animals, of which the sheep numbered sixteen and the cattle nearly seven millions. The meat, frozen and dried, hides, wool, and by-products form the principal items of the export trade; the dairy industry is developing. At Fray Benton in 1910 more than 179,000 head of cattle were killed to produce Liebig's extract of meat. With its temperate climate, said to be one of the healthiest in the world, and a rainfall of forty-three inches, Uruguay has great natural advantages; the people are manly, sober, unostentatious, and civil, free from sycophancy; the beauty of the women is celebrated. If the senseless revolutions could only be stopped much greater progress would be attained, and capital would flow more freely into the country. Education is highly esteemed and encouraged throughout the State. Mr. Koebel has not painted the whole situation in couleur de rose, but has given a very readable description of the country and its affairs, which ought to prove useful to intending colonists and to add to the number of the English community, already fairly numerous, as British enterprise has asserted itself in the South American States.

VAGUE VERSES

The Crucibles of Time. By DARRELL FIGGIS. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS has lost nothing of the sincerity or the optimism which he showed in his first book, "A Vision of Life," but he has become much more self-conscious. He seems, as it were, oppressed with the necessity of speaking weightily, and he has developed a taste for subtle discourse and a fondness for such unattractive words as accipitrine, intricate, spilth, soilure, cincture, rondure, discinct, words which, with radiancy, effulgency, lustre, and the ideas they express, seem to represent to Mr. Figgis the Elizabethan spirit which he has been praised for expressing. As a matter of fact we find nothing Elizabethan in Mr. Figgis at present; quite un-Elizabethan is that fierce earnestness which welcomes the reiteration of the commonplace and even overlooks bathos. He sings, for example—

Yet with horror stricken saw we, for it settled, melted, dwindled, Seeming gradually less;
and

Oh, what is man without investiture!—

both of which remarks might have been fitly found in the pages of a humorous poet. And we seem to see a certain striving after effect in such a version of an old proverb as—

Never did sorrow trail a single course,
But keep the road in congregations, flocks,
And herded teams.

Mr. Figgis's short poems, of which he has a score or so in the present volume, show a rich vocabulary and an earnest outlook on life. In "To a Snowdrop," "Hanger Woods," and "To a Chrysanthemum," he attains more than this—namely, a real dignity and eloquence. The rest are of lesser worth. The "Ode to Music," though clever, and not a thing every one could write, is wordy and too facile, while such trifles as "Ad Intra," "Firelight," and the two triolets are merely album verse. There is a pretty song beginning—

Not cherry ripe nor roses,
Tho' picked from Summer's chalice.

"The Crucibles of Time" is the pièce de résistance of the volume, and, if only by reason of its length, calls for most remark. In a slightly artificial preface Mr. Figgis makes a suggestion of apology for treating such an ancient theme as the story of Job, but he evidently considers himself quite justified. Yet, after all, had he anything to say about Job which has not been said before? Had he any original aspect of that more than familiar story to put before us? Could he read any new philosophy into it or erect any deep character study upon it? We confess that we have not found anything of the sort. Mr. Figgis observes the Greek unity of place, he employs three messengers and two choruses, which sing in a manner not without a certain grandeur, but are not very helpful to the story nor fine enough as lyrics to stand by themselves. Mr. Figgis brings in Satan by the name of Mephistopheles, God by the name of The Presence, and invokes a rather vague spirit of the commonplace attitude to life in Job's wife. But there is nothing arresting in all this. Job is not a powerfully-drawn character, nor do any of the persons or personages emerge into great distinct-ness either of humanity or allegory. The poem has its good lines, but only too often do we find such pure verbiage as the following from a "Chorus of Furies":—

And then its music and song in an echo of rhythms heard From the voice of a mighty throng, like a single reverberate word,

Where anger is eaten of sorrow, and hatred whelmed of woe,
And mercy and tenderness borrow a mute soft passionate throe.

We will pay Mr. Figgis the compliment of saying he could go on like this indefinitely; these lines are good verse, such as not every versifier could produce, but they are very far indeed from being poetry. And it is just because we feel sure that Mr. Figgis can give us much better work than anything in "The Crucibles of Time" that we must express a particular regret for the large amount of mediocre matter included in it.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Chalkstream and Moorland: Thoughts on Trout-fishing. By HAROLD RUSSELL. (Smith, Elder and Co. 5s. net.)

MODERN angling literature abounds in pleasant books like this, well-written, redolent of the country. The quotation from "Henry VI." on the title-page furnishes the keynote to the pages that follow:

Lord, who would live turmoiled in the Court,
And may enjoy such quiet walks as these?

Modesty is not unbecoming in an angler, but the author is, if anything, too modest. Were his book more didactic in its aim there would be more truth in the sentence with which his Preface commences:—"It is incumbent upon any one who writes a new book about fishing to open with an apology." But the evident pleasure that Mr. Russell has found in writing these pages will find a ready echo in many of his readers; for when fishing is out of the question anglers delight in reading and talking about their favourite sport, and the imagination of anglers is their most cherished possession. In a book of light essays, such as this, one does not look for much that is new. Merely the headings of the chapters conjure up a series of delightful pictures. "The River Test in Summer and Autumn" is full of suggestion for one; to another "Loch-fishing in Scotland and Ireland" brings back half-forgotten memories of long days spent in pleasant places.

There is always something monotonous about the author who never misses his fish; but Mr. Russell has the courage to miss quite a fair proportion in print. It is evidently a failing of his to strike too hard, and a fly left in the mouth of a fish establishes friendly relations at once with the reader who has done the same at times himself. A genuine lover of the country, the author's wanderings by stream and lake are better reading than his excursions into angling literature, with which he seems to have little but a bowing acquaintance, chiefly through Bibliotheca Piscatoria. "Hope in Fishing" is discussed in the last chapter. Without hope who would be an angler? A sanguine disposition is essential to success with the rod. This is especially true of loch-fishing. "The fish are coming short," says the boatman, on days when trout after trout rises at the fly and is missed through no apparent fault of ours. Then the luck changes, every fish is firmly hooked, and memory records a red-letter day where everything promised a blank. Nil desperandum should be the motto of every angler.

Butterflies, and How to Identify Them. By the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Illustrated. (Charles H. Kelly 1s. net.)

WITHOUT wishing to "be a butterfly, born in a bower" (as the old song has it), the study of the various species of this beautiful insect will prove of delightful interest. In this little handbook the author describes all the known British species, of which there are said to be seventy-one, some of which are reputed only, while others are very rare. The cycle of life in the butterfly's story is from the egg, through the caterpillar stage, into that of the pupa, or chrysalis, from which the full-grown insect, or imago, emerges finally as the familiar butterfly. The booklet contains some capital illustrations depicting all these stages, while a coloured frontispiece shows the typical differences between butterflies and moths. In an exhaustive list the author gives full particulars of the imago, the larva, the pupa, the food-plant, and the locality where found. The young Nature-student and others will find this little work an excellent and complete guide to the subject with which it deals.

"Chicot" in America. By KERLE HOWARD. With Frontispiece. (Hutchinson and Co. 1s. net.)

MR. KERLE HOWARD, who has been touring through parts of the United States and Canada, writes pleasantly, not to say eulogistically, of all he saw and every one he met. He has even a good word to say for the New York police. "As a body they are kindly gentlemen, of superfine address and appearance. . . . The New York policeman is not only courteous, he will go to infinite pains to help you on your way." A few not very successful attempts at a certain dry humour are scattered through the pages, which originally appeared in The Sketch under the heading "Motley Notes." They contain nothing of sufficient interest to warrant their republication in book form.

THE two most noted American monthlies for July, Harper's and the Century, are excellent numbers. Mr. Richard le Gallienne's article in Harper's, "The Philosopher Walks Up-Town," is a discovery of romance in New York, and is charmingly illustrated with drawings by Lester Hornby. Illustrations, in fact, are a very strong feature; Mr. George Harding's pictures explanatory of his own contribution, "Wreckers of the Florida Keys," are really wonderful, and are splendid examples also of artistic printing. Chief in importance from a literary standpoint is "The Knights of Borsellen," a hitherto unpublished romance by Thackeray, with sketches also by him; this also appears in the Cornhill by special arrangement. Professor Walsh has a study of Elizabethan speech as represented by its survival in much of the Irish brogue of to-day—a most interesting and valuable article.

"Thackeray's London," by Lewis Melville, and "Thackeray in America," by J. G. Wilson, form the opening topical features of the Century. The travel articles, which are always so readable in this magazine, are well sustained by an account of a journey by motor-car beyond the Arctic Circle, and a close examination of "The Struggle for Existence in China," the latter by Professor E. A. Ross. The author gives an appalling description of the terrible fecundity of the Chinese and the manner of life of the teeming lower-class population. Fiction and verse, as usual, reach a high level.

In the "Musings Without Method" of Blackwood's this month the principal place is occupied by a very neat appreciation of the art of the late Sir W. S. Gilbert. "Linesman" has a capital article dealing with lovely Ceylon, and his account of the way in which the elephants work—and occasionally rebel—makes good reading. In this issue a new serial, entitled "A Safety Match," by Ian Hay, begins well.

The Empire Review deals with the Declaration of London in an article by T. Baty, D.C.L., LL.D., and with Australian Naval Defence (Admiral Henderson's recent proposal) in an energetic contribution by F. A. W. Gisborne. Other excellent pages contain "Stories of Indian Art," by Percy Brown; "Here and There in Mashonaland," by E. B. Baker; and a good description of a visit to the Kaieteur Falls of British Guiana, by E. R. Davson.

FICTION

Brother Copas. By "Q." (Arrowsmith, Bristol. 6s.)

SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH has not written a novel on conventional lines in his latest volume. "Brother Copas" contains little in the way of plot and very much in the way of quotation. If this easy-going chronicle is not destined to be placed side by side with "Major Vigoureux" it is nevertheless a book of considerable charm. It is whimsical, ironical, humorous, and "Q," with his deft pen, sees to it that when we laugh we do so with a hint of tears in our eyes.

The story deals with the inmates of St. Hospital—the Beauchamps and the Blanchminsters. This College of Noble Poverty provides the author with a variety of types. There is the Pastor of St. Hospital. He is a fine, old-world soul, a lover of the niceties of literary style, benign and courteous in all his doings, just the one to rule a number of old men whose worldly losses, for the most part, have not tended to sweeten their tempers. Then there is Brother Copas, who dearly loves to throw a fly across the Mere; a gay, learned old fellow, full of whims and fancies—a merry Dante. You cannot place him religiously. He appears neither Evangelical nor to favour certain ritualistic practices not strictly Protestant. There is a decided touch of the pagan in his make-up, and yet on account of his inherent goodness—a goodness on broad, manly lines—he is not out of place in a religious community, but rather adorns it with his presence. If Brother Copas sometimes reminds us that his creator compiled "The Oxford Book of English Verse" he makes up for his prolix quotations by being the staunch friend of Brother Bonaday and the charming lover of the little girl Corona.

The chief charm of this book lies in the description of Brother Copas and Corona. Precisely who Corona is must be left to the reader. Suffice it to say that she comes over from America, and takes up her abode in St. Hospital, to the infinite delight of Brother Copas, while to Brother Bonaday her coming awakens old memories. Corona is a precocious child, perhaps not very naturally drawn, but amusing and interesting. She can hunt for babies in a parsley-bed, make her golliwog wear pyjamas at night and a priestly robe in the day-time. All these things strike us as quite possible in a little girl of Corona's age; but when "Q" makes her exclaim, on seeing the brethren for the first time, "Save us! Seems I'd better start straight in by asking what news of the Crusaders," we begin to wonder if the quotation "And a little child shall lead them" is always desirable. But Corona is not invariably wound up by "Q" in this frenzied manner. She thinks like a child when she fancies that Miss Dickinson's canaries are really transformed and imprisoned pupils. She strikes a new note in the life of Brother Copas—a sweet, strong note, even if a little sad. We see the gulf that divides old age and childhood. Brother Copas tries to span it with many a fairy bridge; but for all that he cannot explain the meaning of the song that wells up into his heart, cannot tell her the meaning of the lines—

Now learn ye to love who loved never, now ye who have loved, Love anew!

He can only murmur, as he watches Corona deep in buttercups: "God grant that, at the right time, the right Prince may come to her over the meadows and discourse honest music."

The Ascent of the Bostocks. By HAROLD STOREY. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

THE account which Mr. Storey has to tell of "The Ascent of the Bostocks" is very realistic so far as it deals with the description of life which is led by people who have "got on" in the town of Selbury. Mrs. Bostock is a typical retired tradesman's wife hovering between her true and womanly feelings for the welfare and happiness of her husband and children and her worldly desire to be noticed and patronised by people who are a little higher up the social ladder than she is herself. The betrothal of her daughter Carry to a prospective Member of Parliament gives her great pleasure. Carry, however, merely regards marriage "as a serious and sensible arrangement for the mutual advantage of two persons," and holds the opinion that "feelings are mostly blood, and vary with age, health, and meals." As was to be expected, she soon tires of an engagement entered upon with these notions, and as her fiancé is equally desirous of terminating such an unsatisfactory state of affairs a way is found by which matters are eventually settled to the gratification of all parties concerned, and especially so to Mrs. Lena Webley, a young widow who from the very beginning was desirous of helping the prospective Member of Parliament by presenting to him her fortune, to say nothing of her hand and as much of a heart as she possessed. The story is not particularly exciting; there are one or two attempts at philosophy, and a few humorous passages. On the other hand, it is a book which one could take up during a spare hour and be well amused without having to trouble to think a great deal.

The Legacy. By MARY S. WATTS. (Macmillan and Co. 6s. net.)

If the authoress of this novel had compressed within some two hundred pages the story which it has taken her nearly four hundred to tell she might have been congratulated upon her work. Letty Breen, the heroine, is the only daughter of a rather disreputable man, and is brought up by a self-sacrificing mother in the home of a spendthrift and cadging old grandfather. Yet the family of Breen is held in high esteem for the glories of its past, and, though the scene is laid in America, reference is continually being made to ancestral blue blood and other things of a similar nature, which one does not somehow associate with up-to-date democracy as found in a small New England city. The development of Letty Breen's character is the kernel of the book. Accustomed only to needy circumstances, she marries a clerk in a small way of business, and eventually an intrigue with his employer is cut short by her husband's having an accident and becoming permanently weak-minded. After three years of this purgatory death releases her, and, though not in the least in love with him, she marries an impossible person, who is possessed of many dollars, and whom she knew as a boy. There is something lacking in the book, and the continual use of italics to emphasise conversation should not be necessary and is very irritating.

Other Laws. By JOHN PARKINSON. (John Lane. 6s.)

As a story Mr. Parkinson's latest book is curiously lacking in purpose. It is hard to believe that he has written it simply to show that conventional morality is often at fault, for that demonstration has been made so often in modern fiction as to have become almost a worse convention than the code it attacks. Nor does he give us much more than glimpses of the pioneer work in Central Africa which separates John Hawkins from Caroline Blackwood at the critical period of their love affair, and is the indirect cause of her marrying another man. The result of this lack of definite intention is a certain vagueness and a difficulty in perusal which is, if anything, increased by Mr. Parkinson's carelessness of the furniture of fiction. Nevertheless, he is an earnest writer with a point of view, and he gives us that rare and valuable impression of knowing more than he is able to tell. His characters are true to type, but scarcely more than types. Caroline Blackwood, in particular, fails to fill her important rôle quite satisfactorily. Cross, the journalist, who takes his work with an appalling seriousness, is lifelike; while Angela Philips, the zoologist, is amusing and inspiring; and Mr. Massey, the human vegetable, amusing and uninspiring. With a stronger theme Mr. Parkinson might have written a weighty book; as it is, his performance is a little colourless.

Where Day Begins. By ALFRED BUCHANAN. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

MR. ALFRED BUCHANAN has treated his readers to a strange mixture of melodrama and pessimism. "Where Day Begins" is a synonym for Australia, and the story concerns the career of a headstrong, impulsive ne'er-do-well of the name of Mordaunt. The fact that by birth he is illegitimate leads him to regard himself as a social Ishmael, and undeniable good looks render him a favourite with the women with whom he is brought in contact. He has a long intrigue with one Madeleine Trelvar, who during his absence in South Africa at the time of the Boer War marries his enemy and nominal father—a marriage which only seems to render Mordaunt more passionate and more impossible than before. After a short period of leave from the front, he rejoins his regiment and meets his death at the hands of his own countrymen for having broken the rules of war. The author states that to disarm criticism the latter incident belongs to history and not to fiction, and adds that "in one part of the world at least it created a profound sensation." Those who remember the Boer War will remember the case referred to, and it seems a pity that such a tragedy should have been taken as a peg whereon to hang a story.

THACKERAY*

(JULY 18TH, 1811-1911)

ALL the great Victorians have passed from among us. For in no true sense of the word can Thomas Hardy be called a Victorian. We may sit beside him perhaps in a theatre to-day, and we may notice the hand of age upon him, proclaiming him as one the splendour of whose days fetches back to the time when Browning, Meredith, Tennyson, Dickens, George Eliot, and Thackeray were in their height of fame. But a man's tribe is a matter of ancestry, not the hazard of environment; and by that infallible test Thomas Hardy is discovered to be an alien among those whom we call the Victorians, recognising a certain bond between them that does not bind him. His very choice of an alien form is an outward symbol proclaiming the difference. We think of "Adam Bede," "David Copperfield," and "Pendennis," and in each of them, through their individual distinctions, a certain common spirit is to be discovered uttering itself in various fashion. We go on, and in the infinitely richer, more various work of one but lately gone from us we see the same spirit articulating itself in Evan Harrington and Harry Richmond. But there the semblance arrests itself; and by that token we may know that the Victorian age is finally closed and completed, awaiting yet the final summary of its achievement.

* The Centenary Biographical Edition. With Biographical Introductions by his daughter, LADY RITCHIE. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net each.)

One by one, then, the great names of that age are stepping to the arresting challenge of their centenaries, and among them William Makepeace Thackeray is the first of the novelists who has to undergo this exacting ordeal. In a certain sense it would be just to say that the age was chiefly characterised by the special glory of the novel, in spite of the fact that the names of Tennyson, Browning, and, remotely, Francis Thompson, are to be included in it. Yet it must be remembered that the two first of these names in poetry themselves give witness to the priority of the novel in the fact that they obviously shaped much of their poetry having the novel in mind. It is difficult to imagine "The Ring and the Book" or "Maud" being written in any other age than one chiefly addicted to the novel. Yet the very form of the novel is itself distinctive, and for a wholly different reason. It may be safely said, for instance, that such novels as "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," and "The Newcomes" have been seen for the last time. To this result Thomas Hardy has contributed as much as any. Strictly, it is of course true that the novel derives primarily from Bunyan and Cervantes in final indebtedness; but, actually, Dickens and Thackeray, as the chief makers of the nineteenth-century novel, reach back through Scott no further than Richardson, Fielding, and Smollett. From them the inspiration came, and from them came too the rambling, formless fashion of the final result. But now the mystic word "architectonic" has been breathed over a disordered, yet somewhat splendid, chaos; and so the parts have begun actively to arrange and fashion themselves, and a final, well-ordered, and, it is to be hoped, not too exclusive a cosmos has begun to loom ahead for the novel. Novelists have already begun to speak, with adequately bated breath, of "mastering their medium;" and with that word we may see at once how far we have travelled since Thackeray and "Vanity Fair."

Thus, save for the one triumphant example of "Esmond," it happens that in celebrating Thackeray's Centenary we are also taking our leave of him as a novelist. That does not mean to say, necessarily, that there shall be no more novels as long as "Vanity Fair" or "Pendennis;" it means rather that, however lengthy novels may be, it shall be required of them to proceed with the matter they have undertaken to tell, and that if their author be possessed of the very legitimate desire to tell us the thoughts touching the weighty things of life that his matter has awoken in him he shall convey them preferably in the colour and happenings of his narrative, or at least cause them materially to explain and progress the business in hand. In this it is sometimes hard to keep patience with Thackeray. His prolixity is not the prolixity of an abundant narrative: it is rather the fault of the showman (and, it must be confessed, too often the impertinent showman) who mingles with his characters, not to laugh with them or weep with them, but to chuckle unhappily at them, with sidelong glance, or sneer openly at them to their faces. Nothing can be imagined more calculated to irritate the mind than this. We can abide the voice in our ear that excitedly explains the course of the action to us. We can even tolerate the showman who seeks to aid our sense of illusion—as moral reflections and subtle expositions and diagnoses may well do. But such a showman as this but excites our impatience and stirs our disgust, because he, even he whose task it is to throw a glamour of desirable illusion about us, is also in league against us to destroy it by his cynicism.

This faculty was ever prevalent in Thackeray's work. It has been said that in none of his novels is there a hero or heroine for whom we are not sometimes stirred to contempt. Harry Esmond (his creator himself said it) is not a little of a prig; Beatrix, Esmond in his most dignified and most manly of moments turned away from himself as heartless and vapid, for all her brilliance of charm; Major Pendennis is of the world worldly, and empty at that; even Colonel Newcome only holds us completely at the moment of his death. To say that the fault of this lay with Thackeray himself will seem to be like announcing the obvious, since it was he who made them. But the statement is true in a subtler way than appears to be the case at first flush. For if ever one of his characters seemed by any chance to be shaping for the noble, at once the showman would step forward and seek to make him or her appear lugubrious by some or other suggestion of mixed motives. This was so when Thackeray was engaged depicting the gay and heroic. When, therefore, he turned to a show of life that was in itself of questionable repute, the result was to immerse the reading mind in an odour and flavour of things that it turned from in distaste. After a continuous and lengthy reading of "Vanity Fair," a fierce, south-easterly gale on hill tops, or a crystal frost, or pinewoods in Spring when young buds are awake, are required to purge and clarify the mind again. There is nothing impure in life or on earth save the minds of some men; and therefore we feel that it is Thackeray chiefly who is responsible for our distaste—not life. That is to say, he has not dealt honestly with life, with his own soul, or by us.

The lamentable pity of all this is that through all his work we are haunted by a sense of his genius. Few could be so lugubrious on occasion as he; yet, even when most lost to a sense of fitness and dignity, through his faults there flash continually on us strange lights in revelation of his genius. It is declared that as he wrote the famous chapter in "Vanity Fair" where Rawdon Crawley discovered Becky's faithlessness (chapter xviii. of the second volume in the present edition) the ejaculation broke from him, "Genius, by God!" Who can help but approve the cause of his exclamation, or fail to think of many other marked instances that could supply a cause not less sufficient? But the fact is, that even when we are least positive of the genius we are most certain that we could not affirm its absence. It is this elusive charm about him that binds us to him even when we are most dissuaded by his unhealthy sidelong glance at life. Where, for example, can one discover a more delicate balance of style, a purer charm of expression, than his? Even when he left it most unchastened one can always divine the inner beauty beyond the excrescences. Where shall one know a more adequate or more natural conveyance of dialogue? Or where may we seek to find a more restrained dignity of deportment in his characters when occasion requires it? Take the scene already mentioned, where Colonel Crawley finds Lord Steyne with Becky, with, by way of instance, such a strangely contained and riveting sentence as "And he struck the peer twice over the face with his open hand, and flung him bleeding to the ground." Take Esmond's repudiation of his Jacobite faith, his breaking of his Jacobite sword before the face of the last Jacobite libertine, in the thirteenth chapter of the third book of "Henry Esmond." Or the justly famous death of Colonel Newcome, with the wonderful last paragraph beginning "At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll." Their strength is in their restraint. Comparisons are invidious, but one is puzzled to think what Dickens would have made of such scenes.

What, then, is the cause of this dissatisfaction so often stirred in us? Some have said that he is a cynic, others that he is a sentimentalist. Is it possible to discover the central thing in him that shall explain these several, and seemingly contrary, impressions his work leaves on this hand and on that? For one thing, it should never be forgotten the manner of man he was. Objective art or subjective art, no man can write other than the things that are in him, and no man can help but write out the things that are in him. Thackeray was no exception to this. Firstly, he was an Englishman; and, except for the fact that there was very little of the Falstaff in him, he might fitly be called a very typical Englishman—that is to say, all those noble impulsions that go to make the very loftiest art he was not only afraid of, he was half-ashamed of them. Art is compact of nothing so much as the grand passions of the soul, and when these came upon Thackeray he (speaking in the way of symbol) cast his eye hurriedly right and left to see what others thought of the figure he was cutting. He never knew anything of the grand abandon of the soul on fire. As has been said, he was afraid and ashamed of the divine fury the things he handled would awake in him. He sought refuge from it, and he found his refuge in only three possible retreats. He took refuge in a punctilious and meticulous rectitude, when he became a prig. Or he found shelter in a half-faltering scepticism at the expense of the genuineness of the passion awakened, when he promptly took shape as a cynic. Or he sought to baulk the passion of its urgency by turning half of it astray, and letting the lesser half of the stream filter mandolin-fashion down his page, when at once he was a sentimentalist.

Now, at one time or another, Thackeray is all of these things. Nothing can better test such a type of man than to give him poetry to write or to read. A blushing face, a smirking smile, and a stammering demeanour are the inevitable results: and the more genuine and potent the emotion stirred in him by its appeal, the more marked and inevitable are those characteristics. And so it is with Thackeray. Take this verse he gives to his Jeames for the expression of his love:—

When moonlike ore the hazure seas
In soft effulgence swells,
When silver jews and balmy breeze
Bend down the Lily's bells;
When calm and deep, the rosy sleep
Has lapt your soul in dreams,
R Hangeline! R lady mine!
Dost thou remember Jeames?

How extraordinary it is! He cannot deny himself the impulsion to loveliness and beauty; but it suffuses him with blushes, and so he endeavours to turn it to burlesque. It has been said of him that he even blushed furiously as he penned his love-scenes. That can very well be believed. Probably he imagined himself being watched by some fellow-member of the Garrick Club.

The effect of this was all the more marked since he was possessed of so extraordinarily receptive a mind. Few things that passed him were unperceived by him; and what he perceived he analysed, criticised, and retained. Had he only possessed the godlike faculty of absolute abandon, there is no telling what he might not have achieved: but this demands the instinct of faith and a pure soul. The man who said "My vanity would be to go through life as a gentleman, as a Major Pendennis" was obviously debarred from it. Not that he meant what he said; though it is evident that he meant a good deal of it. But that he should have said it is quite sufficient: for thereby he sought to deny the best in him.

Yet this very faculty, while it led to the faults that have already been noticed, led also to his one supreme excellence. Truly speaking, the more restrained he is, the more supreme he is. The avoidance of abandon that led to his cynicism, his desire for satire and caricature, his sentimentalism, his priggishness, led also, when instinct guided him aright, to the strength of restraint. In the passages from his works that outstand as the memory's great landmarks this is the virtue that characterises them all. And when he elected, not only to restrain his characters and his manner of narration, but also to restrain himself by the severe ordeal of subduing his hand and mind to the autobiographic narration of one of his own creations—why, then he blossomed to his one perfect flower of achievement in Henry Esmond, and the wholly different, yet not less successful, Barry Lyndon. In both of them the showman is dismissed; and in the first of them, at least, the style has a certain grace of expression not to be outdone in or out of his work. Some have said that the affinity between the styles of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries was proved in the fact that when Thackeray desired to achieve the earlier manner it was only necessary for him to chasten slightly his ordinary style, and make some slight conversational alterations as, for example, "'tis" for "it's." But this is not so. The chastening of the style was due to the necessity for personal restraint. And, for the rest, he himself in life and spirit was always more attuned to the eighteenth century than to his own age.

Of his life we do not know much. Wisely, perhaps, he ordained that there should be no official biography of him. The completest hints we have yet had are to be found in the biographical introductions his daughter has supplied to this Centenary Edition. Yet these are written with what is, perhaps, a justifiably pious grace, rather than with a desire to let the utmost be known. From them, however, and from the friendly biographies already printed, a very accurate impression of the man and his life can be gathered. And it is even such a man, and even such a life, as one would have expected. It is almost the typical life of a man in the eighteenth century. A haunter of taverns and clubs, he might have been the associate of Steele and Addison, rather than one who lived in the nineteenth century. Thus it was that when he came to write "Henry Esmond" he had only to depict his own desires and emotions to achieve a perfect verisimilitude. Yet it left its brand. Nature never blew through the eighteenth century; Nature never blew through Thackeray's life; Nature never blows through Thackeray's novels. They are of the town, towny; and a little stuffy withal.

"ABOVE SUSPICION," AND "BUNTY PULLS THE STRINGS"

MR. HERBERT TRENCH, whose special gift it is and whose métier it was only to produce those plays which the public does not want—plays of idea, of temperament, of idealism, in a word plays for a repertory—has gradually fallen into line with the ordinary—very ordinary—theatrical manager. The result is peculiarly paradoxical. When he produced plays which he was perfectly certain the public did not want, he was amazingly successful; but now that he produces, one after another, the plays which he is perfectly certain they want very much indeed, he meets with absolute failure. For all that, the Haymarket Theatre remains the most interesting theatre in London. Its attempt at unpopularity, "The Blue Bird," brought about an unprecedented bombardment of the box-office, and achieved that unpleasantly commercial event—a record. His various attempts at great popularity have brought about no ordinary kind of failure, no undistinguished half-failure, no ignominious slinking out of the bill, accompanied by an absence of paragraph as undignified as it is untheatrical. Mr. Trench has failed in the grand manner. He has always gone down with flags flying and a "chat" in the Sunday paper which deals mainly in futures. Also, he has given his failures every possible chance to succeed, and, in spite of all temptation, has remained an Irishman.

An old piece, an old and mechanical piece, of Sardou's, which had been seen only at a special matinée, was "discovered," translated (and well translated) by a Mr. William Morpeth, given into the hands of an absolutely admirable company, put on to perfection, and called, for no obvious reason, "Above Suspicion." Why Mr. Trench imagined that it contained any of the elements of a popular success it is impossible to understand. It certainly had one very dramatic, very ingenious, and very well constructed Act. In order to arrive there, however, the audience was obliged to sit through three Acts that were dull and boring, and in which there was an amazing number of unintentionally comic moments. It was one of those pieces which the public could not possibly want, especially the sophisticated public of London and the suburbs. The only purpose it served was to give Miss Alexandra Carlisle an opportunity of proving that she is an actress of considerable emotional power. Handicapped as she was with a part marionette-like in its obvious mechanism, Miss Carlisle succeeded in putting into it a good deal of life and humanity. It was an admirable performance, quiet, sincere, interesting, and at times powerful. Mr. Aubrey Smith, as a foolish Judge, had no chance until the last Act, when his dignity and steadiness were altogether invaluable. Mr. C. V. France and Mr. Charles Maude almost persuaded us that they were human beings. They can be awarded no higher praise. Miss Helen Haye and Miss Ellen O'Malley appeared. People are in the habit of saying—it has become almost the thing to say—that such and such plays would not "do" for the Haymarket. One or two more of these translations from the French will inevitably "do" for it. The Haymarket, like all other theatres, has no special public of its own. It attracts playgoers only when its fare is, according to them, worth paying for; otherwise they avoid it. Any attractive play does for the Haymarket just as well and no better than it does for Wyndham's or the Comedy or Prince of Wales's, and then only if it is properly stage-managed, advertised, and cast.

A Scots play, acted by Scots actors, called "Bunt Pulls the Strings," follows upon the heels of "Above Suspicion"—the absolutely natural rises phoenix-like upon the ashes of the utterly mechanical. It is a triumph for Mr. Graham Moffat, author and actor. "Bunt Pulls the Strings" is a simple, homely, fresh, delightful piece, the very glorification of the commonplace. The scene is laid in the village of Lintiehaugh round about 1860, so that the costumes are, as quaint as the dialect; and what plot there is centres round Tammas Biggar, an elder of the Kirk, his money troubles and his matrimonial entanglements. There is however, very little plot. The charm and delightfulness of the play is arrived at by the wonderful excellence of the character-drawing, the spontaneous fun and pathos of the dialogue, and the long series of rich comedy scenes. The whole thing is of its kind a gem. It is Barrie without any of his fantasy; Barrie in a simple mood. It is Robert Burns—sober. We should be tempted thoughtlessly to call the piece photography accompanied by the gramophone were there not in it an underlying touch of art which raises it to the level of brilliant painting. "Buntty Pulls the Strings" is without argument the best and purest comedy seen in London for many a weary year. Mr. Graham Moffat is not only to be congratulated as an author, but as an actor. His performance of Tammas is a thing of joy; so also is that of Miss Kate Moffat as Buntty, who manages everything so cleverly. Indeed, the acting of the whole company is something of a revelation, and is quite equal to that of the Irish players at their best and simplest. Between Scotland and Ireland, England—or at any rate London—cannot hold up its head. Even in this hot weather, at the fag end of an exhausting season, "Buntty Pulls the Strings" should fill the Haymarket for many weeks. To Mr. Cyril Maude is due the honour of having recognised the gifts of Mr. Moffat and his family.

"ARIADNE IN NAXOS"

ON Sunday evening the Poets' Club produced "Ariadne in Naxos," which is the second part of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's recently-published trilogy of God and Man, "The Agonists." Mr. Hewlett does not follow the story of the Odyssey, in which Artemis slays Ariadne with the consent of Dionysus (Bacchus) at Dia before she could reach Athens with Theseus. On the contrary, he takes the current legend, and Ariadne does not meet Dionysus until the moment of her despair at being abandoned by Theseus at Naxos. When Theseus slew the Minotaur, that monster with human body and bull's head, and so freed Athens from the yearly tribute exacted by Crete, he sailed for home, taking Ariadne with him for his bride, for she had assisted him to find his way through the labyrinth in which he fought the fearsome creature. On his homeward voyage Theseus rested at Naxos, an island of magic, in which music is heard in the air, and the fumes as of new wine are borne on the breeze. In "Ariadne in Naxos" Mr. Hewlett, through the medium of fiery and rhetorical verse, once more relates the story of the desertion of Ariadne by Theseus, and of her passionate wooing by Bacchus. To Theseus, who is overcome by the magical influence of the island, appears Dionysus. The latent ambition of war and glory within Theseus is readily ignited by the dissolute and drunken god, the very breath issuing from whose nostrils would conquer a hero of much sterner mould. The new-found bride and Naxos are soon left behind. When Ariadne returns from her libations she is quickly disillusioned by the Cretan maidens, who tell how "the Olympian breathed upon him." Music carried on the wind heralds the approach of Dionysus "to make of her heart Love's wild garden." Filled with fear and despair, Ariadne struggles in vain with the magic which already has so successfully worked its spells upon her unfaithful husband. Her fears, her beseechings, and her fidelity fight a losing battle with the lightnings from those sensuous eyes, and her feeble frame is inflamed by a passionate and destroying love for the beautiful and vicious god. The triumph is but short-lived; the realisation of the immortality of the god and the arrival of news from Athens produce a terrible revulsion of feeling and kindle such a sense of shame that death works a hard, but speedy, retribution.

Mr. Hewlett's play is of literary rather than dramatic interest, and the "Ariadne" suffers because of the length and moralisings of many of the speeches; some of the verse savours of platitude, and other portions lack lucidity owing to their incoherent expression and absence of rhythmic grace. Nor should the scene be continuous: the transitions of Ariadne through love for Theseus, joy, despair, fear of Dionysus, passionate love, infidelity, and shame to death are so arbitrary and so obviously a part of the story that we rebel. Mr. Godfrey Tearle, who played the part of Dionysus, was a sensuous and seductive figure, out of whose eyes shone the joy of life, and whose mouth betokened the god's appetite for the souls of men; while the Theseus of Mr. Claude King was a picture of martial dignity. Miss Grace Lane exhibited the changing emotions and passions of the unhappy and unfaithful Ariadne as vividly as could be expected. The chorus of Cretan maidens, who play an important part in the tragedy, have speeches which lend themselves to declamation rather than to the conversational style of diction, and require great stage experience and articulative ability. The weakness of this portion of the cast probably accounted for the occasional tedium and lack of cohesion. Their frenzied dance was thoroughly emblematic of the shameless Bacchus and of his passionate and scorching speeches. The reception of the play was exceedingly cordial.

"THE FANTASTICKS" AT THE REHEARSAL THEATRE

THE Adelphi Play Society, under the direction of Mr. Maurice Elvey, scored a distinct success on Sunday evening last in their presentation of Edmond Rostand's comedy, "The Fantasticks." Artificial and obviously farcical the situations may be—the same may be said of "The Importance of Being Earnest;" but no ordinary, sensible man can resist, or need wish to resist, the laughter inspired by such clever absurdities. If only the game of cross-purposes, which provides so much material for the stage, were always exploited with so skilful a hand, there would be little reason to complain of lack of amusement in our theatres.

The two old fathers, Bergamin and Pasquin, whose mock opposition to their respective son's and daughter's love-affair incites the young couple to more impassioned declarations than ever—which was precisely the old folks' idea—were made to live before the audience in the persons of Mr. Allan Jeayes and Mr. Cassells Cobb, and the scene where they are caught by the lovers fraternising across the dividing garden-wall, and are therefore compelled suddenly to pretend a violent quarrel, was exceedingly amusing. Mr. Leslie Gordon took the part of Straforel, the bravo hired to carry through an abduction of the lovely Sylvette (Miss Irene Clarke), as to the manner born; he looked every inch a villain, and fairly brought the house down with his recital of the various methods of abduction and the charges for same. He and his minions, beautifully permitting themselves to be "pinked" by Percinet, Sylvette's lover, expired (temporarily) in graceful attitudes in the garden which was the scene of their labours; but Straforel, with his last dying effort, manages to present his account, extended on the point of his rapier, to the two amazed and fatherly plotters. It was extremely funny; and so was Percinet's scene with Sylvette, when he begs permission to recite some verses he has composed, and begins proudly: "The Fathers' Feud: A Poem: Book the First." Mr. Maurice Elvey acted with splendid verve as the gallant lover, and Miss Irene Clarke played in the real spirit of comedy, daintily and demurely as the occasion demanded, a part which was by no means easy.

It was perhaps a risky venture to render the play in rhymed couplets, but for once, suggestive as the form is of the weary pantomime and its puns, it did not irk the nerves of the listeners. This was doubtless due to the capital enunciation of the actors. When the good Bergamin or Pasquin merely muttered, each word was perfectly audible, and not a spark of the very witty dialogue was lost. Quaint and charming as "The Fantasticks" is, it requires a special care and aptitude to render the peculiar quality of its burlesque, and we can congratulate the Adelphi Play Society on its caste. The audience was enthusiastic, and showed its appreciation heartily.

"THE GREEN ELEPHANT"

MR. MAURICE BARING'S comedy deserved a better fate. Charming written, with neat and humorous characterisation and a very ingenious plot, it should not have been entrusted to Miss Gertrude Kingston to throw away at the end of the season, with a mere moderate company and rehearsals which were not sufficient to permit her to master her lines. "The Green Elephant" must be added to the long list of good and even brilliant plays which have been sacrificed at the altar of managerial ineptitude. Lady Warburton was a part altogether beyond Miss Kingston's powers. It needed an actress with a sense of character and sufficient sense of humour to know that the part was killed directly it was not played seriously. Miss Kingston's sense of humour is dangerous to all comedy parts, because she laughs at herself and destroys the meaning and intention of the author. She put an entirely different construction upon her lines by appearing to enjoy them. It is not too much to say that, in our opinion, "The Green Elephant" was not seen as it was written on its first performance, and was wholly misunderstood in consequence. If Lady Warburton had been in the efficient hands of Miss Marie Tempest "The Green Elephant" would have lived to a ripe age.

Then, too, the play was not produced well. Many of the movements of the actors were meaningless. The pace was horribly slow. It was conspicuously miscast. Only one actor—Mr. H. de Lange—seemed to have any knowledge of his work, any finish, any of the spirit of light comedy. Mr. Augustin Duncan, who played the Secretary and was really the thief, had his excellent moments, but he was uninteresting—a word which must be applied to all the other members of the company. Miss Darragh is a melodramatic actress. Her intensity and clutching methods were not right for the well-drawn character of Mrs. Motterway, a well-bred, self-indulgent, very pleasant, very foolish, very ordinary youngish society woman. Miss Darragh would have been admirable in "The Worst Woman in London." Mr. Hubert Harben, as the rather irritating husband, Sir Henry Warburton, bored where he should have amused. Mr. Wilfred Forster did not suggest the Rupert Harvard of Mr. Baring's imagination for a moment. He seemed to have forced his way into the Warburton's house from one of the Oxford-street linendrapers. Mr. Charles Quartermain as the roystering, but wholly pleasant, Anthony Pollitt was too fretful, too jerky, too nervous, and Miss Marjorie Patterson made the crystal-gazer an unsympathetic instead of a charming and interesting young woman.

It will be seen, then, that the play stood no reasonable chance. Scene after scene was muddled. Clever, natural lines, full of quiet satire and delicious humour, were spoken ignorantly. The ingenuity of the plot was misunderstood, and when the train of powder, so carefully laid down by the author, was fired in the last Act the report, which should have surprised the house, was no louder than that of a match held in the flame of a candle. In Mr. Maurice Baring, however, the stage has one of its most promising recruits. He has a very pretty pen. He has also something which the majority of our recognised dramatists conspicuously lack—a first-hand acquaintance with the people of whom he writes. Beyond these two things he has stagecraft and a sense of the dramatic. It is to be hoped that his next play will fall into more expert hands.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

"L'ART," by Auguste Rodin (Grasset, 6f.), which has just been published, with more than a hundred photographs illustrating the master's finest works and drawings, is of the highest possible interest, as it condenses all Rodin's theories on Art. These pages, collected by the well-known critic Paul Isell, appeared a few months ago serially in La Revue, where they attracted much attention, as the elevated thoughts contained in them are expressed in a very pure, concise, and poetic language. Rodin reveals himself not only as an impassioned lover of his art, but also as a very deep and serene thinker.

According to him, Art consists in thought, in dreams, and these being no longer found in modern life, Art has also disappeared. He makes the following fine confession of faith:—

L'Art c'est la contemplation, c'est le plaisir de l'esprit qui pénètre la Nature, et y devine l'esprit dont elle est elle-même animée. C'est la joie de l'intelligence qui voit clair dans l'univers, et qui le recrée en l'illuminant de conscience. L'Art c'est la plus sublime mission de l'homme, puisque c'est l'exercice de la pensée qui cherche à comprendre le monde, et à le faire comprendre. . . . L'Art c'est encore le goût. C'est, sur tous les objets que façonne l'artiste, le reflet de son cœur.

M. Paul Isell describes Rodin's way of working in his great studio of the Rue de l'Université. Contrarily to some artists, who oblige their models to assume some determined and immovable attitude, Rodin pays his simply to live around him, striking any pose they like, whilst he fixes in some rapid sketches the various and fugitive movements. It is thus that he has been able to familiarise himself to such an extent with all the variations of muscle play, and it is this which gives to his statues that semblance of life and movement which distinguishes them from the works of so many other sculptors.

In a series of wonderful chapters Rodin deals successively with various bases of inspiration, and he even asseverates that for an artist all is fine in Nature, for in Art "only that which possesses character is beautiful." He also considers that that which in Nature is esteemed ugly by the majority is in reality beautiful from an artistic point of view, on account of the "interior truth" which is thus seen to greater advantage.

Il n'y a de laid dans l'Art, que ce qui est sans caractère, c'est à dire qui n'offre aucune vérité extérieure ni intérieure. Est laid dans l'Art ce qui est faux, ce qui est artificiel, ce qui cherche à être joli ou beau au lieu d'être expressif, ce qui est mièvre et précieux, ce qui sourit sans motif et se manière sans raison, ce qui se carre et se cambre sans cause, tout ce qui est sans âme et sans vérité, tout ce qui n'est que parade de beauté et de grâce, tout ce qui ment.

As will be seen from the above quotation Rodin deems that a work of art should above all be expressive; and his idea that in all works of art, and especially in sculpture, beauty is composed of the interior signification contained therein, recurs in the several divisions of his book. Particularly interesting are the pages in which he explains the deep psychological knowledge residing in the execution of a fine bust. And Houdon, the great statuary (1741-1828), provokes in Rodin an unlimited admiration. He even makes the following declaration referring to the marvellous busts of Voltaire, Mirabeau, Franklin, Diderot, executed by his famous predecessor :—

Le regard c'est la moitié de l'expression pour ce statuaire. A travers les yeux il déchiffrait les âmes, et elles ne gardaient pour lui aucun secret. Aussi point n'est besoin de se demander si ses bustes étaient ressemblants.

In the chapter entitled "La Pensée dans l'Art" Rodin says that the purest works of art are those in which one finds no inadequate expression of forms, lines or colours, but in which, on the contrary, all tends towards thought and soul. On being asked whether he is religious, Rodin makes so beautiful an answer that we cannot resist the pleasure of quoting it, so noble and elevated does it appear to us :—

A mon avis la religion est autre chose que le balbutiement d'un credo. C'est le sentiment de tout ce qui est inexplicable, et sans doute inexplicable dans le monde. C'est l'adoration de la force ignorée qui maintient les lois universelles, et qui conserve le type des êtres ; c'est le soupçon de tout ce qui dans la Nature ne tombe pas sous nos sens, de tout l'immense domaine des choses que ni les yeux de notre corps, ni même ceux de notre esprit ne sont capables de voir ; c'est encore l'élan de notre conscience vers l'infini, l'éternité, vers la science et l'Amour sans limites, promesses peut-être illusoires, mais qui, dès cette vie, font palpiter notre pensée comme si elle se sentait des ailes. . . .

This fine book will certainly win many admirers in England, for it is not only an ardent apology of Art and Beauty, but it also reveals the priceless spiritual treasures with which perfect artists have endowed humanity. It is especially of interest for those who study Art, as it is full of the most precious advice and confidences ; but it also contains for more profane readers a noble lesson of Beauty and Truth.

M. Alfred Bouchinet, who is well known in the literary circles of Paris as the author of a one-Act play in verse, and a delightful comedy written in collaboration with Albert Guinon, both represented at the Odéon, has recently proved himself a novelist whose writings present a real interest. Unlike many other authors who are content to narrate some slight and generally highly improbable episodes, M. Bouchinet devotes himself to unravelling certain important social questions "à l'ordre du jour." Thus, in his latest book, "L'Amour qui Dure" (Louis Conard, 3f. 50c.), he has set himself the task of developing the following thesis :—Conjugal love alone surmounts and overcomes all difficulties, and triumphs over passing sentiments and fancies.

By the opposition of two feminine characters of the most contrary types, M. Bouchinet has been able to draw certain curious psychological deductions. All his personages live, are true, and follow logically the impulses of their different natures. The only reproach one could formulate is that there is too much repetition of scenes, and that the action would have greatly gained in being more condensed. M. Bouchinet has evidently allowed himself to go to that extreme facility of development common to many cultivated Frenchmen ; nevertheless his work is strong and fine.

Louise Gréveaux, the heroine, is perfectly happy with the man she loves, aiding him with his work, and caring for their children ; but her unclouded felicity is soon troubled by the arrival of her school friend, the beautiful Alice Sonnevile, a coquettish divorcée, who takes pleasure in turning Gréveaux's head, whilst she in turn conceives a violent passion for him. Thanks to a very minute analysis, the author traces the evolution of Louise's sentiments when she becomes aware of her misfortune. At first in her anger and despair she resolves to apply to her unfaithful husband the lex talionis. On the point of doing so, she realises, however, the utter impossibility of such an act ; she is a thoroughly honest woman, whose whole soul revolts at the idea of losing that self-respect which has always been her most cherished possession. She decides more wisely to take refuge near her godmother. Louise pardons her husband, who, already weary of his sentimental experiences with the fair Alice, returns penitently to the straight path. In doing so, he discovers that the only real love, the love that lasts, is that of one's wife, of the mother of one's children ; for, as the author very truly says, "she is the guardian of the home and the guardian of the race."

"L'Amour qui Dure" is, in short, a very convinced defence of marriage, and more especially of the bourgeois marriage, founded on deep affection, from which passionate love is, in general, excluded. The author, moreover, insists throughout all his work on the theory—which can be strongly defended—that man is physiologically a polygamist, and that mere physical attraction on his part, once the novelty is worn off, very rarely survives the worries and troubles of his daily life. The only sentiment which can endure, and even progress and develop with the passing of months and years, is that true affection which coming from the husband is founded on respect and trust, and which proceeding from the wife is often blended with a maternal indulgence and even pity for his passing errors and foibles.

MARC LOGÉ.

MUSIC

THERE exists a class of musicians whose minds are so extremely pure that the mere thought of trifling or coqueting with the maiden simplicity of a piece of music shocks them. The word "arrangement" rouses all the Mrs. Grundy in them, and he who wishes to enjoy the humour of a pedant in a passion may safely be advised to mention to one of these musical purists such a ravisher as Tausig or Liszt, those impudent men who dared to lay unclean hands upon Bach's organ pieces and Schubert's songs. He will be astonished at the zeal displayed by certain of the knights who are vowed to the defence of music's chastity. Up to a certain point we can feel with them ; we prefer, as a general rule, to hear music in the form intended by the composer : Wagner on the pianoforte and Strauss rendered by a gramophone are abominations to us, no doubt. But there are many exceptions to what should be an elastic rule, and amongst them must certainly be reckoned some of the arrangements for that greatest of instruments, the orchestra, of pieces originally written for that little instrument the pianoforte. Some of them, we say, for grievous errors of judgment have been made in adaptations of this kind. Schubert's Fantasia in C, for instance, gains nothing—it loses much, indeed—by its transference from the pianoforte to the orchestra, and Dvorák's little "Humoreske," which Kreisler turned into so effective a violin piece, was never meant for the military band which affronted our ears with it the other day.

But London is now enjoying opportunities of hearing some "arrangements" so perfect that the only possible objection to them is that the success may not improbably give rise to a desire in impulsive minds to arrange all Chopin and all Schumann for an orchestra. If a blind person were carried to Covent Garden when "Les Sylphides" and "Le Carnaval" are being danced by the angels who have flown down to us from the Russian heavens, would he not say that, though unable to see those solemn troops and sweet societies, he had never, perhaps, enjoyed so much or understood so well that music of Chopin and Schumann which guides the light footsteps of the ethereal beings ? We cannot always be hearing M. Paderewski in those nocturnes and vales which we know too well as they are thumped by the thousand thumbs of British boys and girls; we cannot always get Mr. Bauer to play the "Carnaval" to us. And would it not be better to hear these things interpreted by an excellent orchestra according to the entrancing arrangements of MM. Glazounow, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tcherepnin, and their colleagues than as they are essayed by the pianiste of dimmer insight? The wondrous beauty, the intoxicating charm of the ballets designed by MM. Fokine and Bakst, and translated into poetry by their dancers, which are now astonishing and delighting a breathless London, are so all-engrossing, their praises in everybody's mouth, that the contribution of the musicians to it all may be in some danger of being overlooked. Our hats have long ago been taken off before Chopin and Schumann; let us not forget to make obeisance before these admirable Russians who have dealt so delicately, with such infinite love and skill, with the piano music of the masters. It is unnecessary to speak of the arrangement by Berlioz of Weber used for "Le Spectre de la Rose," for that is not new, nor will we do more than refer to the original music composed for some of the ballets by MM. Tcherepnin, Arensky, Borodin, &c., though M. Tcherepnin's "Pavillon d'Armide" is so clever and pleasant that we should like to think it might enter the ordinary orchestral repertory in the form of a "Suite de Danses." We wish to draw special attention to the arrangements of Chopin and Schumann, and hold them up as models of skill and discretion.

It is difficult to think and speak with becoming moderation of this embassy of beauty which Russia has sent us. We would not harbour ungrateful thoughts of the spectacles and the dancers who, in our untutored days, gave us very real pleasure. But when we are in the presence of a great picture how poor a thing is that canvas which the industrious copyist in front of it is covering with paint! The St. Petersburg Ballet, compared with the imitations to which, with a very few exceptions, we have been brought up, is like the "Gioconda" of Leonardo compared with an oleograph of that picture. We can never forget the charming skill of Mlle. Genée, but one swallow cannot teach us what summer may be.

How ignorant most of us have been! What a great deal there was for these Russians to teach us! We thought so when first they bounded upon the stage of the "Coliseum;" and when we saw the Mazurka danced at the Palace Theatre by the companions of Pavlova and Mordkin some of us exclaimed that we had never until then understood fully the meaning of the word "rhythm;" until we saw the protagonists in their dances we did not know that human beings could really be butterflies, or leaves blown about by autumn gales.

When we who had never been to St. Petersburg first saw the whole corps, with its decorations and its discipline, in Paris and at Monte Carlo we learnt that there existed a whole realm of beauty and delight into which we had never been permitted to look. Now that this realm is here, in London, for a moment that is all too brief, we feel that it will be an unforgivable blunder if we do not make the most of it, and learn by heart, if it may be, the lessons of order, harmony, colour, grace which it has to teach.

The beauty of wild, almost savage, energy set in colour, both sombre and flaring—that "Prince Igor" shows; "Armide" is the example of rich tints and fantastic movement; "Cleopatra" teaches us how to tell a story of voluptuousness and tragedy; and if we are allowed to see "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Scheherazade" London will then know to what lengths magnificence may legitimately be carried on the stage. But the most useful lessons for London are those given by the Chopin and the Schumann ballets.

"Les Sylphides" is the triumph of simplicity. Those exquisite groupings, those aerial movements in that cool, quiet scene! The swooping and shimmering of a flight of swans by a moonlit, wood-fringed pool, with a shepherd by Vandyke looking on, would be a beautiful scene, but "Les Sylphides" is more beautiful still. Even "Armide" seems almost too much like an ordinary ballet after it; almost like "Louise" heard the night after you have been to "Pelléas." "Le Carnaval" is surely the most delicious lesson we have ever had as to the playing of comedy. After that, how shall we bear with the coarse vulgarities to which we are too often treated in the name of "comedy." Will the Russian dancers, by the means of this same "Carnaval," teach London that there is something after all in the ideas which the word "refinement" conveys?

We have heard Russians, habitués of the St. Petersburg opera-house, speak critically, and not always approvingly, of the doings of our enchanting visitors. They say we are "losing our heads" over the ballet. Their knowledge and experience enable them to detect flaws which our blissful ignorance hides from us who are as yet new to the delights which the happy dwellers in St. Petersburg have enjoyed since they were children. But, in spite of these connoisseurs, we cannot help thinking that our enthusiasm is justified, that our admiration will one day be found to have very well illustrated the saying, "Les étrangers sont la postérité contemporaine." We were strangers once, but now we must be regarded as friends. How can we be critical in presence of what is so new and delightful? What Englishman could have believed he would ever be enthralled by the dancing of a mere man when there were female angels—oh, call them not "coryphées"—to look at? Yet we find it hard to take our eyes away from Nijinsky. Only, as we heard a clever lady say the other day, "Nijinsky, when he is on the stage, is not a man, he is half-boy, half-bird." No, we cannot as yet join in any cold strictures. What! Find fault with the Ballet? "On peut nier Dieu, discuter le Pape, dégueuler sur tout . . . mais 'Les Sylphides,' 'Le Carnaval' . . ."

A JAPANESE ON THE POET ROSSETTI

ROSSETTI had enough philosophy and theory, but what is most interesting in him as a poet, I believe, is not in them but in the very place where they were powerless—I mean the place where, like a light which brings out the shadow, they only appeared to present the other indefinable quality. I am glad his forethought and afterthought did not kill his inspiration. His art tried its utmost to give it the best possible light; and he could not be satisfied, as it seems to me, till he had taken its earthly life and flame out, and made it to be an art perfect after all desires. What we have in him, therefore, is the intensity that has subsided, the ecstasy that has become silent, the hope that has come to its rest. I admire the proud manner with which he soared above the journalism of his own day, which exists, not only to-day but any day, only to trouble the heart of art; however, he made his art, on the other hand, often too uncomfortable to look at simply through over-studied carefulness, and even the saddest sort of zeal, and made us think that the beauty of his song was a confession, not a revelation such as I wish all poetry to be. It was beautiful, of course, when he was right, but in the reverse case he was a lost one, and perfectly unbearable. It is sad that his excessive consciousness turned often to be mere artificiality. I always ask myself, when I read his poems, how long he spent for the distillation of his thought before he finally wrote it; even a poem he wrote on the spot, which was very rare, however, in his case, gives us an impression of great deliberation; this has, doubtless, some advantage, but often results in weakness. He was one of the most fastidious workers in poetry as he was in painting; it seems to me that he hated nothing more than profusion, and from that great hatred of profusion, made his loam of life asunder to create a simple thing. His simplicity was most beautiful as it had clarified from profusion. However, the life he imagined was not a happy one. He was too absolute in aim; his finding it very hard to satisfy himself is rooted in solitariness. The first thing we feel from reading his work is an uncompromising pride in his art, and the mysterious dash into a world where only a strange intellect knows how to enjoy the material warmth and human softness. It is perfectly outrageous to call him a materialist; he made himself able, through the very virtue of material, to enter straightway into the heart of spirituality; it is more proper to say that he alone found the right meeting ground of spirit and material. He never could think anything spiritual apart from form and colour; the form and colour were divine themselves in his thought. They were at once the symbol of what they represented in spirit; he could not think of them merely as form and colour. He was, in that respect, quite Oriental.

If he had one great fault as a poet, it was that he always knew, too well indeed, what he was going to write; he could never forget himself. I do not think it was from his over consciousness of his critical power; it may be that he could not become so bold to trust only in his impulse, or that his own art, he thought, was not a thing to play with, but to respect with all his heart. His intellect was too noble to forget the imagination; what appeared quite logical and critical in his emotion is not the real part at all.

II.

I have been for many months now studying with my students in college on Rossetti, starting with his lyrics and almost finishing his sonnets. I found that it was more easy in truth for them to understand him (appreciate too), striking enough to say perhaps, than even Longfellow of homespun simplicity. It may be from the reason that they are too old to be content with him at an imaginary fireside, or they are too young yet to really appreciate him as they are in the age when spiritual speculation is more attractive. I think that the acclimatisation of Western art and literature of the modern type which has been encouraged here, though not generally, but among the discerning class, made them feel akin to Rossetti already, even before studying him. And the fact that he had a limitation, which was of an Eastern kind, was doubtless a large reason of this immediate reception; as he never tried to conceal his limitation, it always appeared prominently, but, on the other hand, to delight some people (and us) immensely. He is the poet whom we can only love or hate; and we are glad we love him. It is perfectly singular to say that you can at once understand all his work, as if a single piece of poem, when you have once found how his energy worked, what association he sought for evoking emotion; and you will find in him rarely a surprise when the sound, colour, and form have become in mutual relation with you; in fact, you will get from him what you expect. From such a point of view, he is never a great poet.

However, his attitude as a poet is most admirable; and I should say it is not a question with us whether he was a small poet or a big one. Indeed, his attitude makes us respect and think of him perhaps more than he was in fact; what he lacked we will fill at once with imagination, and when he is too perfect our imagination will make him imperfect to advantage, taking its usual free course, and let us feel his fresh beauty; thus he is a gainer in either case. It goes without saying that he was democratic on the one hand; we see only that cosmopolitan side of beauty and emotion, and allow ourselves to speculate and connect with him a dear friendship. He is one whom we always find easy to approach and interesting to listen to; while listening, we grow very enthusiastic, and are extremely glad thinking that he wrote most beautifully what we often thought and could not find a voice for.

YONE NOGUCHI.

PEARL OF THE ORIENT

SOME folk observe that the Americans are not poetical. Poets, however, are usually credited with a fine imagination and wealth of language, and these things the average American possesses in abundance. I admire the American for many things—most of all, I think, for his perfect consistency. There is nothing inconsistent about an American man at least. Whether the majority of American women can plead guilty to this frailty of the sex is beyond my knowledge too.

In the small guide-book I had once given to me, containing an elaborate and highly picturesque account of the delights of Manila, there was presented a beautiful picture of a Filipino woman. The frontispiece of the book bears the talisman "Pearl of the Orient." I fancy this term for his beloved island must have been invented by Rizal, the great Filipino martyr and hero. But the Americans have, in their own words, "taken a cinch of the name," thereby once again evidencing their appreciation of poetical verbiage.

Pearl of the Orient! If it had not been my business to come to Manila I think that name would have drawn me toward the place. It entices and allures; and we do not deny that everything is done in Manila to entice and allure also.

When I first arrived the town was en fête for the Christmas festival. In Manila there must always be something doing, and it must be done to a lively clashing of bands, the flare of trumpets and the roll of big drums. "It is no good doing things quietly and getting overlooked," said an American to me the other day. "We might pass by and you'd not hear us."

They made a blaze of light in the Escolta, where the principal shops are to be found, and they illuminated the bridges; they hung up mottoes, ensigns, and flags, and the result was a pretty Christmassy effect, which was as pleasing, I am sure, to most simple-minded folk as it was to the children—"kids," as the Americans call them.

My first big surprise was when I drove out to the Luneta, the bandstand, promenade, and common ground of meeting in this city. Here were carriages, motor-cars, horsemen and horsewomen—with hardly one exception riding astride—and gaily-dressed men and women on foot. The costumes rather took my breath away at first. After the extreme heat of the day I found the evenings decidedly chilly, but these women apparently felt neither heat nor cold. They walk the street without hats or covering for their heads; they sit about in their carriages or cars in fullest evening dress. In the same costume they walk the streets, or whizz through the air at racing speed on the front seat of trams. I confess I was amazed. Once I asked a Spanish girl if she did not feel the great changes in the temperature trying. She looked at me wonderingly. "No one bothers in Manila," she said, indifferently.

The next thing that struck me on the Luneta was something strange about the carriages. The majority of calesas, rigs, and carromatas were full-sized, and contained full-sized men and women, yet these were drawn in most cases by ponies, or native-bred horses not much bigger than ponies themselves! To see a fairly large carriage drawn by such Lilliputian steeds is, to say the least of it, curious. Besides, the magnificence of the equipage is considerably lessened. It looks rather like—if I may say so—"playing at horses and carriages." Of course there are American and Australian horses. The latter do very well in the Philippines. And on the Polo Ground there are some fine specimens of animals.

Most people ride or drive in Manila. The roads alone would discourage much walking exercise, but at the different clubs all kinds of games are practised—tennis, cricket, bowling, swimming, baseball, polo, rowing. . . . And last, but certainly not least, there are the cock-fights.

I have never seen a cock-fight, and I have no intention of doing so at present. I have seen the care expended upon these birds—greater in many cases than that lavished on the owner's children—and I remember the torture the birds must undergo; the cruel termination of this fostering—death, or a victory that will probably lead to death. For, most often, death is the lot of both birds, the victor and the vanquished. That the American Government should recognise this form of gambling seems to me a grave mistake. But the amount of money circulated in this way is enormous, adding, I should imagine, considerably to the revenue of the Islands.

Besides the sporting element in Manila, there is the social, or perhaps it would be more correct to say in conjunction with the sporting element runs the social side of life. Dancing is not a lost art in Manila, whatever it may be in England just now. Dances, dinners, receptions, and garden-parties make up the whirl of weekly events. At all these functions the ladies turn out in costumes worthy of Paris, Vienna, or London in the height of the season. Their attention to fashion and style is really remarkable. At a garden-party a week or so back two English girls were pointed out to me with the remark that any one could see they were just out from home by their dress and style. "When they have been out here a little while they will have learned how to make themselves look smart," declared this Manila-wise youth, sententiously. And although I denied his assertion that English women did not know the first thing about making the best of themselves, I am afraid my championship was somewhat enfeebled by the tiresome memory of the coat-and-skirt type of English tourist met on the Continent and elsewhere to our patriotic dismay. There is no harm in a coat-and-skirt, granted its cut is irreproachable, but—always . . . at all seasons! And there is no harm in a plain linen frock; but the difference between those ready-made robes of questionable cut and the neat tailor-made French and American morning-gowns is notable.

But this is not a fashion article, fortunately, and I return with a sigh of thankfulness to the country roads of Manila. They are bad, in the town and outside. The country itself, however, is pretty, and atones for much. The native huts, or nipa shacks, made of the nipa palm, are quaint and picturesque, if scarcely habitable. Within a certain radius, called the fire zone, and for greater safety, a number of these shacks are slowly being demolished by Government ordinance as they fall into disrepair. So lightly are these dwellings flung together that as many as five and six can be pulled down in a few short hours; it may be readily understood that the danger of a fire in the locality of such flimsily-built huts is very great. Perhaps it is not out of place to mention here that the fire-stations in Manila would excite the enthusiasm of the most hardened pessimist, and their system is decidedly one of the best out East or anywhere in the world.

Living in Manila is very dear, most articles of food being at least double or treble the price quoted in the old days of Spanish occupation. American goods are supposed to come into the Islands duty free, but even so their cost can hardly be called moderate. That the Americans in raising the price of labour and merchandise in the Islands have been seriously mistaken there seems little doubt. It is a matter of general comment at least among the foreigners of this city. Of the policy of the American Government in other matters, of the home life and characteristics of the Spanish and Filipino I make no mention in this paper, but I hope to deal with them under separate headings from time to time.

In concluding, a word of praise must go to the Americans for the many improvements made on the Islands since their occupation: in stamping out disease, in sanitation, in superior lighting, and the fostering of commercial spirit and enterprise. They have had, doubtless, much to contend against, but they have fought through undaunted. Above the watchword of the Spanish—their cry of "Manana!" (to-morrow)—we seem to catch the echo of the American "Right now!" What an anomaly! What a contrast between the rule of these two peoples! But if the Americans have made mistakes in some directions, in others they have taken giant strides, and all honour is due to them for the good achieved.

SYDNEY M. ENGLISH.

FROM THE WASTE-BASKET

THERE is a curious combination of humour and pathos, of smiles and tears, of the surprising and the incredible, in the daily mail of an editor. His sympathies and his risibles are alike appealed to, and his mail often becomes a weariness to the flesh and the spirit. This is partly because of the fact that so many misguided individuals think that they can write if they cannot do anything else. When fortune plays them false, and all other efforts at gaining a livelihood fail, they turn to literature as something that any one can "engage in." Often the motive to write results from a vaulting desire to see one's name in print, or from a wish to attain something beyond one's powers of achievement. Young writers often labour under the delusion that no training is necessary to success in the world of literature. Indeed, nothing is required but pen, ink, and paper. Some aspirants for literary honour and glory are, it is true, not quite sure as to the kind of paper they should use, and editors are requested to enlighten them on this point. Others are in doubt as to what one beginner called the "miner points" of successful writing for the press, and the editor may receive a letter similar to the one received by a New York editor. This letter of inquiry ran as follows:—

Dear Sir: Being about to engage seriously in literature as my chosen profession I write to ask you for a few miner points in regard to writing for the public eye. I am posted as to the main points having already wrote a good deal for the local papers, both Prose and Poetry, but none for the Metropolitan press. So please let me know is there any set kind of stationery required? If so what is the size and must it be ruled or just bare? Also must the ink be black or will Violet or green ink be exceptable? I do not have a Preference for black ink and I think my thoughts flow more freely in green ink. Also answer back and say what kind of writing is most in demand in the Literary Market, as I am in the Market for almost any kind of writing except on Scientific Subjects or deeply religious ones. Please let me know in a General way what your demands is and I think I can supply them.

The editor to whom this communication was sent might have replied that one of the demands of the literary market is correct spelling, and he might also have added that green or violet ink would be likely to create an unfavourable impression on the average editor. Editors soon discover that aspiring young writers often base their claims to favour on the fact that their grandfathers or great-uncles were writers, and that the unreliable laws of heredity must therefore have handed down the gifts of these departed grandfathers and great-uncles to their descendants. Others have had confidence in their literary ability established by the fact that their essays at school were always "highly spoken of," or "competent critics" had told them that what they had written was quite superior to anything the editor was publishing in his paper.

Most pathetic of all is the case of some person wholly untrained and inexperienced in the art of writing turning to literature as a means of obtaining a livelihood and sending editors letters like the following:—

Dear Sir: Having been thrown entirely on my own resources by the death of my husband, and having three small children to support, I have decided to take up writing as a means of gaining a living, and one from which I can hope to receive the most immediate and the largest income. I have already had some success in writing, having had a number of poems published in our home paper, and one in the "Christian's Friend," for which the editor sent me the paper free of charge for six months. I have always had a fondness for writing, and my friends have often told me that they thought I would be successful as a writer. I have received a prize of one dollar for the best children's saying sent to a New York paper, and have had other successes in the literary field that encourage me to think that I may be able to support myself and my children with my pen. Enclosed find a story for which I would be glad if you would send me ten dollars as soon as possible.

This letter is too pathetic in its hopelessness for the editor even to smile over, although he might indulge in a half-forced laugh over a letter like the following:—

Respected Sir: This is to inform you that I am in the market for all kind of Storys—speshly animal Storys about fites with Bares, Tiggers, lions and hienays. I have a bare story that is a ripper four thousand words long. It is a Tail that your boy readers would appresheate for the boy in it kills the bare after he has killed two men and et them up. Am also in the market for love Storys of a high order with lots of thrill in them. Am just ending one up called "The Pirate Captain's Bride" that lays over anything I ever see in your paper. Can write Potry if dezired but prefer to stick to the Leggitimate in my writing which is Storys. Could send you two a week if dezired. Have some bully ones on hand so plesse let me know if I shall send them. Yures with Respect.

Needless to say none of this author's cheerful and aspiring "storys" and none of his "potry" were needed by the editor, thrilling as the "tail" of the "bare" would no doubt have been.

Of poets the number is legion, regardless of the fact that poetry is about as unsaleable a thing as one can offer in the literary market. There is really no more pathetic spectacle than that of a misguided young man or woman starting out in life hoping for support on the returns from poetical outbursts. Here is a specimen of a letter with which editors are not unfamiliar:—

Dear Sir: I have a fairly good position that pays me fifteen dollars a week, but the work is uncongenial and I am anxious to give it up and become a writer, and as I have been told by good judges that I have decided talent, particularly along the line of poetry. I have written more than one hundred poems and have several times been asked to write poems of birthdays, golden weddings etc. Writing poetry comes easy and natural to me, as several of my relatives wrote poetry. I am eager to give up my present uncongenial work and go to Boston or New York, or some other literary center and engage entirely in writing poetry!

Enclosed find several specimen poems which I would be glad to have you print and pay me all you can for them. I think I could write better ones if I were differently situated.

Here is a stanza from one of the "specimen poems":—

The day is done, the night is here,
The sky grows black as a funeral bier;
Inky darkness reigns without,
The night has come without a doubt,
No stars are in the inky sky,
The night wind moans with gentle sigh,
No moon to light the darksome way,
At home I think I'd better stay.

The editor might have been pardoned had he quoted the last line of the poem as a reply to the young poet's letter. Another would-be poet sends an editor the following poem "as proof of the fact that I am a genuine poet":—

The spring is here with birds so gay,
I hear them sing their little lay.
The bees and ants so busy are,
Preparing for some glad to-mor'.
The flow'rets bloom in gayest hue,
'Tis Spring! 'Tis Spring for me and you!

Original as "some glad to-mor'" may be as a form of literary expression, the editor is compelled to return this flight of poetic fancy with the usual depressing rejection slip.

Letters like the following may be found in editorial waste-baskets:—"If the story I am sending is found to be simply returnable please state wherein it has no merits."

Editors are often asked to state wherein MSS. have "no merits," but it is not often that an editor is asked to state the exact lack of merit in the way suggested in the following letter:—

If my story is returnable, please, before doing so, mark its good points with a red lead pencil, its weak points with a blue pencil, and all that is superfluous with a green pencil, and I would take it as a favor if you would suggest a different plot if you do not like the one on which the story is now built. Also point out defects in punctuation, and give me any advice that you think would be useful to me as an author.

The request in regard to punctuation suggests a letter received by an editor from a writer who said that he was "just coming out" as an author, and, for that reason, he did not know just where to put in the "decimal points." The editor was asked to put them in "in the right spots."

Truly a delightful volume of humour could be made of the contents of editorial waste-baskets.

By LANCELOT LAWTON

DIPLOMACY AND DAILY JOURNALISM

It will, perhaps, be within recollection that at the beginning of this year, shortly after the meeting of the Tsar and the Kaiser at Potsdam, the Daily Telegraph published from its St. Petersburg correspondent a series of sensational despatches, boldly announcing that Russia had been won over to the cause of Germany, and that the Triple Entente was dead and done for. When a journal possessed of high standing gives prominence to statements of this kind, and when, moreover, as is the case of the Daily Telegraph, repeated assurances are given in its leading-article columns and elsewhere that its representative in Russia who is responsible for these statements may be regarded as particularly well informed, the general public is naturally induced to place implicit reliance upon their accuracy. It was not surprising, therefore, that the St. Petersburg despatches to which I have alluded should have had the effect of creating widespread and critical attention. If the information they pretended to convey had been truthful, then no one could have complained. A timely warning that Russia had cynically deserted the Triple Entente would have enabled our diplomacy to re-shape its forces preparatory to meeting a new and dangerous situation. But it is now a matter of undisputable fact that, far from being disloyal to her partners, Russia was acting at Potsdam not only with their knowledge but also with their complete acquiescence. Later events in connection with the Morocco incident have proved beyond a shadow of doubt that the Triple Entente remains firm and unshaken. It is difficult to imagine what profitable purpose was served by the pessimistic despatches from the St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, save that of purely journalistic enterprise. Their publication at the time, however, wrought not a little injury to the interests of Great Britain, for, containing as they did assertions affecting High Policy, they embarrassed to no slight extent our Foreign Office and created a feeling of uneasiness in Russia which was only dispelled after diplomatic assurances had been forthcoming that no credence was attached in authoritative quarters to such alarmist suggestions. In all the circumstances the Daily Telegraph cannot escape censure for having lent its columns to the dissemination of questionable statements, and it is sincerely to be hoped that in future the management of that journal will deal in a more responsible spirit with so supremely important a question as the balance of European power.

In order that readers of THE ACADEMY may have an opportunity of judging for themselves in the matter, I propose to present a complete summary of the statements that appeared in the Daily Telegraph, together with a narration of the facts as they actually existed. The following extracts from the St. Petersburg despatches under discussion will explain themselves:—

1. To-morrow M. Pichon is expected to deliver a statement setting forth France's commanding position in the world of politics, affirming the vitality of the Alliance, and reiterating Russia's undying friendship for the French people. All that is expected and discounted. Those are not the questions that need answering. Moreover, while sympathising with the Novoye Vremya, which desires a perpetuation of the harmonious political co-operation of France, Russia, and Great Britain, which was so beneficial to Europe during the Moroccan crisis, one cannot blink the obvious fact that M. Iswolsky's services have been dispensed with in deference to Germany's reiterated desire; that the Tsar's visit to Potsdam, and the various circumstances connected with it were the results of his Majesty's acquiescence in articulate demands, and that although Russia will scrupulously observe all her political covenants with France and Great Britain, she has already consented to emasculate the Triple Entente. . . . Russia, while carrying out her treaty obligations towards France and Great Britain, has definitely withdrawn from the diplomatic and military association known as the Triple Entente. That is the plain fact we have to face, and it cannot be reasoned away by M. Pichon's assertion that the Franco-Russian Entente still subsists, or by Sir Edward Grey's declaration, should he make one, that the Anglo-Russian Agreement will not be departed from. Russia recognises the Entente with England and the Alliance with France, but she has killed the Triple Entente.

2. The lines of Russia's foreign policy now pass through the Wilhelmstrasse in Berlin instead of through the Quai d'Orsay.

3. To the Triple Entente the two Emperors have given a quietus. . . . And this arrangement puts an end to the Triple Entente. . . . Thus the Russo-German agreement has dealt a deadly blow to the Triple Entente. . . . The Mid-Eastern morrow and the passing of the Triple Entente should arouse no surprise.

4. But heretofore there existed not only an Anglo-Russian understanding and a Franco-Russian Alliance, but also a third international entity, composed of all three Powers, and known as the Triple Entente, which confronted the Triple Alliance in the council chamber, and was believed capable, if necessary, of confronting it also on the battlefield. This is the entity which was killed at Potsdam after it had shown its defective and waning vitality during the ordeal of the Balkan crisis of 1908-9. Henceforward Russia will abstain from membership of any international league the object of which is hostility to Germany, and Germany in return will take no part in any coalition against Russia.

Writing in these columns as far back as March 4th, I mentioned that I had just returned from St. Petersburg, and added that I could say with confidence that the national sentiment of Russia was never more favourable towards Great Britain and France than it was then, and that it was the wish of the statesmen who were in power that this national sentiment should continue to find expression in firm and unwavering adherence to the Triple Entente. I went on to make the definite assertion that time alone would show that so far from the Potsdam understanding having dealt a death-blow to the Triple Entente it had revealed at once the vitality and the useful elasticity of that important compact. In an article that appeared a month later in THE ACADEMY I again emphasised the vitality of the Triple Entente, and after presenting facts in support of my case declared that the suggestion of the alarmists that Russia had acted in a manner inimical to our interests was palpably false, and that those critics who prematurely announced the demise of the Triple Entente were effectually rebuked by its very presence, living and robust. Moreover, since then, I have lost no opportunity in reaffirming my belief in the loyalty of Russia towards England and France.

The Morocco incident has finally disposed of all doubts concerning the existence of the Triple Entente as a positive force in the world's diplomacy. An authoritative communiqué issued in Paris on Monday made significant reference to the "vigorous assistance given by Great Britain to France," and added, "Russia on her part has not been sparing in her support. It is stated that on two occasions she made known her complete concurrence in the French point of view." Immediately on receipt of the news that Germany had sent a gunboat to Agadir an exchange of views took place between St. Petersburg and Paris, with the result that Russia immediately addressed to the Berlin Cabinet a request for explanations. According to the Times correspondent at St. Petersburg, answers were sought to the following questions: What was the real object of the despatch of a warship to Agadir, where there was no foreign trade, no German subjects, and no disorders? Did Germany contemplate the landing of troops? How did Germany interpret the phrase "as soon as peace and order have been restored in Morocco," used in the Note to define the term of her warship's mission to Agadir? Meanwhile the Novoye Vremya, the leading newspaper in the Russian capital, and one, moreover, that is frequently inspired officially, urges that since Germany was alarmed about the situation at Agadir the Powers of the Triple Entente—France, Great Britain, and Russia—should each send a warship to help Germany in her self-imposed task. Finally, M. André Mévil, writing in the Echo de Paris, declares that "We may rely entirely upon Russia's help. The Tsar's Government, whose standpoint is already well known, has chosen to make its line of conduct clearer still. Thus, M. Nératoff, the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, summoned the German Ambassador to his office, and told him that Russia was prepared, in the present circumstances, to back up France with all her might."

In view of all these circumstances, it is interesting once more to recall some of the expressions of opinion and statements of fact contained in the St. Petersburg despatches of the Daily Telegraph as recently as the beginning of this year. Thus, for example, we were told that Russia had definitely withdrawn from the diplomatic and military association known as the Triple Entente, that the lines of Russia's foreign policy now passed through the Wilhelmstrasse in Berlin, and that henceforward Russia would abstain from membership of any international league the object of which was hostility to Germany. And all these diplomatic catastrophes, so it was said on different days but in quick succession, were due to the circumstances that the Triple Entente had been emasculated, that the Triple Entente had been killed, and that the Triple Entente had been dealt a deadly blow and given a quietus. Swiftly and pointedly came the rebuke of Mr. Pichon, who then held the portfolio of Foreign Affairs in France. "Diplomacy," said this eminent statesman, with justifiable but withering sarcasm, "is not conducted in the public streets."

THE COLONIES AND FOREIGN POLICY

The most interesting event of the week is the announcement that the negotiations for a general Arbitration Treaty between America and Great Britain have been successfully concluded. It is now admitted that the provisions of the Treaty must inevitably clash with those of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and the suggestion has been made that the time has arrived for raising the questions of the revision and prolongation of the Alliance. The subject is one in which our Colonies are intensely interested. It would be idle to deny that public opinion in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada is in the main opposed to the Japanese and, therefore, to our alliance with the Japanese. The signing of the Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty will, however, tend materially to strengthen the weak spots in our diplomatic armour. Although, of course, not designed for the purpose, it must inevitably consolidate Anglo-Saxon interests in the Pacific and effectually check any aggressive ambitions which the Japanese may entertain. It only remains to be added that, as the Colonial Premiers have recently been taken into the confidences of Downing Street, they will realise that an extension of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, though perhaps in a modified form, is necessary to the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe.

MOTORING

THE membership of the Automobile Association and Motor Union continues to go up by leaps and bounds. At almost every consecutive meeting of the executive committee the number of candidates for election exceeds that of any previous occasion, and, at the present rate of progression, it seems likely that before long a motor-car unadorned with the familiar A.A. badge will be regarded as a curiosity or an anachronism. At the last committee meeting no fewer than 1,006 new car members were elected, in addition to nearly four hundred motor-cyclists, and among the former were the undermentioned distinguished personalities in the motoring world:—Field-Marshal Lord Kitchener, the Earl Desart, Lord Aldenham, Lord Clinton, Baron Anthony de Worms, Lieut.-General Sir R. Wingate, Sir J. W. Hudson, Bart., Sir A. Thomas, Sir A. Herbert, Sir D. D. Mann, Sir S. Sadler, Sir Ernest C. Cochrane, Bart., Sir E. Lechmere, Bart., Sir F. Mowatt, Sir H. Cunningham, Sir R. Walker, Bart., the Hon. G. H. Morris, the Hon. E. Fowler, the Hon. Cyril A. Ward, Mr. J. H. Hope, M.P., and quite a number of well-known lady-motorists.

On taking a retrospective view of the work of the A.A. since its inception some five or six years ago, and endeavouring to analyse the causes of its phenomenally rapid progress, one is bound to allot a conspicuous place to the Free Legal Defence scheme, inaugurated two or three years ago. When it was first announced that the A.A. committee had determined upon this bold stroke of policy on behalf of its members there were plenty of critics and well-wishers of the Association who confidently prophesied disaster to the organisation if the policy were carried through. It was argued that the possibilities of infringement of the Motor Car Act were so numerous, owing to its multifarious provisions, and the carelessness of a large section of motorists so notorious, that no organisation could undertake free and unlimited legal defence in any part of the country on such a moderate subscription as two guineas a year, which subscription, moreover, was to include very many other advantages and privileges to members. But the critics were wrong. The Free Legal Defence scheme has been consistently adhered to; there has been no necessity to increase the amount of the annual subscription, and the A.A. and M.U. is more prosperous than ever. All of which is a triumphant vindication of the bold and enterprising policy of Stenson Cooke and his confrères.

An interesting proof of the practical value of this Free Legal Defence scheme of the A.A. and M.U. was furnished on the occasion of the recent Naval Review, when a large number of motorists returning from Portsmouth were stopped at Petersfield and charged with committing various offences against the Motor-car Act, principally that of driving with the off-side light out. Twenty-eight of the alleged offenders, being members of the A.A., were defended by the Association's solicitor, and in twenty-three cases the summonses were dismissed, although it had to be admitted by the defence that technical offences had been committed. Had these motorists been unable to avail themselves of the free and expert defence provided by the Association there is little doubt that the offenders would have had to make some more or less substantial contributions to the local exchequer.

No doubt owing principally to the paramount interest aroused by the great aviation competitions during the past week or two, the Prince Henry Tour has been all but ignored by the daily Press. Probably this indifference is also due in some measure to the fact that the competition is in no sense a race, but merely a kind of general reliability trial, in which all that is expected is that the competing cars shall maintain a moderate daily mileage with as few breakdowns as possible. So far the "Tour" has proceeded without a hitch, and it may be of some use in assisting to promote an entente cordiale in quarters where it is rather badly needed just now.

Referring to recent remarks in these columns on the subject of the new six-cylinder Belsize, it is interesting to note that the opinion of the present writer as to the remarkable cheapness of the car is endorsed by one of the experts on the staff of our technical contemporary the Motor, after a 500-mile run through some of the counties north of the Thames Valley and a concluding day's run from London to Manchester. Driving the car himself, the expert in question found that it was "absurdly easy of management," and that it possessed all the evenness of torque and sweetness of running associated with the high-class six-cylinder. On top gear the car had a range of speed from about 3 to 45 miles an hour, and gear changes, on the very few occasions when they were found necessary, were made "with great sweetness and in complete silence." Summing up, he remarks that the trial, taken altogether, gave him a very good impression of the sterling quality of Belsize work, and of the excellent behaviour and capabilities of these cars on the road.

The growing partiality of motorists—especially those who may be described as belonging to the better class—for wire wheels instead of those of the artillery type becomes more pronounced year by year. Several of the more important manufacturers now adopt them as the standard fitment for their cars, only fitting the wooden ones when specially ordered, and it is well known that Mr. S. F. Edge, a recognised pioneer in all matters of motor construction, is a firm believer in the all-round superiority of the wire wheel. But while it is now generally recognised that wire wheels are stronger, and therefore safer, than wooden ones, it will surprise many motorists to learn that they have also a very beneficial effect on the life of the tyres. Figures recently published by the Daimler Motor Company appear to establish this fact conclusively. In the hire department of the company referred to experiments have been made with one hundred non-skid covers, half fitted to wire and half to wooden wheels, and careful data have been kept of tyre replacements and repairs. It has been found that the total mileage obtained from the covers taken from the wire wheels was 172,731—an average of 3,454 miles per tyre; from the covers used on the wood wheels, only 102,524 miles were obtained—an average of 2,050. The cars employed in the tests were practically identical, and they were run under exactly similar conditions, so that the case in favour of wire wheels seems to be completely established. If, in addition to being stronger, safer, lighter, and more elegant in appearance than wooden ones, they also effect a material economy in the tyre bill, we may anticipate their general adoption in the near future.

THE shock caused by the German diplomatic coup has died down, and even the most rabid Teutonophobe sees that the whole thing must have been settled long ago or the Emperor would never have left Berlin. Whether England has received a proper compensation for her forbearance time will show. The Stock Exchange is all the fresher for the little storm, and Paris is certainly in a much saner mood. But there are stories of trouble in the air, caused, of course, by the steady selling of Consols. The Stock Exchange version seems feasible. It runs that a certain insurance company, finding that its weekly revenue had received a serious check, was compelled to sell out its Consols in order to provide cash for its daily expenses. This sounds all right, but it hardly bears close examination, for the Bankers to this concern would gladly loan all the money needed on the vast board of securities held by the company. Still, that is the tale, and it may be that the officers of the concern prefer to get out of stock instead of borrowing. The bears have undoubtedly sold short all the way through, and on Tuesday the selling early in the morning was upon quite a large scale.

The new companies that have appeared seem to fare worse each week. The public absolutely declines to have anything to do with any new issue. Nevertheless, the wealthy people who have invested in the Mond Nickel found the money for the debenture issue readily enough. One or two quite amusing promotions have been offered us, notably a concern called Syrolit, which hopes to turn skim-milk into tortoiseshell, non-inflammable. I am always amused when I am in Naples at the itinerant vendors of tortoiseshell, who offer you a match to test their unburnable combs. Perhaps the art of making combs out of milk is as old as the Romans, and those picturesque boys, whose combs are assuredly not genuine, for they cost but a lira, have preserved the art. It would indeed be pleasant if we could divert the skim milk of the London dairy into a more useful channel than the tea-shop. Many of us have been in a mangrove swamp, and potted at alligators. But no one ever thought of turning mangroves into a limited company until last week, when some philanthropist offered us shares in the Tan Bark and Balata Company. This queerly-named affair intends to acquire a few of the mangrove swamps at the mouth of the Orinoco, and promises over a hundred thousand pounds a year profit. When such silly companies can find money to advertise their schemes, surely it stands as a portent. The great Mr. Lampard having acquired during the boom a large estate in Sumatra, having spent much money upon it, and having become undecided whether to grow tobacco or rubber, has finally floated it as the Wampoe Tobacco and Rubber. The California-Idaho seems to have got the Adam group in Paris to find money for its scheme. But I doubt if London will follow suit. The Speyer Brothers Rent Charge gave the sober-minded a sound 4 per cent. investment, well secured but none too cheap.

CONSOLS seem to grow weaker as money grows cheaper. They are quite out of fashion, but will recover unless some strange thing happens in the political world. It is a thousand pities that Lloyd George, who made so excellent a President of the Board of Trade, should prove such an incompetent Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is the curse of our political system, this putting of round pegs into square holes. He could have saved our credit a severe blow had he only popularised Consols as all of us begged him to do. Now they have fallen to the deepest depths.

FOREIGNERS have shown great courage since the German scare died down, and the Parisians have even been buying their Peru prefs back, but the bull account in London has been reduced, and, as the figures for the half-year are good, new buyers have come in. Russians have not been allowed to fall, not even tales of a war in Montenegro, could scare the stout hearts of the Paris bankers.

HOME RAILS.—It is quite incredible that the public does not buy Home Railways. The half-year has ended and the calculators of dividends are busy. The most pessimistic admits an increase of one-half per cent. all round. Brums should yield £4 17s. 6d. per cent. for the year, and the whole of this interest would be received in eight months. Great Westerns will pay one-half per cent. more and yield £4 12s. 5d. The North Eastern yield, without allowing any increase in dividend, will be £4 10s., yet the company has made enough profit to pay an additional 1 per cent. Lancashire and Yorkshire have had a good half-year, and will assuredly pay 5 per cent. on the whole year. Yet they are round par. Midland profits will enable the board to pay one-half per cent. extra, and thus gives a purchaser over 5 per cent. Naturally they are speculative, but very cheap. Great Easterns have had a fine traffic increase, and an increase of one-half per cent. in the dividend might come. They are a good speculation. Great Northern deferred got no distribution this half-year, but they have done well. Great Central will pay in full on the '89 and '91 preferences. I consider these the cheapest purchases on the market. The Southern passenger lines are the favourites of the Stock Exchange. All have done fairly well, especially the South Eastern and Chatham; Metropolitans and Districts share in the prosperity, and the latter line is especially well managed both financially and from a railway man's point of view.

YANKEES.—There has been more business in the American Market during the past week than in any other section of the House. It almost looks as though the public meant once again to begin to gamble in American Railways. The persistence of the big houses in getting some of their stocks listed in Paris has produced an effect on London, for the Frenchman is notoriously cautious. That Atchisons should be dealt in on the Paris Bourse is a hall-mark of respectability. The crop report was not so bad. Oats are a failure, but cotton, corn, and wheat will make up for this. The great heat in America frightened people, and they imagined that it had had much more effect than has actually turned out to be the case. The Southern lines are being bought, especially Little Southern, for they benefit by the carriage of cotton. It looks as though the whole of the Southern States would have a good year. All the big Yankee houses talk bullish, and although there is nothing more dangerous than to pose as a prophet in the American market I am inclined to think that we shall see a higher level of prices.

RUBBER.—The bears have been scared out of their position by a manipulated rise in the price of rubber. Fine, hard-cured Para was marked up 6d., and the sale-rooms followed suit. Whether these prices will hold is most doubtful. The big buyers decline to come in. They say that they only buy from hand-to-mouth. But the Lane is determined, and has been buying heavily the last few days. The "Arbuthnot Relief" Trust report was a scandalous document. Nearly £200,000 has been lost. The company has been managed with great lack of discretion and the board will have to face some nasty questions at the meeting. The public keeps out of the market, and the dealings resolve themselves into a battle between the Lane and the House.

OIL needs no mention, for the dealings in this market are nil. Shell and Spies both appear weak, notwithstanding a rise in price in Russian oil. Kerns have been as low as 7s., which seems too cheap. But the company is overburdened with capital, and experts are saying nasty things about the field itself.

KAFFIRS.—The squabble between East Rand and the Cinderella does not look pretty. Albus say that East Rand must pump the Angelo ground at their own expense. This the Farrar group declines to do. It is quite possible that the Transvaal Trust might close down Cinderella until it can connect with the Cason shaft. The decision of the Farrar has not helped the Kaffir market.

RHODESIANS have not been bought, but Chartered have nevertheless looked each day as though they might go up. Some of the jobbers talk very wildly about the coming boom. I confess that as a pure gamble I like the look of the Rhodesian market better than any other in the House. There are plenty of bears about, and if the Houses could only combine we should see a rise.

MISCELLANEOUS markets have been amused by the way Marconis have jumped. The report is peculiar, like the company itself. We are told to wait until the meeting. The shares appear over-priced.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE "SPECTATOR" AND THE "ENGLISH REVIEW"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I crave permission to endorse the statement of Monsieur Davray, that the fight between the two current ideas of morality is "nothing less than a war between the spirit of emancipation and the spirit of slavery."

The gist of the whole matter is that the Spectator makes a fictitious defence of morality, whilst the English Review's attitude is a real defence. Why is this?

Fundamentally, immorality does not emanate from the mind or spirit, but from the body. Humanly speaking, therefore, there is no mental or spiritual ground of morality to construct on, and the Spectator's ideal ground of purity is, as I have said, a fictitious or morally untenable ground. This is not the case with the English Review. This journal's ground of morality is a natural, and therefore a real ground, and as such its sense of what constitutes immorality is real, not ideal. For instance, Mr. Harris hides nothing because he has nothing to hide. In other words, there is no beauty about Mr. Harris's exposure of our lack of natural purity; otherwise, as every sane mortal must admit, it would not constitute a true indictment of morality. On the other hand, the Spectator is so imbued with moral grace as to be practically blind to all other forms of moral wickedness (its own included) except just those forms which its sense of moral grace leads it to discover in the pages of the English Review.

Verily, Puritanism is only an English term for Pharisaism. Surely a nation is not to be made morally clean before it has been cleansed of its moral filth. And how on earth is the moral filth to be swept away if it is always to be hidden, as the Spectator would have it, under spurious ideas of modern purity?

No, Sir, what is really necessary for us is to get rid of our present damning attitude of cant and hypocrisy, and that which will follow will be so surprising that even the awakening force of the English Review (awakening because it has had the courage to expose the Beast) will no longer be required. In fact, every wheel of our national machinery needs attention.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been a reader of, and occasional contributor to, THE ACADEMY since its beginning in 1870. I write now to say how exceedingly sorry I am that the present managing staff seem to abet one of their contributors in his recent deplorable effusion in the English Review. Some of the previous editors of THE ACADEMY never failed to castigate literary lubricity, and the disappearance of a scrofulous novel (which I may nickname "The Harness") was mainly owing to a recent editor of THE ACADEMY. Why should not an excellent review that does such service in conserving what is good in politics not join (at least tacitly) with the Spectator in this most serious question of public morality?

A SHOCKED CLERGYMAN.

July 11, 1911.

[When a "scrofulous novel" is submitted to us for review, or a "scrofulous" article offered to us, we shall brand the one as it deserves and return the other. Our reasons for condemning the article which appeared in the Spectator of June 10th were fully set forth in our Editorial. The correspondence which has since appeared in that review, coupled with the spasmodic, irrelevant, and wholly inconclusive notes by the Editor, have confirmed us in the view that every word of our article was entirely justified.—ED. THE ACADEMY]

PECKSNIFF AND THE "ENGLISH REVIEW"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me to quote a letter from Mr. G. W. E. Russell with which the Spectator, appropriately enough, ends its controversy with Mr. Harris and the English Review. Its spirit throws a white light upon the personality of Mr. Russell and the attitude towards Art of the Spectator and its supporters in general, and seems to me therefore to deserve a wider circulation. As an example of unfairness and Pecksniffian pomposity (to say the least of it) the letter would be hard to beat. It runs as follows:—

I have been asked to give my opinion on the controversy between the Spectator and the English Review, and I should feel that I was shirking a public duty if I refused to comply. Assuming, as I suppose I may, that the quotations given in your issue of June 10th are accurate, I think that your strictures are absolutely justified.—I am, Sir, &c.,
GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

Without further comment, I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

H. SAVAGE.

THE NECESSITOUS LADIES' HOLIDAY FUND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—You were good enough on previous occasions to allow me space in your valuable paper to appeal for contributions to provide holidays by the sea or country side for necessitous ladies.

Through the generosity of your readers I was enabled to bring rest and refreshment to many.

I appeal again for help to send away governesses, typewriters, hospital nurses, secretaries, musicians, actresses, and ladies engaged in other professions, who, unable to provide holidays for themselves and without the possibility of earning money in the summer months, are left behind in London exposed to the sufferings attendant on poverty.

In this happy Coronation year I plead for those too proud to plead for themselves; for the overworked and unfortunate, and more especially for those broken down in health.

All contributions will be thankfully acknowledged and gratefully distributed by—Your obedient servant,

CONSTANCE BEERBOHM.

"THE ONLY WAY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett's article "The Only Way," in your issue of July 8th, with interest and surprise. Presumably the author is associated with the Unionist party, and therefore it is only natural to expect him to show his party's policy in its most favourable light; but from careful reading of his advisory epistle to the Unionist Peers, I find his party possesses no constructive policy save that of Tariff Reform, which he regards as being of little value to his party's cause in the possible autumnal General Election. Later (page 38, lines 12-17) Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett proves to his own satisfaction that the passing of the Parliament Bill will leave the Unionist party complete masters of the situation, while in the last eight lines of his article the writer states that when in this position his party will make the Upper House a business-like and representative Chamber, "free from backwoodsmen," and apparently all other evils.

Now, Sir, I contend that the writer's previous advice to the Unionist Peers to pass the Parliament Bill only on the arrival within the Gilded Chamber of the first horde of "the Radical party hacks" is illogical, for he has conclusively shown that the destruction of the Liberal majority in the House of Commons synchronises with the Parliament Bill becoming law.

In conclusion, Sir, I beg to express the opinion that though brighter days may be in store for the Unionist party, their coming will not be hastened either by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's regrettable admissions or contradictory advice.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
P. LITHERLAND SEED.

A QUERY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—What does "intrigue" mean? In "The Severins," by Mrs. A. Sidgwick, p. 156, I read, "It intrigued Mrs. Walsingham."

Does it mean "puzzled"? and if so, why use a French word when we have an English one? When was the word first used in English in this sense? No one out here seems to know it.—I am, &c.,

W. F. HOWLETT.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

FOR the present Wales, rather than Ireland, appears to merit the title of the "distressful country." At Cardiff the strike of seamen, dock labourers, and those engaged in similar occupations, has broken out again violently. It is impossible to say, going to press in the middle of the week as we do, what developments will occur by the time these words are read, but that the situation is regarded as very serious is proved by the fact that several hundred members of the Metropolitan Police have been sent down to reinforce the local authorities. The usual concomitants of labour troubles have not been lacking in this instance. A portion of the crowd, becoming intoxicated with the aid of broached hogsheads of looted stout, proceeded to extremes, even deliberately hindering the firemen in their task of extinguishing a warehouse conflagration which was supposed to have been started by incendiaries; stones were thrown, stores were broken into, and many constables were hurt. As we have before observed in these columns in connection with these lamentable signs of the times, a strike spreads like a disease; one man infects ten, ten carry the rebellious notions and the excitement to a hundred, and the mischief is done. No strong hand is at the helm; only incompetent navigators peer at the charts carefully prepared by the statesmen of old, and decide that their own methods are preferable; and so the trouble grows, and in time of storm and stress the ship veers sadly from her true course.

The Victoria Memorial has just been added to the list of London's monuments, and now we are busied about selecting sculptors and sites for statues commemorative of King Edward. The Committee for London has decided that the Piccadilly end of the Broad Walk in the Green Park will be the most suitable spot for a statue worthy of the Metropolis, the only other position seriously competing with this being Charing Cross. We understand, and note with pleasure, that among the many schemes originally suggested the Committee has not lost sight of the fact that King Edward's name might be honourably and laudably connected with some less ornamental, more educative work than a mere statue; the project with regard to a building for the University of London is well worth serious consideration. In the matter of public memorials we are a peculiarly unfortunate nation; we are constantly being criticised by others as an "inartistic" people. Some day, perhaps, we shall produce a really exquisite work of art which will satisfy half the critics. The other half, of course, will continue their congenial occupation.

Articles on the heat-wave may be depended upon, as a rule, to bring rain within forty-eight hours, English weather being generally extremely sarcastic in its methods. So far, however, scarcely a shower has varied the sunny monotony of the days, although happily a few breezes, fresh with faint odours of far-away meadows, have mitigated the effects of the sultry temperature. It is curious to see London stealthily, almost shame-facedly, certainly suspiciously, adapting itself to the heat—masculine London, that is, for ladies array themselves in the most tantalisingly cool attire at the first breath of summer; it takes a week of blazing sunshine to make the average Englishman discard his umbrella, and not until a melting month has passed will he don his thinnest wear. Tea on shady lawns, ices of bewitching hues and flavours, cooling salads and beverages are the order of the day. And why not cooling books? It would be eminently reasonable to read, let us say, of Lieutenant Shackleton's freezing exploits in the Antarctic regions when our thermometers are creeping through the eighties, or to refresh our memories of Dr. Kane's plucky endeavours in Northern ice-packs what time the sun is doing his best to remind us of Central Africa. Meanwhile the farmers are grumbling; but we may take consolation from the fact that if it rained for four days they would cry "Enough!" and grumble again.

The allotted span of threescore years and ten has been reached this week by one of our best friends—Mr. Punch—but he shows no signs, we are pleased to note, of going down hill to oblivion. In fact, he absolutely ridicules the idea of the sere and yellow leaf, and has the effrontery to flaunt in Time's face a special "Birthday Number" in sheer defiance of any suggestion of old age. What with the Coronation Number and this week's budget, Punch will soon be all special issues; but they are all good, and a glance through the present one is an education in the way we have progressed since 1841. It is curious to note one drawing illustrating a dialogue which was then thought very funny, but is now a commonplace occurrence—the "fare" remonstrating with the driver of a "patent mile-index cab" to the effect that he has only gone from St. Paul's to Fleet Street, "yet the dial points to three miles." "Can't help it," retorts the driver, "you must pay according." This, in 1847, was an excruciating joke; but it was more than that—it was an uncommonly intelligent forecast of events that were to happen half a century after. The various "crazes" which afflict the whole population intermittently, the freaks of fashion, the vagaries of politics, are all hit off unerringly by the licensed jester of the Press, and we can only acknowledge gratefully the source of so many hearty laughs, while wishing for Punch a second spell of seventy years. Any further good wishes may safely be left to those who at that time are depending on his columns to relieve the tedium of a journey by airship express.

THE BLUE VASE

The little figures on the jar of blue
 Still smile and dance as they did yesterday,
 Though gone the roses and the jasmine spray,
 And nought is left to grace the vase but rue—
 A fitting herb upon my heart to strew,
 And on the grave of my fair hopes to lay;
 For since my lady bright has passed away
 The flowers of my life have vanished too.
 O dainty lass and ever-smiling lad,
 Dancing to some unheard Arcadian strain,
 You little people who are never sad,
 What can you know of sorrow or of pain?
 Each day may bring fresh flowers to make you glad,
 But my delight can never come again.

AN INCORRIGIBLE NINCOMPOOP

THERE are two Ministers, as we have before remarked, who have achieved conspicuous success, and who have shed lustre on the party to which they belong. We refer to the Lord Chancellor and Mr. John Burns. Why have these Ministers also deserved well of their country? Surely because they have been fearless, straightforward and—above all—honest. It is well known of course that the qualities which we have enumerated as entitling Lord Loreburn and Mr. Burns to respectful appreciation render them abhorrent to many of the advanced wing of their party. Dissatisfaction is with the majority of their critics confined to "profitless murmurs." There is however one young man, a lieutenant in the Buckinghamshire Yeomanry, whose Parliamentary career commenced so long ago as January of last year, who has gone forth with his shepherd's sling to slay the gigantic Philistine. The enterprise is one of supreme interest, and there will be a desire to know something about the previous achievements of the redoubtable Philistine.

"Bob" Reid has been Solicitor and Attorney-General, has earned the distinction of G.C.M.G. for striking services in the British Guiana and Venezuelan Boundary Arbitration, and was a pillar of the extreme Radical party in the House of Commons for twenty-five years. So much of the man against whom the lieutenant is directing his polished pebbles.

Leaving out of view for the moment that the name of Mr. Neil Primrose is still omitted from the Commission of the Peace for any county—except indeed the County of London—what is the head and front of the offending of his doughty antagonist? It is that the Lord Chancellor in selecting men for a judicial office has been honest enough to seek fitness and capacity irrespective of political attachment. A Royal Commission has inquired into the method of appointing Justices, and has made certain recommendations. One of these—the appointment of Committees to assist the Lords-Lieutenant—has been acted on by the Lord Chancellor. A large number of Committees have been appointed, but at present they have not had the opportunity of proving their usefulness.

The action which has been taken will we think be considered as satisfactory—until events have shown it to be otherwise—even by most politicians whose political career has lasted for a full eighteen months.

Not so Mr. Neil Primrose. He views with profound dissatisfaction appointments which have been made, and is of opinion that the appointment of the Committees we have referred to will do little to secure selection of the type of men whom he would like to see adorning the Bench. Indulgence must of course be shown to the "fiery vehemence of youth," but when a young man to whom can be credited no conspicuous success, in effect condemns Royal Commissioners, a Lord Chancellor, Lords-Lieutenant and Advisory Committees which have not yet acted, we feel inclined and entitled to refer to him as an incorrigible nincompoop.

Mr. Asquith hopes, no doubt by interposing delay, to calm down the blatant folly of this egregious person, and—if he is capable of realising patent facts—to let him perceive the inevitable outcome of his ridiculous censure. This soldier and statesman, if his resolution is ever allowed to consume the time of a Chamber, the value of whose deliberations is variously estimated, will be reduced to a dilemma such as this.

His demand simply is that Radical Lord Chancellors are to view appointments to the Bench as the perquisite of the most active of their political supporters, and that the spirit of the Corrupt Practices legislation shall not apply to judicial preferment.

Discussion on a resolution embodying this standpoint in clear and unmistakable terms, would not involve the charge of wasting the time of the House of Commons, because it would clear the atmosphere as to the type of Chamber which lays claim to unfettered action.

TWO SPECIALISTS ON MORALS

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

WE have followed with considerable interest, and with not a little amusement, the controversy which has been raging for some weeks past between the Spectator and the English Review. The subject in dispute—namely, a happy adjustment between the laws of Nature and the laws framed by man for the safeguarding of Society—is a delicate one to handle; but as it has been agitating the world ever since man emerged from a state of primitive barbarism, there is no reason why we should not deal with it in these columns. Mr. Frank Harris, in his article in the English Review, defends the demands of Nature against the too strict enforcement of the Moral Code. He maintains that the majority of men must sow a fairly heavy crop of "wild oats," and that it is for the good of their species that they should be allowed in youth reasonable play for these active passions. But he goes still further, and advances the daring theory that women, by reason of their nature and their temperament, have an even greater capacity for sowing "wild oats" than men. From this there follows, in his mind, the natural corollary that a certain licence and tolerance should be extended to them as it is to man. Now this individual expression of a personal view has aroused the righteous ire and indignation of Mr. St. Lo Strachey, the pious editor of the Spectator, and in his issue of June 10th he pours a torrent of denunciation on Mr. Frank Harris, describing the latter's views as a "Recipe for making Harlots," and, not content with this, he denounces that original and independent periodical the English Review—to which almost all of our best authors have contributed—as "A dumping-ground for garbage." We blame both parties—Mr. Frank Harris for having started a discussion which he must have known can have no final settlement, and therefore had much better be left alone, and Mr. Strachey for having fallen into the trap and thus fanned the flames by his narrow-minded outburst in the Spectator.

You can write and talk, talk and write, and heap abuse on one another, but you cannot alter human nature and its infinite variety of mental and physical temperaments, and until you can cast all men and all women into a similar mould discussions on the rules and regulations for governing their morals must end exactly where they began. No useful purpose is served in stirring up a bog merely to produce a disagreeable odour, amidst the fumes of which respectable public men can call each other bad names.

Men and also women are born with totally different temperaments; the moral atmosphere in which they are brought up differs to an even greater extent, and whole races are affected by different environment and climatic conditions. How can you hope, therefore, to frame the same moral code for the warm-hearted, pleasure-loving, passionate Shakespeare and the cold, austere, Puritanical Mr. Strachey; or for the active, fervent, imaginative Mr. Frank Harris and that abstemious moralist Justinian? There are many men who go from the cradle to the grave without dropping a single "wild oat;" there are others who can hardly see the lights of a great city without at once hunting for suitable soil. Yet the one is not necessarily good and the other necessarily bad. It simply marks the difference in their physical nature. And what is true of man is also true of woman. In individual and domestic matters of this sort each man and woman must be allowed to work out his or her own mode of life. There is a happy medium between the nun and the courtesan, the monk and the roué, which the majority of mankind are content to follow, and it would be much better if both Mr. Frank Harris and Mr. St. Loe Strachey let them alone and did not inquire too closely into their habits, for if there ever was a case this is one "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise."

Let us say at once that we do not propose to enter into the merits of the controversy or to display any violent partisanship, but rather to criticise and examine the methods in which it has been conducted. But before doing so we would like to quote one passage from Lecky's "History of European Morals," in which that great thinker and philosopher clearly recognises the courtesan as having a recognised and necessary position in modern society, without which the whole basis of family life would be undermined:

The essentially exclusive nature of marital affection, and the natural desire of every man to be certain of the paternity of the child he supports, render the incursions of irregular passions within the domestic circle a cause of extreme suffering. Yet it would appear as if the excessive force of these passions would render such incursions both frequent and inevitable. Under these circumstances, there has arisen in society a figure which is certainly the most mournful, and in some respects the most awful, upon which the eye of the moralist can dwell. That unhappy being whose very name is a shame to speak; who counterfeits with a cold heart the transports of affection, and submits herself as the passive instrument of lust; who is scorned and insulted as the vilest of her sex, and doomed, for the most part, to disease and abject wretchedness and an early death, appears in every age as the perpetual symbol of the degradation and the sinfulness of man. Herself the supreme type of vice, she is ultimately the most efficient guardian of virtue. But for her, the unchallenged purity of countless happy homes would be polluted, and not a few who, in the pride of their untempted chastity, think of her with an indignant shudder would have known the agony of remorse and of despair. On that one degraded and ignoble form are concentrated the passions that might have filled the world with shame. She remains, while creeds and civilisations rise and fall, the eternal priestess of humanity, blasted for the sins of the people.

For some time the struggle was carried on with due regard to the customary rules of polite society when gentlemen disagree, but now all sense of decency, dignity, and deportment has been ruthlessly cast aside by both parties, the dispute has lost its original significance, and has degenerated into the lowest form of personal vilification and abuse. Let us say at once that the attitude taken up by Mr. Austin

Harrison, the editor of the English Review, has been dignified throughout. There was no need for him to take any notice whatever of the absurd outbreak of the pious editor of the Spectator, which has excited the disgust of the broad-minded and tolerant in this country and the contempt and derision of the French literary world. Mr. Harrison, however, did reply in a short letter, which proved, although proof was totally unnecessary, the excellent lines on which the English Review is being conducted. His protests have been backed by almost every well-known author in the land, whilst hardly a voice, except the pathetic wail of a "shocked parson or two," has been raised in defence of the Spectator.

But we are forgetting — there is the mighty manifesto of a certain Mr. George Russell, which for sheer nerve and lack of humour beats anything seen in print for many a long day. It is as follows:—

I have been asked to give my opinion on the controversy between the Spectator and the English Review, and I should feel that I was shirking a public duty if I refused to comply. Assuming, as I suppose I may, that the quotations given in your issue of June 10th are accurate, I think that your strictures are absolutely justified.—I am, Sir,

GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

Of course, after this all-important manifesto, which reads more like a Papal Bull of the Middle Ages than a serious contribution to an intellectual discussion, it is useless to argue further. If Mr. George W. E. Russell has made up his mind, surely the rest of the world will accept his judgment as final in a spirit of infinite humility. We must go down on our knees and humbly thank him for not "having shirked a public duty." Supposing this noble-minded man had done so! It is too awful to contemplate! Most of us would have been left in complete darkness as to the right or wrong of the quarrel. Mr. Russell at once raises himself above all the great men who ever lived. Even the Prophets did not expect us to take all for granted; they at least condescended to explain their doctrines and ethics, but Mr. Russell tells us to rely on faith, and faith alone.

We are irresistibly reminded of a story of Disraeli when he was Leader of the House of Commons. A junior member of his own Government was making a speech in rounded periods, replete with self-importance, but throwing little light on the subject under discussion. He sat down amidst the cheers of his supporters, and when these had subsided somewhat the immortal voice of his own leader was heard to mutter, "Pompous ass! Pompous ass!"

Up to last week the author of the article which so shocked the Spectator had maintained a dignified silence, and we were hoping that the controversy was about to burn itself out when Mr. Frank Harris, no longer able to contain his injured feelings, rushes into print and addresses a letter to the "Editor of the Spectator" the like of which has surely never been seen before, and we sincerely hope will never be seen again. It occupies nearly three columns of close type, and embraces almost every subject from Morals, Editors, Lynch Law, and Piccadilly Circus at Midnight, to the Jameson Raid, Dreadnoughts, and Salome. It is broken at intervals to enable the author to take breath and to heap abuse on his detractor, Mr. St. Loe Strachey; and, not being able to command enough epithets to express his own feelings, he calls in that master of well-chosen vituperation, Mr. Lloyd George, to assist him. We think Mr. Frank Harris has done a bad turn to those who have stood by him and by the English Review in this fight for liberty of thought and freedom of expression, because by far the greater part of his outburst is totally irrelevant, and the language of the remainder could only be employed by one gentleman to another in a country where duelling has been abolished by law.

We can only assume that Mr. Frank Harris wrote this letter in a moment of pique and annoyance, never anticipating that it would find its way into print, and it will surely make him more careful in the future. He should remember that hackneyed, but nevertheless true French phrase, "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse." He should also remember that when a man is so hard up to defend his attitude as was the editor of the Spectator in this dispute, that he could find no arguments for himself or friends to argue for him, he is only too anxious to take advantage of the mistakes of his opponents, and he must have seized with a malicious joy the opportunity to publish a letter which must necessarily bring him the sympathy of all those who like to see quarrels settled with a due regard to decorum. At the end of Mr. Harris's letter is a short editorial note, which is nothing but a pæan of joy at the opportunity of publishing it.

This appeared in the Spectator of July 8th, and the editor of the Spectator, having been hopelessly worsted throughout, might well have congratulated himself on having "got a little of his own back" through Mr. Frank Harris's indiscretion. But in the following issue of July 15th he gives himself hopelessly away, and behaves in an even more childish manner than Mr. Frank Harris. He inserts in his columns a dignified protest, signed by almost all the authors of repute in England, protesting against the attitude of the Spectator towards the English Review. It contains such honoured names as Thomas Hardy, Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, Maurice Hewlett, Somerset Maugham, H. G. Wells, Eden Phillpotts, W. B. Yeats, George Moore, and Henry Arthur Jones, besides scores of others too numerous to mention. The editor of the Spectator makes no effort to answer this protest, because he knows that he cannot, and therefore, at a loss for argument, he falls back on that weakest and most contemptible of all substitutes, a cheap sneer, and affixes the following:—

We cannot say we find the list impressive.—Ed. Spectator.

This comes from the Editor of a paper which professes to be "a weekly review of Politics, Literature, Theology, and Art." Of its politics let us merely say this. The Editor professes to be "inspired." He would have his readers believe that Kings, Cabinet Ministers, and Great Viceroys are hourly thronging his outer office to let him know what is really going to happen, and their views are set forth in the most pompous and sententious language ever seen in print. The net result is that the unfortunate Editor has contradicted himself so often during the past four weeks, and has got tied into such knots that none of his readers can have any idea what his views are, or what is going to be the outcome of the present political crisis. Those interested in literature will surely appraise at its proper value a paper edited by a man who goes out of his way to insult all the best-known authors in the country in the most childish manner we have ever known. Of its theology we know nothing, except that the editor's knowledge of the ethics of Christianity must be absolutely nil if we judge them from his methods of conducting a literary dispute, and the dissemination of his views would do far more harm to humanity than the passage in Mr. Frank Harris's article to which he takes such exception. Of its views on Art we know little, but should rather deduce from the editor's intolerant and stereotyped attitude towards life that he must spend a good part of every twenty-four hours gazing in reverence and rapture at the Victoria Memorial whenever he is able to tear himself away from that erected to the memory of the late Prince Consort.

We must draw a veil over this historic controversy, but, before doing so, we should like to give a word of advice to the Spectator and to those who are responsible for its future management. We live in a tolerant, broad-minded age, and the Papal Bull and the methods of the Inquisition no longer find favour amongst us. There are some forty millions of people in England, of whom possibly ten thousand read the Spectator each week, but no responsible journal can afford to disregard the varying views of the other thirty-nine million nine hundred and ninety thousand. Men hold different views on morals as well as on politics, and it is hopeless to expect all to see eye to eye with one another. Each is entitled to the expression of his own views, and there is nothing immoral in holding unorthodox opinions. Imagination and originality must be allowed free play, otherwise we should find ourselves stuck in a hopeless bog of stagnation and ineptitude. If your neighbour differs from you, do not hope to crush him by vulgar abuse or undignified invective, but by argument and logic. It is absurd for any man or any journal to set up as the universal arbiter of the actions and views of his fellow-creatures. The moral Mr. Turveydrop, Master of Department, can find no place in a democratic, enlightened age. "Live and let live" is a good motto, for beyond that narrow circle of befuddled clubmen, passionless curates and political nonentities, who swallow with their dinner the monumental platitudes and portentous prophecies such as are weekly purveyed by the Spectator, there is a great human world which, day by day, hour by hour, is working out the problem of life for itself, taking nothing for granted and nothing as final. Let the Editor of the Spectator remember that this great world, which only worships "the God of Things as they are," is looking for ideas and for freedom to express them. It is not content to accept as final the judgment of any—

Barren spirited-fellow ; one that feeds
On abjects, orts and imitations
Which, out of use and staled by other men,
Begin his fashion.

THE INSURANCE BILL FROM THE EMPLOYER'S STANDPOINT

SINCE the first introduction of the National Insurance Bill newspapers and periodicals representing every shade of political opinion have devoted column upon column of their pages to its discussion and criticism. Yet, amidst this uproar of conflicting opinions, comparatively little attention has been devoted to the probable effect of the Bill upon the employer of labour. He is vitally interested in its operation ; the nation, as a whole, must stand or fall largely according to his prosperity or failure. It therefore behoves us closely to examine how far, and whether beneficially or adversely, his welfare will be affected should the Bill become law.

At the outset it may safely be declared that every employer is entirely in sympathy with the objects which the Bill is intended to secure—namely, the improvement of the conditions under which his employees live. But the employer's approval of the measure stops there, for he examines with growing alarm the proposals by whose means it is intended to attain that end, in itself so desirable. All the conditions and possibilities reviewed, he sees only that he and his fellow-employers are not likely to reap any substantial benefit, while they must certainly lose heavily in many ways as a result of the scheme being enforced.

The disadvantages which the passing of this Bill would entail upon British undertakings would prove a very serious menace to the prosperity of our communities. Every employer, irrespective of the individual profits or productiveness of the enterprise he conducts, would have to pay a poll-tax of 3d. per week for each man he employs at a wage of less than £3 per week. Where the employee's wages fall below 2s. 6d. per day a higher tax would be imposed; while in certain specified industries it would be further increased to 5½d. per head to provide for benefits during unemployment.

These charges, it must be remembered, form an entirely new and additional expense to the employer of British labour. But his liability does not end there. As a large taxpayer he must inevitably contribute a portion of the sum raised by the State to meet the cost of the scheme; and as local ratepayer he will be mulcted yet a third time in his share of the increased expenses incurred by the local authorities on account of municipal employees' insurance and the discharge of other new duties created under the Bill. In short, every industry in the country, from farm and factory to local store, will be called upon to bear this triple burden. A poll-tax in proportion to the number of employees, and increases in the already heavy taxation for Imperial and local administration.

How can such additional burdens (amounting, in some instances, to a tax of as much as 10 per cent. on income) be borne by the industries in which the employer is engaged? Some, more favourably situated than the rest, protected by natural or local conditions, will certainly succeed in drawing the whole or a large portion of this increased impost out of their customers' pockets. They have no fear of foreign competitors, and their only difficulty will lie in the possibility of an increased cost ultimately reducing the demand for their products.

Certain trade combinations, such as Messrs. Brunner, Mond, and Co., alkali manufacturers, enjoying, as it were, partial monopolies, are in a similarly favoured position; but the less fortunate industries, which are exposed to world-wide competition, cannot adopt the expedient of making the consumer pay the extra cost. This amount, however, must obviously be made up in some way. Deduction from wages is barred by the provisions of the Bill, and still more effectively in many trades by the power of the Trade Unions; increase in the price of products is checked as thoroughly by foreign competition, which, in the present state of our tariff system, even now threatens to throttle many trades.

There remain only two other sources from which this new impost—this increase in production charges—might be met, by a reduction of profits, or by a wholesale introduction of labour-saving machinery.

The former avenue, however, is "no thoroughfare," for the profits made by our manufacturers and employers of labour in general are not sufficiently high to permit such reduction, even if only slight. It has been estimated that the total burden imposed on this country's industries by this measure would amount to about £10,000,000 annually, which represents 5½ per cent. on a total production estimated at £180,000,000.

The vast majority of firms are working on a very low margin, and can devise no means of meeting the additional burden which would be imposed on them. For them shrunken profits will mean dwindling dividends, starved resources, and inadequate funds for maintenance, which in turn will render them unable to tide over periods of depression, to instal up-to-date machinery, or to seize favourable opportunities for expanding their business. Then at last they will find capital scared away and their credit vanished—a crisis that may be temporarily deferred, but, in the absence of any effective remedy, must ultimately overwhelm them.

What, then, of the last resource proposed—the extended use of labour-saving machinery? This, again, affords no solution of the problem. The smaller firms working on a narrow margin of profit would find themselves unable to raise the capital necessary for the introduction of such machinery; while to succeed in installing it the larger undertakings must strain their borrowing powers to the utmost, and this with a view to discharging many of their employees. Thus, on the one hand, those firms which survived the strain would be gravely handicapped, and, on the other, unemployment would assume alarming proportions, defeating the beneficent intentions underlying the Bill.

The advocates of the Bill may endeavour to brush aside these very grave objections, which render the measure in its present form a monument of folly from the standpoints of individual and national trade. They may suggest, perhaps, that the employer has succeeded in shouldering the burden imposed by the Workmen's Compensation Act without experiencing any results highly disastrous to himself. The employer to-day bears ungrudgingly the expense which the operation of that Act entails upon his purse, because he knows he is morally responsible for the accidents occurring to his workpeople when engaged on his business; but he feels himself in no way more responsible than is the rest of the community at large for the stress and accidents of his artisans' private lives. There is a clear distinction between a workman's incapacity due to his occupation and the ordinary sickness and infirmities which are the common lot of mankind. For the latter the individual employer cannot be considered responsible, as the Bill seeks to make him.

We have now disclosed the main disadvantages employers would suffer under the Bill; the question remains, Would it bring them any compensating benefits?

On this score the chief, and almost the sole, argument is that the employer will derive great benefit from the increased efficiency of his employees. It would be idle to deny that the next generation of workers are likely to be finer craftsmen than their predecessors owing to improved conditions of living being secured for the whole of the labouring community. So far we may allow the justice of the claim. But against this prospective advantage must be offset the danger of "malingering" becoming at once more prevalent.

The practice of "malingering" is, unfortunately, not uncommon to-day, and it is acknowledged that medical supervision is no efficient safeguard against this evil. At a recent meeting of the Walsall Chamber of Commerce convened to devise means for protecting employers against loss from this cause (under workmen's compensation claims) it was stated that "malingering" was "largely on the increase," one speaker urging recognition of the fact "that there are many men who prefer a third of their wages for doing nothing to working hard for the whole." The promise of 10s. per week as sick pay under the Insurance Bill would act as a further incentive to this practice. That it is a serious drawback will be recognised when it is remembered that the sudden absence of men from work in a highly organised industry spells disorganisation until they can be replaced. Each man is an essential link in the chain of such an organisation, and if the chain be broken a temporary dislocation of the system occurs. This, when multiplied, involves serious loss of time, power, and money.

In the United States employers spend considerable sums for the benefit of their workers, and claim that the cost is more than recouped owing to the greater efficiency secured. If "malingering" proves no serious drawback in the States it is because the employer himself distributes his contributions to his employees direct without Government intervention. Under the Insurance Bill the serious sacrifices which such contributions entailed upon the British employer would be overlooked by his workpeople, and the practical value of their moral obligation to him would thus be lost.

The position, in short, resolves itself into this: the employer is asked to consent to a measure which exposes his business to grave risk of extinction through the various channels of loss already described, in return for the possibility held out to him that his successor of the next generation may find more capable workpeople than those available to-day. From the humanitarian standpoint the final purpose of the Bill cannot be too highly praised; it is the means proposed which are unbusinesslike and inequitable in the extreme.

A point of equity on which the employer condemns the Bill is that it would impose a poll-tax based on the number of persons employed in every concern, instead of being a tax calculated on each undertaking's individual profits. As a provincial Chamber of Commerce recently pointed out, "the wages bill of an employer is no indication of the income of the employer, and the Bill, if passed in its present form will press with great severity on many small manufacturers and others who employ a large amount of labour for a comparatively small return for themselves."

There is another aspect in which the Bill should be viewed. Under its provisions those persons who had invested money in British enterprise would suffer heavy loss, while their more prudent, though less patriotic, fellow-countrymen enjoyed a substantial return on their capital. Let us take a concrete example haphazard. Why should the shareholders of the British firm of, say, Bayliss, Jones, and Bayliss be required to pay a larger contribution than the British shareholders in the Dutch firm of Stokvis and Zonen? During the three years, 1908, 1909, 1910, the former company earned no dividends, whereas the latter has paid dividends on its shares at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum since its inception in 1908. The shareholders in the former company, who had lent their capital with a view to furthering British enterprise, and had employed British workmen, were less able to meet the demands upon their pockets than the shareholders in the latter concern, whose capital was being applied to the employment of foreigners. Yet, if the Insurance Bill were passed in its present form, the former, as employers of British labour, would be required to meet a heavy additional charge, which the latter, employing foreign workmen, would entirely escape. How can the promoters of the Bill reconcile such inequalities, which must inevitably ensue upon its enactment, with their theory that the Bill as now drafted must operate entirely for the national well-being?

When we propound this query we are generally met with the reply that no doubt it seems rather hard on the shareholders in British firms, but that in Germany also, for example, where a similar insurance scheme is in force, the employer has to pay. In reality, however, the German people as a whole share his burden, for by means of an import duty the German is enabled to distribute the extra cost over his whole country.

In view of the great hardships which, as we have seen, the Bill must necessarily impose upon the majority of the employers of labour throughout this country, and which must inevitably nullify, to some extent, the benefits that the promoters of the Bill seek to secure for the employee class, it would certainly seem the duty of the State to relieve the employers of as much of this burden as possible.

If, then, in our case the State should prove unwilling itself to raise the sums necessary for the adoption of this Insurance scheme by taxing equally the whole community, the least that could be done would be to put all the country's industries upon the same footing as that upon which the manufacture of alcohol has been placed in the past. That is to say, in return for the excise-duty which is to be imposed upon this country's industries let an equivalent duty be charged on imported commodities, the product of foreign industries.

THE PROPHETS

By HILAIRE BELLOC

It is always fascinating to speculate as to what posterity will think of one's own time. Swift did it with bitterness—and failed. But for that matter such speculations commonly fail because it is so difficult to take oneself out of one's own time. I have sometimes thought, however, that by the analogy of history we could get some sort of idea of what posterity would say.

In the first place, throughout all history the most noticeable feature about the state of mind of any particular period and people is what the French call their donnés—that is, the things which they take for granted, and which they imagine all the rest of the world to take for granted. These things stand out like big, definite patches of darkness against the more or less decipherable page, and until we know them the meaning of the page is lost to us.

It is sometimes said that the difficulty lies in the fact that a period never tells one what it took for granted, but the trouble is a little more subtle than that. Individual writers often tell us in so many words what their age is taking for granted. The difficulty lies in the fact that they do not tell us why they take such things for granted; how they got to the state of mind. Thus the fourth century is dominantly Christian; but how did it become so?

Let us choose something that is taken for granted in all the thought of our time, and which posterity will certainly seize upon as an extraordinary case of unquestioned belief. It is taken for granted that the habits of existing savages are identical with those of our remote and prehistoric ancestors. Now that is not a donné about which modern writers are silent. On the contrary, if anything, they talk too much about it. You will find the principle definitely stated in perhaps three hundred books for the instruction of the young. But what you do not get (and what posterity will want) is the full process of reasoning by which so extraordinary a conviction was brought about.

You will get exactly the same thing in the ninth and early tenth centuries. It is a period in which writers love to mingle the marvellous (and now and then the certainly false) with the plainer statements of reality. I do not mean this in the general sense that an age of religious faith will be less sceptical than an age of religious decay, I mean it in the particular sense. It is not miracles that the writers of the end of the Dark Ages are out for, nor revelations, nor the consciousness of things beyond this narrow world. It is an appetite for and a bias towards the extraordinary, and for that matter the impossible. Such a tone being applied to history does not vitiate history, for it only deals with sporadic facts, and not with a chain of cause and effect; but to the modern reader it is very irritating. For instance, Eginhard's "Life of Charlemagne" is a plain and rather bald statement of fact. Get you well onward into the ninth century, and the monk of St. Gall packs the story of Charlemagne with legend; the more of the atmosphere of dream that he can get in, the happier he is.

Well, these worthy people take it for granted that you want the marvellous, and hunt it out for you, and even invent it for you. What none of them do is to tell you how they got their point of view.

Consider another thing which is characteristic of our time. We take it for granted that there we are engaged in a definite procession from one particular society to another. We have a fairly clear idea of each in our heads. The first idea—the idea of the past—is rather too simple. With that we need not much concern ourselves, because the idea that the past was so and so, plain and square, is common to every period, and to be somewhat wrong about it must be common to all popular judgments at all times. What is really extraordinary and peculiar to our time is our unconscious conviction that we are proceeding from that erroneously conceived past to a certain definite future of a type that never has existed, and, what is even more extraordinary, of a sort to which the steps we take year by year do not lead. You will hear a public orator say, "In the past nations were separated by difficulties of travel," &c., and then go on to say that in the future they are going to know a great deal more about each other, and that the world is going to form one state with mutual understanding and universal peace, and all the rest of it. That man is acting the part of a wild, irresponsible prophet. He is taking for granted very much more than the man who claims to tell you the name of next year's Derby winner. He is supposing himself acquainted with the whole designs of Providence. But speaking thus at a public dinner he will not impress his audience as a wild seer. They will not think of him as a prophet who is talking about things that he cannot possibly know. They will think of him as a commonplace fellow uttering platitudes.

Now if a regular series of events were proceeding in such a fashion that we could strike a curve, as it were, and determine from the equation of that curve that it was leading towards the goal this gentleman postulates, he would have no reason indeed for his security in prophesying, but at least an excuse. Curves of historical development are not simple, they are exceedingly complex; but if a man can strike a portion of the curve he may be excused for thinking that he has discovered an equation for the whole of it, and one that will bind it in all its evolution. For instance, if a man in 1860 had said that Europe at the present time would be everywhere a gridiron of railways, such as Belgium is, he would have been wrong; but railway development was going on at such a rate that he would have had an excuse for being wrong. What no one has even an excuse for is pretending to have the equation of a curve when they have not got so much as the elements of a section of it. That state of society in which nations know more about each other is not approaching, it is receding—or rather there is a most complicated process of the increase of one kind of knowledge of foreign affairs in one nation, accompanied by the decrease of that sort of knowledge in another sphere in the same nation; and every nation differs from its neighbour in the nature of its growing advantages and disadvantages in this respect.

Thus the French during the last twenty years have enormously increased their knowledge of English literature and social life. The Germans in the last forty or fifty years have spread an elementary knowledge of certain general facts about foreign nations widely among their populace. A group of wealthy Americans have become what Americans never were before—that is, cosmopolitan—and Russia has grown, in her sudden modern development, to be largely managed by Poles and Germans. Again, Germans now travel in Italy much more than they did, and there is a commercial intercommunication between Asia and Europe much larger than anything we have had in the past.

But, on the other hand, the instructed opinion of Great Britain has turned itself more and more to the British Colonies and to the United States, and in general to what is called "The English-speaking World." It knows far less of Europe than it did one hundred years ago. The Italian travels in great numbers to special parts of the world, notably to the United States, and brings back his experiences to instruct his fellows at home; but it is the poor Italian who travels thus, not the well-to-do or educated Italian. The educated part of North Germany knew much more about France fifty years ago than it knows now. Indeed when one travels in North Germany to-day one of the things that strikes one most is the curious ignorance of responsible people about the military and social condition of their great military rival. German acquaintance with the English language is extraordinary, but the ignorance one meets of English and English-speaking things which are necessary to a comprehension of England is more extraordinary still.

Bismarck said that Gladstone wanted to make himself the President of an English Republic. You cannot imagine Frederick the Great saying that Voltaire wanted to make himself the Pope of a Gallican Church—and yet of the two statements the one is no more ridiculous than the other.

Of that vast and common intercommunication between countries which characterised Europe four hundred years ago, an intercommunication carried on by the best educated and the best-trained men of the time, active, vivacious, and constant, informed by a universal language—not a trace remains; nevertheless, we are still doomed to speakers at public dinners prophesying the universal brotherhood of man, and we must bear with them for some time to come.

Another thing that posterity will surely notice about us is the extraordinary loss of values which we seem to have suffered compared with more orderly periods. You do not need any great research or speculation to convince you of this matter. You have but to look up the files of newspapers in the British Museum. Take any little period you like—the Dreyfus excitement, or the Three Acres and a Cow business of our youth, or even a period in which there was no particular puppet being jerked before the audience. Read what was written and printed. Take half a day at the business and I'll warrant you'll come out singularly instructed and with a proper contempt for your newspaper of to-day. The world in those yellow and cracked pages is always coming to an end. Various cataclysms are perpetually imminent, and, what is comic, real movements, plain indications of things to come, are invariably missed. There is always going to be a great European war in the West. Of a lengthy struggle within the boundaries of the British Empire, of the murderous wrestle between Russia and the new Japan, there is not a hint. While the German Navy is growing it is not the German Navy you hear of, it is the French and the Russian. At one election in the United States you have the sheep all flocking in a herd to prophesy a quarrel between East and West: no one sees in the near future the Spanish-American War.

Now we cannot blame men for failing to prophesy right, but we can blame them for prophesying so perpetually and so continually, and in so rasping and aggressive a tone of voice, during thirty futile years—and perhaps this note of futile, insistent prophecy, of cocksureness before the unknown, and of contempt for reality will most mark for posterity our scientific age. If, indeed, it manages to be recollected at all!

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR—V.

By FRANK HARRIS

CURIOUSLY enough, it is seldom the greatest things which strike one most at the moment. A certain perspective is necessary in order to see a masterpiece in its true proportions. On leaving Dijon, the thing most present to me was not the Ducal Palace or the splendid work of Claus Sluter, but a building I've never even mentioned—the Palais de Justice, and in it an astonishing Renaissance-room. It is painted in deep blue all starred with golden fleurs-de-lis, and lighted by great bay-windows; the ceiling is divided into deep squares of carved wood. I don't know why, but the columned porch, too, of this building made a great impression on me, an impression of austere reserve which contrasted finely with the gorgeous room in its robes of blue and gold. This building and the "Hostel Dieu" at Beaune seemed to have imprinted themselves in my blood.

We ran out of Dijon in the early morning resolved to sleep in Paris. To our astonishment every one was in the streets; it was the first stage of the great aeroplane contest, and some airmen had already dropped into the town, which was all agog with curiosity. Our way at first took us past the Chartreuse de Champmol, hidden in its park on the slope of a steep hill, and then out into the country, side by side with the great tree-fringed canal of Burgundy. I did not expect any fine scenery; I did not want any; I had had a glut of natural beauty, and wanted rather to live with the memories of the wonderful art I had seen in Dijon; but I was soon forced to admit that in its own way this country, too, was entrancingly lovely. True, there were no great mountains or awesome gorges in it, no Mont Blancs or Rhone-rifts; but everything is relative, and these wooded hills, with here and there naked ramparts of stone—a couple of hundred feet of sheer cliff—were sufficiently imposing. The landscape varied at every moment; the air was astonishingly clear, vivid, exhilarating, and over all the sunshine of early summer, with the warmth of a kiss.

We had made up our minds to go through Sens and Fontainebleau to Paris; but first of all we meant to see Avallon and Vezelay. How beautiful these French names are—Avallon and Vezelay sing themselves in the ear like Chambord and Chénonceaux on the Loire. The most beautiful English names are nearly all French, like Hurstmonceaux. After running for about thirty-five kilometres we branched off to the left to Avallon. We found it a small town of about five thousand inhabitants, splendidly situated on a great rocky promontory, looking down on the river Cousin. There was nothing else interesting in this "town of apples," and so we hurried on to Vezelay. I wonder how many English readers know of Vezelay; yet it should be of interest to them if they only knew its history. In the twelfth century this little wind-swept village was almost as important to the Christian world as Rome or Jerusalem, and far better known throughout Europe than London or even Paris. It was the centre of the cult of the Magdalene, which was then at its height. It is a village now of seven or eight hundred inhabitants, lying far away from the high roads and thoroughfares of modern life. It stands on a rounded hill thrown up some five hundred feet above the little river, the Cure. It was here that St. Bernard began to preach the second Crusade. Part of the old infirmary is still standing where the boy king lodged at the time, and over the old twelfth-century door is a time-worn statuette said to represent the militant monk who had made himself the conscience of the Christian world. As St. Francis resembled the Master, so St. Bernard resembled St. Paul—of course with many differences. He tells us himself that he left his castle because he was plagued with all the lusts of the flesh (un homme charnel et vendu au péché), and perhaps for that reason he distinguished himself by attacking all carnal desires and in especially the gluttony of monks and luxury of abbots:—

"How far have we fallen," he cried, "from the brethren of earlier times who went about with empty bellies and souls filled with love divine! These fat fellows have meals of many courses, and tempt appetite with colours and odours till the poor stomach which has no artistic enjoyment, is overwhelmed and not refreshed. They are not ashamed to drink four glasses of wine at one meal, and their fast days are a farce. Their abbots, too, go about with a retinue of servants and silver plate, like princes of provinces, and not like curates of souls. . . . The churches are all gorgeous with gold and mosaics and images, but there is nothing for the poor; the houses of God are clothed like queens, but their jewelled hands are empty and the children go naked, crying with hunger."

The saint practised what he preached. He lived for weeks together on beech-mast and leaves and gutter-water, and with "flaming eyes" called sinners everywhere to repentance. He conquered German Emperor and French King, and flogged them all across the seas to war with the infidel.

On the summit of the hill at Vezelay stands the great Abbey Church of St. Madeleine, which was supposed to hold the bones of the repentant sinner. It has been restored by Viollet-le-Duc himself, and for the first time in my life I took pleasure in a restoration. Not only is the work excellently done, with understanding and sympathy, but the second Crusade is a long way off, and I had need of precise data in order to think myself back into the twelfth century, and conjure up again the strange crowd and recall the Psalms chanted in monkish Latin and the sermons which were all in Latin too.

Here in front of this church St. Louis prayed; here Philip Augustus of France and Richard Cœur de Lion of England took up the cross in the summer of 1189: one can see the very place, stand on the self-same stones, where the kings stood that Sunday morning seven hundred years ago when they pledged themselves to redeem the Holy Sepulchre from the infidels, and their followers took the same vow—"all kneeling in the dust," amid an immense concourse of pilgrims from all parts of Christendom "who had spent the night on straw in the streets and in the open country for miles round, for the town was not large enough to hold the multitude of them."

The Church itself is of Roman architecture, and goes back to the last half of the eleventh century. The façade has three portals and a square tower; over the central portal the Last Judgment, all the figures in half-relief; higher still a great window richly ornamented with sculptured effigies. St. Bernard used to thunder in favour of "plain, bare churches," but popular wishes were stronger than the admonitions of the great Puritan. Even the cornice here is enlivened with grotesque gargoyles, for the Cathedral of the twelfth century was not only a prayer in stone, but also the comic paper of the period. In front of the church is a narthex, or porch, 60ft. or 70ft. long, which was built from 1130 to 1140. The nave, too, has three doors, the centre one surrounded with sacred statues. Under the choir is a crypt, again with three naves, and under the tower a lovely chapel of still earlier time. I don't know why, but in this cloister the words of Henry V. chanted themselves in my ears:—

Five hundred poor I have in yearly pay
Who twice a day their wither'd hands hold up Towards heaven, to pardon blood; and I have built
Two chantries, where the sad and solemn priests
Sing still for Richard's soul. . . ."

Behind the church is an avenue of splendid trees, where one has a superb view over the little town and stream. There is nothing else to see in Vezelay, and yet the mere memory of St. Bernard and the leonine mask of Richard the Crusader are enough for me: the representatives of real life and the life of the soul in visible conflict, and the Saint carries it and makes the King his soldier. . . . That's all; that's the true meaning of the whole twelfth century to me: it is all a great object-lesson in the truth of St. Paul's words—"The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." The great

Richard and the fiery-eyed Bernard, both silent now these hundreds of years; but the same choice presents itself again and again to each of us, and is the crisis of manhood. Do we turn our backs on power and pleasure, and take up the burden; or are we too cunning to be wise? Richard the Lion-hearted made up his mind quickly, and his years of sacrifice and toil and humiliation have given him a place in history which is, perhaps, after all, one of the great objects of life. And St. Bernard?—he is still an inspiration; his speech now familiar, now passionate, “flaming like the pines on a mountain-side;” his name—

An echo and a light Unto Eternity.

When running out of the little village we had some difficulty in finding our way, and stopped at length in despair at cross-roads where there was an ancient sign, which we tried in vain to read. A hundred yards further on we saw a flock of sheep, and went towards them hoping to find a shepherd and guidance. As we came near a girl rose from the side of the walk with a book in her hand. She had been reading, it appeared, and was startled by our coming. We were equally surprised by her appearance; she was, perhaps, fifteen years of age, tall and slight, but scantily dressed in some blue stuff, her bare feet thrust into wooden sabots. She fronted us bravely, though plainly ill at ease. She might have been a painter's model; her face a triangular oval, with very broad forehead, and wide, brown eyes, both round and long, under straight, black brows; her nose small and well cut; her skin tanned dark brown, masses of black hair falling over her shoulders. “What are you reading?” we asked. “A story-book,” she answered, blushing. “Do you know the way to Auxonne?” we went on. “Oh, yes,” she replied; “it is a straight road, but it's a long way—a whole day's drive.” This peasant-girl stands to me as a sort of genius, the genius of this beautiful, fertile Burgundy, for her eyes were deep as with dim memories.

From Vezelay we had some difficulty in getting into the main road again, and it was late when we ran into Sens. Sens was the scene of a famous victory by Cæsar, and is now a town of fifteen thousand inhabitants. It has been the seat of an Archbishopric since the eighth century. It was here that the great Council was held in the twelfth century, in which St. Bernard got Abélard condemned. Little did he dream that the heretic he hated and his mistress would win a higher fame than his own. How he would have thundered had he been told that one of her love-words would become better known than any of his denunciations. “I would rather be your mistress,” Héloïse wrote to Abélard, “than the wife of any Emperor.”

The Church of St. Etienne is the Cathedral of Sens: it was begun in 1124 in the Roman style, and finished about 1168. The Archbishop was that same Guillaume de Sens to whom we owe the choir of Canterbury. There is a wonderful Gothic retable on the left hand side of the church, and the treasury contains a piece of the true Cross carefully preserved in a massive gold reliquary of the twelfth century, all encrusted with jewels. Where did the priests get the fragment of the Cross? How did men come to believe in it? Who was the first to proclaim it? All questions which can never be answered with certainty.

Sure it is, however, that they preserve in this treasury the priestly robes of St. Thomas à Becket, who was murdered at Canterbury Cathedral in 1170, for his vestments brought here from the ancient monastery of St. Colombe, two miles to the north-west of Sens, where Becket lived from 1166 to 1170. All this country is full of English memories, showing the close connection between England and France for several centuries after the Conquest.

TWENTY YEARS IN INDIA

Letters from India. By LADY WILSON. (W. Blackwood and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

Too much must not be expected from this collection of over sixty letters, of an informally personal type, written by the authoress to her family from India, and returned to her by them just before she left the country. They cover a period of twenty years—1889 to 1909—and appear to have been written originally without a view to publication, but they have avowedly been amplified where necessary from recollection, and it would hardly be unkind to presume that their reissue has been supervised by the writer's husband, who was an Indian civilian of some eminence, and has since his retirement taken to enlightening the public with ponderous papers on such attractive subjects as the administration of the Panjab, the Currency Policy, and Indian statistics generally. If the husband took his work in India so seriously as his papers indicate, it is not surprising that the writer of these letters was imbued with the same spirit. But even with the amplification they have received they cannot escape the character of superficiality which inevitably appertains to personal letter-writing; it would be impossible to maintain a correspondence which assumed the form of elaborate essays or aimed at conveying solid information in a condensed shape.

Lady Wilson is a daughter of the late Dr. Norman Macleod (1812-1872), the eminent Scotch divine and eloquent preacher, who was so highly appreciated by the late Queen Victoria. She has inherited a fair share of her father's ability, has travelled and observed, so that with reading and culture and a sense of humour, occasionally exhibited, she has a comprehensive equipment for literary work. Her first publication, fifteen years ago, had its brief day of success; and if she had had a more open field she might on this occasion also have reasonably expected to win similar popularity. But it must be confessed that of late years this field has been fully occupied. In former days, to mention some specimens, there appeared at wide intervals such works as the “Letters of Mrs. Fay,” “Hartley House,” by Sophia Goldborne, “Bishop Heber's Journals,” the Hon. Emily Eden's “Up the Country,” and “Letters from India.” Within living memory we have had the late Mr. Aberigh-Mackay's inimitable “Twenty-one Days in India,” a book by Mrs. Moss King, the works of Mrs. Flora Steel and S. J. Duncan (Mrs. Cotes); more recently we have had the late Lord Lytton's Letters, Lady Dufferin's “Our Viceregal Life in India,” the Private Letters of Lord Dalhousie. There have also issued brochures from the itinerants Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, “Impressions of Indian Travel,” by Mr. Oscar Browning, and last, but not least, Mr. Valentine Chirol's reproduction, in “Indian Unrest,” of his thirty-seven letters to the Times. Lady Wilson is therefore by no means the first lady-writer or the first to collect and reissue letters written in India. It must be remembered, too, that during the last few years India has, under the Morley-Minto régime, been passing through exciting times in politics, when murderous outrages, conspiracies, deeds of violence, State prosecutions, reforms of Councils, Coronation Durbars have filled and fill the public eye on India. It is proverbial that Indian matters must be as highly flavoured as the curries, chutnies, and culinary condiments of that country to appeal to jaded appetites; so that, when Lady Wilson gives us a volume of her personal experiences and reflections, honourably and properly free from any spice of malice or ill-nature, it must fail to compare in public estimation with the older or more richly-seasoned pabulum to which allusion has been made. There is much in her letters which is devoid of novelty; the Indian bungalow, the servants, the housekeeping, the native crowds have often been described; the charms of camp life and hospitality, given or received, are known to all Anglo-Indians and to many others; the brief glimpses of her husband's official work are judiciously abbreviated, so that they do not repel the reader.

But in one important respect Lady Wilson strikes a new note, which shows how fast India is moving, and that the officials are not behindhand in making greater efforts than formerly to hold more frequent and sympathetic intercourse with the natives of India, and not only with the educated natives, but with the country-folk in their villages, in their zenanas, and under the shady trees. This is as it should be: it is a reversion to the older system prevailing before report-writing and statistical returns had been so multiplied as they have been by the concentration of authority in the Government Secretariats. But it is only possible for the district officers and others like Sir James Wilson, while touring through their charges; in the larger towns social intercourse must follow more formal methods. Lady Wilson, writing to her son of eighteen, mentions casually that "Hindu and Mahomedan gentlemen dine with us sometimes and we dine with them." This in few words indicates the development of social intercourse so far achieved, but it will be noticed that it makes no reference to native ladies, few of whom have hitherto emancipated themselves from the system of female seclusion. She was perfectly aware that "some Europeans of the old school would not allow a lady to accept an Indian gentleman's proffered hospitality. They would not permit her to drive through an Indian town, be a spectator of tent-pegging, or receive an Indian as visitor, far less dine with him. They would, in short, prefer her to be as wholly absent from every kind of Indian society as are the inmates of zenanas. Their argument is that until an Indian gentleman will allow them to meet his wife, they will not allow him to meet an English lady."

Sir James and Lady Wilson took the opposite line; she accompanied him wherever they could go together, and visited the homes to which he was not admitted. Though she made these efforts, she could write, "I know it is only at the framework of this life I am looking, and I have a sad feeling that themselves I shall never understand; that as far as the East is from the West, so far are we removed from one another. I realise that I am face to face with a Sphinx who is not dumb, but who remains an eternal enigma. Perhaps it is because, with universally good manners, these people have an inborn reticence which you can never plumb, hardly confiding to a brother, so they say themselves, the cherished wishes or the secrets of their heart." She found an absorbing interest in India, in "the sense of its beauty, its unfathomable mysteries, its gigantic problems and far-off horizons." She read some Hindu literature, and stumbled on the terse conclusion that the Vedas were "the result of a prevailing endeavour to wed Polytheism to Monotheism, with Pantheism holding both in its embrace"! She gives a very abridged résumé of the Vedanta Philosophy, the creed of educated India, but does not know whether she has understood these mystical writings. Nor can she even imagine what any single Hindu feels upon the most indifferent subject, with his mind so curiously elastic that he could give the scientific explanation of an eclipse of the sun, with the gentle addendum "at the same time a demon is eating him up." She is not the first, and will not be the last, to discover that "the veil which falls between them and us is not for a moment lifted." Civilisation can be stimulated, but not forced, by individual efforts.

Lady Wilson spent most of her time in the Panjab, including Simla and some of the larger towns. Her observations on Calcutta and Hyderabad are altogether inadequate and conventional. On Rajputana and Central India, the frontier, and especially the Canal Colonies—which are so creditable to the British administration—she writes with a fervour which her correspondents must have appreciated; her account of Lord Kitchener as a humorist comes as a surprise. After all, the question remains whether it was worth while to collect and reissue this series of private letters. Can it be said that they advance our knowledge of India and its peoples? They deserve, at any rate, to be introduced to the reading public, who will have their opinion on the point.

THE ALIEN IMMIGRANT

The Alien Problem and its Remedy. By M. J. LANDA.
(P. S. King and Son. 5s. net.)

AMONG living political problems that of the alien immigrant has suffered from misunderstanding more than most others. If there be any doubt as to the accuracy of this statement, we need only refer to the Aliens Act at present in force, which, although but a few years old and the child of a Conservative Government, has, as a consequence of the experience gained by its working, but few to defend it and less friends. It is true that some of the advocates of the restriction of alien immigration contend that many of the evils of which they complain could be remedied if the administration of the Act were carried out on different lines. But this is in itself, even if true, a condemnation of the measure from their point of view, for a properly drawn Act would give no opportunities for such unsatisfactory administration. Extreme opponents of alien immigration, such as Mr. Arnold White, Sir William Evans-Gordon, and Mr. E. A. Goulding, would, however, not be satisfied with the Act even if the severest intentions of its framers were carried out. On the other hand, those, apart from the mere politicians, who opposed the legislation most firmly are thoroughly dissatisfied with the frequently harsh manner in which the measure has been administered. As far as the really harmful element among the alien immigrants is concerned, the Act of 1905 appears to have been practically without effect. On the other hand, the harmless element, consisting of those whose principal offence is their friendlessness and their poverty, has in many cases been harassed and worried inordinately. So far as the volume of immigration is concerned, the Act has affected considerable reductions in the number of transmigrants—those who are en route for America and South Africa. Formerly these used to pass via England, to the advantage of the English shipping trade. Now, discouraged by the difficulties put in their way by the officials who administer the Aliens Act, and also by the exaggerated stories which reach them, these transmigrants prefer to go direct to their destinations from Continental ports to the corresponding loss of English trade.

With two Aliens Bills before Parliament, the appearance of Mr. Landa's volume is to an eminent extent timely. The author has for many years had an intimate acquaintance with the alien in this country, and has occasionally visited him abroad. For the last three years he has attended the sittings of the London Immigration Board of Appeal, and he has studied the organisation of the immense immigration traffic at Bremen and Hamburg. Mr. Landa is thus qualified to deal with the subject which he has taken up, and he sets out, as he puts it, "with the object of presenting the problem in proper perspective and proportion." For the most part he puts the political points of view of alien immigration aside and devotes his pen to the social and economic aspects of the question.

Mr. Landa is right in this, for the subject is essentially a social and economic one into which politics ought never to have entered. A first essential for one who wishes to deal with the problem is a thorough knowledge of all the elements that go to make it up. Unfortunately many of the loudest advocates and opponents of restriction were and are obviously quite uneducated in the science on which they were posing as authorities. Otherwise many of the extraordinary statements which we hear would never be made. The result is shown in the ill-considered legislation which found its way on to the statute-book. Never has prejudice been more naked and unashamed than among many of the leaders of the movement which culminated in the Act of 1905. Facts and figures were disdained by these self-styled economists. Statistics were unnecessary to their case. For their statements proof was equally uncalled for. Thus an atmosphere of prejudice and inaccuracy collected round the Aliens question. To dispel this miasma is the purpose of Mr. Landa's book.

We do not propose to follow him in all his arguments. It is the task of his fellow-expert, or would-be expert. The function of the reviewer is to direct the attention of the members of that class to the work, so that they may have less excuse in the future than they have had in the past for some of the curious statements to which they have given currency. We cannot pass, however, without notice some of the most glaring of the inaccuracies to which the author calls attention. There was one supreme one made by no less a personage than Mr. Akers-Douglas, then Home Secretary. By ignoring the number of aliens who left the country annually, he coolly stated that the foreign population of the Kingdom increased every year by 80,000 or 90,000. The figures of the recent census show that the alien population has increased by about only half that figure during the past decade. As Mr. Landa says, "It would be just as logical to compute increase of population from births alone, ignoring deaths." Another exaggeration of the figures has been manipulated by the omission of "stated to be" from the official statement of the number of aliens "not stated to be en route," and although a large proportion of these is or was known to be transmigrants, the whole of this class was repeatedly announced as permanent annual additions to the population. Misstatements of this description cannot have effect for more than ten years. With the census figures comes enlightenment, and the amateur statisticians will have to commence their calculations de novo from this year.

Mr. Landa examines all the available statistics very carefully, and he finds that in 1905, the year of the passage of the Act "to protect the English from an invasion of aliens," instead of an increase in the alien population there was actually a decrease on balance of over 16,500. The same statement, to a less extent, held good for the two following years, while last year the net increase amounted to the insignificant number of 3,637. Surely such figures hardly warranted an Act of Parliament! There is much else of value in Mr. Landa's book, which includes in an appendix the text of the Act of 1905, and the different rules and Orders issued under it by the Home Office.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE NOVEL

Two Centuries of the English Novel. By HAROLD WILLIAMS, M.A. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Too many times, perhaps, has the evolution of the English novel been discussed by critics, scrutineers, and craftsmen in literature, so that unless a writer with the progress of fiction as his province can hold a new glass to our eyes, can set the past in a new focus, or bid us view it from a different position, his efforts at illumination are likely to be neglected in the mingled light of others. The interest of the subject to the literary reader is paramount. He can hardly put down "The Egoist," let us say, or "Tess," or "Clayhanger," without asking how the gap between the solemn moralistic endeavours of Samuel Richardson and these vivid delineations and elaborations of modern life has been bridged. We can appreciate the width of the chasm by imagining Richardson's readers sitting down to one of Hardy's novels, or Fielding's circle wandering and wondering through "The Golden Bowl"—a mental experiment more convincing than the actual one which we can put into practice any day of reading Richardson and Fielding for ourselves. From decade to decade, from mind to mind, the art of telling a more or less probable story has descended, and has gathered to itself at last so many snippets of other arts and sciences that its purity, save in the hands of a master, is in danger of vanishing. We have nowadays plentiful emotional situations, acute analyses of character, clever studies of reactive influences, but not much simple, straightforward story-telling; whereas in the beginning, as the author of this book points out with regard to "Robinson Crusoe," a novel might be read through without the slightest provocation to laughter or tears.

The history of this development is, of course, inseparably the story of human nature, and might lead to interminable ramifications if not severely leashed. Fortunately for the reader, perhaps, steady-going analysis of material rather than brilliant dissection of motives and tendencies is Mr. Williams' strong position. With Defoe he starts his more detailed investigations, and his notes on the author of that joy of boyhood's days, the book to which we have just alluded, are excellent. How is it that a mere narrative of adventure, the sort of thing to which we are to-day almost strangers, can at this distance of years and in these times of cultivated tastes still fascinate nearly all of us? Once satisfactorily answered, this question will illuminate far more than the immediate point; it will indicate the persistent, simple humanity which underlies all ages and survives all changes, the immanent natural beneath the impermanent artificial. In some degree Mr. Williams succeeds, as the following extract will show:—

In Defoe there is something of that inimitable simplicity of manner in telling a story which reminds us of the narratives of the Old Testament. But beyond this, is it possible to name the charm of the book which holds us in boyhood and in age? Like all great things, like all the best things of life, it cannot be completely analysed, explained, or defined. But certainly one great appeal which the book makes is that the hero is a very ordinary person, not a whit cleverer than our poor selves. . . . Anybody could play Crusoe's part without training. He stands for each one of us. The simplicity of the tale carries us over into the pages of the book. To read it is to adopt a special fashion of living for the time being. . . .

Defoe's eye and vision were wholly reserved for movement and action. But his characters live and move; they are not mere puppets. The question whether a novelist is an artist or not turns finally upon the simple question: Do his characters live as men and women, or are they pulled by wires at the author's whim and fancy? A hundred novels, in technique and knowledge far beyond anything Defoe could pretend to, appear every year. We read them, remember the title, the general idea of the book, and forget every character promptly. Taking this as a basis of judgment to the question, Was Defoe more than the mere storyteller? there can be but one answer—Yes.

Richardson, Smollett, Sterne, Goldsmith are treated at some length, and with the intermediate period of Sir Walter Scott we come to more modern names—Dickens, Thackeray, the Brontë sisters, and George Eliot. The latter is the theme of a very acute little study: "She sometimes thinks of a class when she speaks of a person; and she is inclined to see the world in definitely divided segments or strata"—a clever appreciation both of her faults and of the essential strength of her work.

Mr. Williams has nothing particularly illuminative to say about Meredith or Hardy, although he is always "safe" and nearly always interesting. Such watery sentences as the following, however, should not have been allowed to pass:—" 'Sandra Belloni' pulses with the authentic throb of human life, and often rises to passages of intense and thrilling emotion." Better to have said nothing than to touch "Sandra" with journalese. And what shall we say of the author for dismissing Mr. Henry James in five lines, spread over four different portions of the book—the merest casual allusion in each case, with not a single mention of one novel by name? So fine a study of the clash of hereditary influence with modern commerce as "The American" was enough to give Mr. James an honoured place, to say nothing of "The Ambassadors," "The Golden Bowl," "The Reverberator," half a dozen others, and those magical "short stories" which often are almost novels. Again, Mr. Williams devotes a page to Nathaniel Hawthorne, and omits any mention whatever of the author of "The Increasing Purpose," "The Mettle of the Pasture," and "The Choir Invisible." For him Mr. James Lane Allen simply does not exist; and it would hardly be a valid apology—in case Mr. Williams feels apologetic—to say that Mr. Allen is a contemporary writer, for the novels and novelists dealt with approach in many instances very close to our own time. "The Blue Grass Region of Kentucky" was published, we believe, as far back as 1892; "The Choir Invisible" appeared in 1897. Mr. Hardy's "Jude the Obscure" (which is noticed) came out in 1895. Why overlook so great an artist as Mr. Allen?

This, however, is all the serious complaint we find reason to make. The book is a capital summary of the many steps—the many parallel flights, we might almost say—which have led up to the present highly developed art of fiction, and especially excels in its treatment of the earlier English novelists who first felt the impulse to create stories round the men and women of ordinary life.

THE SCIENCE OF EXPRESSION

Significs and Language. By V. WELBY. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.)

"SIGNIFICS may be briefly and provisionally defined as the study of the nature of Significance in all its forms and relations, and thus of its working in every possible sphere of human interest and purpose." So begins a book whose value and suggestiveness it would be difficult to overestimate; a value out of all proportion to its slim size, a suggestiveness rich indeed to many future workers in this science. Its criticisms and proposals, written in a calm and somewhat scientific style, have nevertheless in them the germ of a great advance for humanity, amounting almost to revolution. Lady Welby has gathered these papers together (for the book does not profess to be a complete treatise) for the purpose of showing us how hopelessly inadequate an instrument language is, in spite of its many glories and achievements. We learn that language, which is a comparatively late acquisition, is one of the slowest things to evolve, weighted as it is with so much traditionalism, and confused with much false and misleading significance. Our author pleads for "the development of an expansive and, so to say, organic power as yet only in embryo." "Language," we are told, "is Thought in audible activity;" it is therefore necessary that its activity should be as exact and as little liable to misunderstanding as possible.

To those who think that our present command of language makes it an effective and adequate instrument for the exact expression of thought we would commend the following from Lady Welby's book:—

The dementia of our metaphysics, popular and professional, spreads unchecked. Mind and its presumed "states" are internal—inside some nonentity not specified. Matter is all outside this nonentity.

The fact is that ambiguity spreads like a sea-fog over almost every kind of language except the mathematical. Even science has not co-ordinated its vocabulary to give it an unerring precision of significance. Lady Welby shows how utterly misleading to the popular mind is the common expression "the laws of nature." But if the effects of our looseness of meaning are often disastrous to science, they are equally so to our social relationships. Men constantly and hopelessly misunderstand each other, because each attaches his own private meaning to some vital term. Hence, sooner or later, comes "paralysis of thought" through our misuse of the imagery and symbolism of language.

The conclusions to which we are driven by the foregoing considerations are so far-reaching and potent that it is impossible to state them here. We can only hint at what might be the effects of a more exact and ampler language. Purely literary expression might feel itself fettered in certain directions by the greater exactness of the meaning attached to words, but in other ways it would gain immeasurably in force and beauty. "Our noblest eloquence is confessed by the worker, thinker, poet to fall short of a true mark," says the author. In the social world the effects would be perhaps still more wonderful:—

What a new mental world we should enter if we learned to pause in the act of using imagery. . . . We should select the imagery which is to convey our meaning with the same scrupulous discrimination which the jeweller, the surgeon, the electrician uses in selecting the implements for the finest processes of his work.

If all our social relationships were guaranteed against the fear of misunderstanding we should live in a new world, not only mentally, but actually. The final effects of such a regeneration of language would not be merely social, but racial and world-wide. Perhaps it is too much to expect all this of a mortality so frail and prone to error as ours is; but such an ideal is eminently worth striving after.

There remains, then, a mighty work to be done—how, Lady Welby can only give us hints. The forces of tradition in language are so strong, and the powers of innovation so weak, that the task seems almost an impossibility. It would mean the uprooting of many things we hold sacred, and the complete scattering of many of our most cherished associations. This is a book which no worker in any one of the various fields of knowledge can afford to miss.

THE UNIVERSITIES

The Oxford and Cambridge Review. (Constable and Co. 2s. 6d.)

"THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE REVIEW" has established a reputation for sound and well-thought-out articles. In every one of its issues are to be found contributions by men pre-eminently qualified to discuss, and even to lay down, laws on their own particular subject. The July number maintains the reputation of the periodical, and shows a list of writers whose work may not be lightly dismissed. The Earl of Selborne, K.G., who has given proof that he possesses one of the most able and logical brains of present times in his public speeches on the Veto Bill, heads the list of contents with an admirable paper entitled "The Unionist Party and the Referendum." His article is addressed more particularly to those Unionists to whom the Referendum is anathema, either because they have been rendered timid by Radical or Socialist threats, or because the proposal does not harmonise with their Conservative instincts. Lord Selborne treats this vast subject with the logical and reasoning powers for which he is distinguished. He urges the acceptance of the Referendum upon all his fellow-Unionists, because it is, he says, the only complete and effectual check which can be applied to the present system of log-rolling. The much-discussed question of University Reform, which gives rise invariably to excessive mental irritation and spleen, is again dealt with in this issue of the Review. The writer, behind the ambush of the nom de plume "Magister Regens," adopts very different tactics to the usual excited and blustering methods of the reformer or the anti-reformer. Quite calmly and dispassionately, strong in the belief that the house is really in order, he holds out his arms to welcome a Commission which shall take cognisance of the entire higher education of England. The petty Commission which conceives its sole object to be the condemnation of the College system and the conversion of Oxford (with or without the sister University) into a glorified Board School is not only inadequate, but dangerous. Instead of doing any good they would resemble the "seven other devils" of Scriptural fame, and the last state of the University should be worse than the first. We agree cordially with "Magister Regens," and would like very much to see this difficult question thrashed out by "a great and monumental Commission, composed of our very best educational experts."

The undergraduate Fabian, Shavian or red-tie wearer, forms the subject of an article by the ex-President of the Cambridge Union, Mr. J. H. Allen. He neither attacks nor praises the undergraduate Socialist, but draws a picture of him in his varying phases. As far as it goes the picture is excellent, true and well-observed. From a careful perusal of Mr. Allen's article, the title of which is "Socialism and the Undergraduate," the impression we received was that the writer, if not himself a Socialist, has a sneaking admiration for Socialists which he is careful not to express. To employ a word more colloquial and expressive than literary, he "hedges." His picture, too, does not go far enough. Mr. Allen omits to point out that the generality of undergraduates remain Socialist just so long as they live within the walls of their Alma Mater. However enthusiastic—we had almost written rabid—their Socialistic views, however consuming their energy in attending Fabian meetings during their undergraduate years, yet as soon as they go down and come face to face with reality their views quickly undergo a radical change. In a word, they drop the pose. "Welsh Disestablishment and Disendowment" is the title of a contribution from the pen of the Lord Bishop of St. Asaph, D.D. It is very interesting and illuminative and will provide food for discussion to many readers. Of the other contents of this issue the most interesting are "Mediæval Byways. III.—Coronations," by Mr. L. P. Salzmann, F.S.A.; "Conservatism and the Problem of Government," by the Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P.; "A Fragment of Greek Music," by the Rev. R. J. Walker; and "The Old System of Education," by the Vice-Principal of Brasenose, the Rev. F. W. Bussell, D.D. To examine all these interesting contributions one by one would be out of place. In addition there are many book reviews which are characterised by a fearlessness and justice which are wholly admirable, and we venture to congratulate the editor of the Review, Mr. Richard Johnson Walker, on the excellence of the July issue.

RE-TOLD MASTERPIECES

Dickens and Thackeray Studied in Three Novels. By the HON. A. S. G. CANNING. (Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this book attempts to disarm the critic by two things: first by an introductory note in which he says, "This work is not intended so much for those well acquainted with Dickens and Thackeray as for general readers, to whom I hope it may be useful;" and next by a quotation from "Pope's Essay on Criticism," which ends with the couplet—

And if the means be just, the conduct true,
Applause in spite of trivial faults is due.

If it had not been for these the critic might have said that he did not know why such a book should ever have been written, much less published. It consists largely of a retelling of "Pickwick," "Nicholas Nickleby," and "Vanity Fair," with the assistance of great masses of quotation. The author's style is not distinguished, save by his remarkable use of the split infinitive, and his weakness for that hall-mark of the literary amateur, "and which." We do not question the sincerity of his aim, or of his affection for the masterpieces he recapitulates for us. The question agitating our breast is whether any one wants such a book when he can obtain the glorious originals themselves for a considerably less expenditure. There is nothing so profound or esoteric in these great novels that they should need the guide-book prose of Mr. Canning.

We should not be so ungrateful to the distinguished author if he had given us any real literary criticism, but this he certainly has not done. Beyond the retelling of the famous and already sufficiently well-known stories we have nothing except an introduction and concluding remarks on Dickens, the principal ideas of which are an insistence on the non-revolutionary style of Dickens, his success in drawing attention to great evils, and his attitude towards religion. The first of these approaches nearest to true criticism, but it is marred by so much repetition that we rather weary of it. There is no appeal to literary principles, nor are there any discriminating or penetrating aperçus such as we think we are justified in expecting in a work of this kind. The author's literary experiences apparently do not extend beyond the nineteenth century, for there are no references to twentieth-century authors. Even Mr. G. K. Chesterton never flashes the sword of his paradox. It is precisely some such arresting quality as he would supply that we long for in the perusal of this book. It is all so unprovoking, so eminently respectable.

Evidently much of the book is intended for the very young, for in one place the author gravely adds a footnote explaining the meaning of the word "siren." Yet even the very young might receive a shock as they read on page 161, "At last Mrs. Bute, much the most (sic) intelligent of the two," &c. Perhaps it is a weakness on our part to desire literary style in a work of this kind; but we find it difficult to imagine the state of mind and culture of the person who could read the present work with entire pleasure. Certainly the author is a most industrious person, for, besides this book, he has already six other similar works to his credit, which we confess, without contrition, we have never read.

The Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount. By GERALD FRIEDLANDER. (G. Routledge and Sons. 4s. 6d. net.)

JEWISH Apologetics in England has hitherto been a very empty field, and for this reason, if for no other, Mr. Friedlander's work should be welcome as casting a new light on a subject of perennial interest to every thinking man and woman, whether definitely Christian or not. This, however, is not the only title which Mr. Friedlander's book has to favour, for in addition to the novelty of his subject the value of his work is enhanced by the lucid and well-reasoned manner in which he conducts his argument. His book is worthy of far more than mere passing attention. It deserves very careful consideration by Christian theologians, for his statements in the aggregate, if allowed to pass unrefuted, cannot fail of effect, even if at first unnoticed, on the edifice on which a considerable part of Christian theology has been erected. The principal criticism that can rightly be raised against Mr. Friedlander's work is that, instead of devoting himself wholeheartedly to his subject, he has turned aside too frequently to contest the heterodox statements of another Jewish writer in the same field.

Mr. Friedlander states in his preface his intention to be to set forth the relation of Christianity to Judaism, "not only by way of contrast, but also by way of comparison." He has, however, confined his inquiry to the Sermon on the Mount, and proceeded, in order to estimate its religious value at its true worth, "to compare it with the contemporary religious teaching current among the Jews." In this comparison he deals not only with the Old Testament and its Rabbinic glosses, but also with the Jewish Hellenic literature, including the Septuagint, the Apocrypha, Philo, and the Apocalyptic writings. This will show the wide extent of M. Friedlander's treatment of his subject. Without this latter literature, he says, the New Testament could never have been written. To Philo in particular he considers the New Testament narrative especially indebted. "Where, then, did the Gospels find the story of the mock coronation and crucifixion, and also the name of Barabbas? I venture to think that Philo is the source used by the Evangelists. Philo has been a valuable mine whence the writers of the New Testament have drawn some of their best treasures." Mr. Friedlander does not go as far as some writers and deny the possibility of the existence of Jesus, but he cannot ignore the fact—

That it is impossible to extract from the Gospels sufficient incontestable evidence necessary for a biography of the Gospel Hero. In brief, my view is that, probably 1,900 years ago, a teacher and a claimant to the Messiahship, named Jesus, the son of Joseph and Mary, lived in Galilee. His apocalyptic dreams and his eschatological discourses induced his followers to recognise his Messianic claims, and this led to a conflict with the ruling authorities—i.e., the Roman Procurator. . . . Paul, and not Jesus, was the creator of the New Testament theology. The Gospels were not written by eye-witnesses of the events they narrate. The Evangelists wrote in Greek, which was not the language used by Jesus. The Gospels were not written in the land where the events described occurred. Philo, an earlier contemporary of Jesus, does not mention His name. The famous passage in Josephus . . . is considered by the greatest authorities . . . to be spurious. A contemporary of Josephus, Justus of Tiberias, who wrote at the same period, passes over Jesus in silence. . . .

In this passage is summarised Mr. Friedlander's point of view.

On the East Coast. By PERCY LINDLEY. (G.E.R.)

Tourist Guide to the Continent. Edited by PERCY LINDLEY. (Continental Department, G.E.R. 6d.)

Tours in Norway. (F. Beyer's Tourist Bureau.)

DOUBTLESS urged on by the increasing number of advertisements displayed each year by the authorities of our large northern seaport towns, as well as by those of the Continents, we are glad to find that the eastern and south-eastern parts of the British Isles are now receiving the attention which many of their pleasure resorts well deserve. A very useful guide is issued by the Great Eastern Railway entitled "On the East Coast," in which a considerable amount of handy information is proffered to visitors to that shore. Prominence is given to some less-known districts in East Anglia, and to the country between the Cromer and Hunstanton coast. A reproduction of Mr. John Hassall's now well-known poster "Still Calling to the East Coast" adorns the frontispiece, while throughout the pages are scattered many pretty glimpses of the various districts to which attention is called.

The same company also issues an illustrated "Tourist Guide to the Continent," which provides many valuable and detailed descriptions of Continental places of interest. Among the principal features are particulars of new tours in North Germany, South Germany, and Belgium. There is a large amount of explanatory letterpress and there are many illustrations as well as a chapter on Tourists' Travel-Talk in English, French, and German, which will probably be of great aid to a traveller whose knowledge of foreign languages is somewhat limited.

From Messrs. Beyer's Tourist Bureau of Bergen and other towns of Norway we have received a handbook entitled "Tours in Norway," the object of which is "to supply the visitor with a few useful hints and to give a brief account of some of the finest and most desirable tours." Some 128 different tours are dealt with, details being given with regard to the cost, conveyance, and time taken for the trip. The book is profusely illustrated, and is presented gratis to any one who cares to apply for it.

Blackie's Little French Classics:—Histoire de Mes Bêtes. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Le Foyer Breton. By EMILE SOUVESTRE. (Blackie and Son. 4d. each.)

Blackie's Longer French Texts:—Le Mensonge d'un Ami. By CHARLES DESLYS. Le Scarabée d'Or. By EDGAR ALLAN POE. Translated into French by CHARLES BAUDELAIRE. (Blackie and Son. 8d. each.)

Crispin Rival de Son Maître. By ALAIN-RENÉ LESAGE. (Blackie and Son. 8d.)

French Phrases and Idioms. By W. M. LIGHTBODY, B.A. (Blackie and Son. 6d.)

WITH one or two reservations, we have nothing but praise to bestow on these series of entertaining booklets issued by Messrs. Blackie and Son. With ample explanatory notes, vocabularies, &c., they should prove of great assistance to those desirous of learning the French language. The first volume we take up, however—Dumas' amusing "Histoire de Mes Bêtes"—is disfigured on the first page of the Introduction by such a misprint as "son' Cour." Emile Souvestre was a native of Brittany, who collected the popular traditions and legends of that interesting region, which he published under the general title of "Le Foyer Breton." A couple of typical Breton fairy-tales form the present volume. Deslys was amongst the first to cultivate the short story, and acquired considerable popularity in that line. The amusing "Mensonge d'un Ami" is taken from a work which was crowned by the French Academy. It is sufficient to say of the French version of Poe's famous story "The Gold-Bug," that it contributed in no small degree to Baudelaire's fame as a littérateur. Lesage's diverting little comedy, "Crispin Rival de Son Maître," savours somewhat of Molière. It met with a brilliant reception when first produced. The volume of "French Phrases and Idioms" contains unfortunately a number of misprints—"longeur" for "longueur" (p. 15), for instance. Works of this class are quite useless unless letter perfect.

Dieu Merci! Le Couvert est mis. By LÉON GOZLAN. L'Habit de Mylord. By SAUVAGE and DE LÉRIS. Comme Elles sont Toutes. By CHARLES NARREY. La Somnambule. By SCRIBE and DELAVIGNE. Short French Plays edited by F. W. M. DRAPER, B.A. (Alston Rivers. 6d. net each.)

La Petite Institutrice, and other French Dialogues. By GERTRUDE M. IRONSIDE. (A. and C. Black. 6d.)

THE Short French Plays published by Mr. Alston Rivers have been carefully abridged from the French originals by Mr. F. W. M. Draper. The object of the series, which consists of comedies, dramas, and vaudevilles by the best French writers, is to provide a number of French playlets for reading in class, for recitation, and for use on school speech-days, &c. Those contained in the volumes before us are admirably adapted to this purpose, and are characterised by brightness, brevity, and wit.

Miss Ironside's volume contains several short scenes from French life, introducing games, songs, and recitations suitable for children of twelve years and upwards. Dealing with everyday matters, the dialogues are of practical value, and illustrate in an attractive manner grammatical rules and simple idioms of conversation. But why in "Chez le Médecin" is the doctor's female servant Marie designated throughout "le domestique"? The punctuation and the accents here and there also need seeing to.

FICTION

The Glory of Clementina Wing. By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. (John Lane. 6s.)

It was found necessary when dealing with "Simon the Jester," which was published about a year ago, to bring a charge against Mr. Locke of allowing his brilliance somewhat to overshadow the sympathy that one naturally expects to find extended to the characters created by an author's pen. In the book under review, however, no such accusation can possibly be entertained for a second. Clementina Wing is both an extraordinary and an interesting study. The tragic ending to a love-affair in her early youth left her bitter and cynical to a degree. She neither cared to please, nor was in the least affected by the opinions of, other people, devoting herself with all the great energy of her splendid nature to the pursuance of art. At the age of thirty-five, at which time the story opens—

Her coarse black hair straggled perpetually in uncared-for strands between fortuitous hairpins. Her complexion was dark and oily; her nose had never been powdered since its early infancy, and her face, even when she walked abroad, was often disfigured by a smudge of paint. . . . She dressed habitually in any old blouse, any old skirt, any old hat picked up at random in bedroom or studio. . . . Her figure was hidden by a straight, shapeless, colour-smear painting-smock, and all of Clementina as God made her that was visible, save her capable hands, was the swarthy face, with its harsh contours, its high cheek-bones, its unlovely, premature furrows, surmounted by the bedraggled hair that would have disgraced a wigwam.

Such was the outward appearance of one who spent her life not only in giving great beauty to the world by her marvellous paintings, but who was also a woman to whom no undertaking was too tedious, no inconvenience too great, no sacrifice of her own interests too much in order to alleviate the sufferings and to straighten out the tangled affairs of other people. And it is because of the splendid and high-souled character which is depicted in the book that somehow or other it seems that Mr. Locke has struck a false note when he portrays Clementina as being on the brink of a deep love for Tommy, her artist friend, who is a very young man of twenty-two. Of course we do not mean to suggest that such affairs as this are impossible. Unfortunately similar things have happened and probably will happen many times again. Women of inferior moral natures are at any time apt to turn to illegal or imprudent sources for comfort in trouble or loneliness, but such love as they can give is puny and selfish compared with the deep and tender feeling of a true woman, and quite infinitesimal and insignificant compared with the deep passion which could stir the soul of any one of Clementina's calibre. Our author does not seem clearly to distinguish between the love a woman has for the man to whom she can look up to with respect and almost adoration and the love which comes from the maternal instinct within her, and which is extended to those who need her sympathy and help. The former can only be given to and retained by the man of superior moral and mental qualities; the latter forgives until seventy times seven, and has often inadequately to take the place of and make up for the former, which is frequently starved out of existence.

The other characters of the book include a rather vacillating man named Quixtus, who is compared with Job on account of the very great number of catastrophes which fall upon him one after another, but which he is not able to bear with Job's fortitude; Tommy, a very nice boy, whom we have mentioned above; Etta, his sweetheart; Mrs. Fontaine, a "Society hack;" and three very interesting gentlemen who have seen better days. We must leave Mr. Locke's readers to discover the manner in which they are sorted out, while assuring them that they will not be in the least disappointed in the task they undertake.

Builders of Ships. By MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON. With Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

LOVE and the female form, both divine and very much otherwise, quite overshadow the prosaic building of ships in this thrilling story. Here is a sample of the very-much-otherwise:—

"Neil—Neil! I love you so—I love you!" In an instant she had flung her arms about his neck, and was kissing his cheek wildly and passionately. He flung her from him and went out.

This ardent creature first appears on the scene with red-gold hair, and throughout the story the reader has occasional glimpses of her with the same hirsute adornment. But as a rule

. . . she had masses of rich black hair, in contrast with which her skin was of an almost startling fairness. She was not very young, . . . but had wonderful fascination. Her large eyes were not black, but of a greenish hue, like the colour of the sea. Her features were fine, but the expression of her face was hard and cruel and evil. Her figure was superb in its rounded elegance and serpentine grace.

No wonder Neil ran away from her à la Joseph. We fancy we should have done the same ourselves. But he was no laggard in love whenever he met his affinity—Gwendoline with the female form divine:—

Then Neil Hardy spoke only two more words—those words that are the sweetest that a man can speak in such a moment to the woman who is more to him than any other woman in the world—"My darling!" And in the next moment his arms stole round her, and in her soft, delicate white dress she was crushed to his breast as they stood there together among the roses.

This was in broad daylight; what happened in the gloaming we leave our lady-readers to find out for themselves. Though Miss Leighton may not know much about ship-building, she is most decidedly an adept in describing the tender passion which "rules the court, the camp, the grove."

The Poet's Curse. By M. Y. HALLIDOM. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

THE protagonist of this book is an American millionaire named Vanderdecken, who tunnels under Stratford Church and steals Shakespeare's bones for his museum at San Francisco. He pays dearly for this thoughtless and irreverent action. Two of his workmen die of fright on the spot, his leg is bitten off by a shark, San Francisco is destroyed by an earthquake, his only son is killed, and he himself goes mad before the bones are restored to the Mayor of Stratford by his spiritualistic daughter. This story is told by the author in slovenly English, but with a seriousness that makes "The Poet's Curse" a decidedly comical book. The nature of the author's unconscious humour may best be illustrated by quotation. The daughter suspects her father of wearing an artificial leg, while hiding the secret from his family:—

With true feminine curiosity she made up her mind to discover the truth. In order to do this she dropped her scissors, and while searching for them under the table, she took the opportunity of pinching the calf of her father's leg as strongly as she could, and found it as hard as wood.

"Just as I imagined," she muttered, "but I will make doubly sure." She took a pin from the front of her dress, nearly two inches long, and thrust it into the leg. Vanderdecken continued his game without giving any sign. "That is conclusive," she said to herself, "but I will try once more." She did so, sticking in many pins with the same result. . . . "Oh, you naughty dad, to try and hide the truth from your family!" cried Electra, whose eyes were brimming over with mischief. "Why didn't you tell us you had a cork leg?"

Grown men have laboured to set this stuff in type, grown men have made the paper on which it is printed, and grown men are expected to read the finished book. But it would be a better joke if "The Poet's Curse" only cost sixpence.

The Jew's House. By FERGUS HUME. Coloured Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THE motto of this book appears to be "Lex talionis;" but the Mosaic code of vengeance, an eye for an eye, is only enforced by Ben-Ezra, the Jew, against those who had deeply wronged him. He is a remarkable character, and, unlike the usual Jewish villain who is made to figure in so many second-rate novels, he is more often doing good by stealth than spoiling the Christians. "At one moment the Jew was a saint, more saintly indeed than many a Christian, and at another a cold-blooded demon." He is accused of a murder which he did not commit, and the mystery of the crime is so well wrapped up that it is not divulged until the last chapter but one over two cups of tea poisoned with South American Drops for which there was no antidote.

Mr. Fergus Hume has some curious ideas of English legal procedure. Describing the police-court proceedings with reference to the murder charge, he makes the magistrate adopt the rôle of a prosecuting counsel, cross-examining Ben-Ezra in the same way as a juge d'instruction would do in France. And he winds up with this gem:—"The bench retired, and in ten minutes returned to deliver a verdict of wilful murder against Ben-Ezra (!). The prisoner was then formally committed for trial." On page 20 we learn of a certain Mr. Dove—"Then he became Mayor of some Midland town, and was knighted when the King passed through." While on page 76 we are informed of the same individual—"The King came in person to open a new wing of his orphanage, with the result that he knelt a plebeian and rose up a baronet"—Sir Giles Dove. What class of reader is likely to be impressed by such slipshod nonsense? It spoils an otherwise readable story.

"POMANDER WALK" AT THE PLAYHOUSE

IN a row of quaint, florid, laughable little houses on the banks of the Thames, in the neighbourhood of Chiswick, round about the old robust days of Nelson, there lived a small coterie of creatures every bit as quaint, florid, and laughable. There were an Admiral K.C.B. and his heave-ho-my-hearties man, jolly fellows both; the buxom widow of an alderman, whose roguish black eyes were on the look out for a second man to nag and to fondle; an elderly and simple clergyman of the Established Church, a handy man for an amorous corner; a dear little old lady, with a plump and sentimental "gal," who kept a parrot which had been taught to use an uncommonly fine flow of ripe seawords by her sweetheart, drowned but not forgotten; a fine figure of a man, with a fine double-barrelled name, and an invalid wife who never appeared; a beautiful and charming middle-aged lady with a French name, and a daughter as beautiful and as charming as herself. In addition to these people, all closely related to the unforgettable characters of Dickens, there was an earnest young violinist who has lost his heart to the plump and sentimental "gal."

Here, if you like, was a place for gossip, for scandal-mongering, for spying, for petty jealousy, for surreptitious sweethearting. Here, if you like, was a collection of human varieties, to whom a hundred things might happen as the wheel slowly turned; and what else did happen, if you please, but the old sweet story of love and forgiveness! Whose arm was it that stretched itself into Pomander Walk but the old, useful, and much-scoffed-at arm of coincidence which is so long and always, when it is employed by a kindly and wise man, so pleasant and so refreshing? The daily routine of the work was broken by the sudden advent of a curly-headed young Naval lieutenant appropriately called Sayle, Jack Sayle, the Hon. John Sayle, son of one of the Lords so dear to all hearts, especially that insularly snobbish little heart of Cupid to whom the Veto Bill is anathema. He rowed up one fine day from Chelsea to pay a call upon the Admiral, on whose ship he had served as a middy. He pined for beer and was given wine by the flower-like daughter of Madame, and, as always happens in the best-regulated stories, these two young things fell in love at first sight. How daringly original, how exquisitely refreshing in these days of sordid realism and cheap cynicism, the two ingredients which go to make up the mixture which should be called Shag, but which is known to the elect as Shaw! All could not, of course, go smoothly with the young lovers. That would never have done. Lord Oxford, the lad's father, naturally enough, desired that he should marry a fine lady of an old family and many acres, and when he discovered that his son had left his heart in Pomander Walk he forbade him to return for a week, believing, unimaginative man, that a week was a long enough period for a boy to forget. But once again the right thing happened, the boy returned, more truly in love than ever, and the convenient parson was prevailed upon to procure a special licence.

In the meantime the beautiful middle-aged lady found out not only that her one ewe lamb had lost her heart, but that she had given it to the son of the man whom she herself had loved long years ago, but never forgotten. The Jack Sayle of her own youth had kissed and sailed away; he had married, so had she, and both were alone again. Ah, Cupid, here's another chance for you, you rogue! String another arrow, boy. Wedding-bells grow rusty. But again there must be obstacles to overcome. They are part and parcel of the best of all games. Madame will not have her own sad story acted all over again by her sweet child, who has not yet burst into the full bloom of womanhood, so she urges forgetfulness. No good can come of such a love. But when the boy comes again the girl goes into his arms and is ready to follow him wheresoever he may lead. And then Lord Oxford, who discovers easily enough that his orders have been disobeyed, comes to see the mother of the baggage who has broken all his plans. They meet as the sun is setting, and his lordship is cold until the lady turns, when all the past comes back to him with a look. Hurrah! there are to be two weddings; old sweethearts and young sweethearts are to stand before the altar. Two? No, no. Cupid had been busy in Pomander Walk. The young violinist has found his mate in the plump "gal," and the Admiral has succumbed to the ripe charms of the Alderman's widow; and when a little maid asks from her bedroom window that every one may live happily ever after, we echo her wish with all our heart. We do more than that, for we have been greatly amused, charmed, and entertained by these good people. We hope that Pomander Walk may not fall beneath the pick of the housebreaker for at least a year, because now that we have found our way there we intend to become the most frequent of its visitors.

If we filled this journal in praise of this delightful little play we should fail to do it justice. It is the most delicious thing of its kind that we have seen. It is not a diamond—cold and flashing and brilliant. It is a beautifully set ruby, full of warmth and mellowness and colour. Mr. Louis N' Parker is to be thanked as well as congratulated for his latest effort. No man who is not a villain should miss Pomander Walk. It is good to be able to say, for once, that the acting is perfect. Miss Winifred Emery brings all her art and sweetness to the part of Madame. Mr. Frederick Volpé as the uppish Brook-Hoskyns, who turns out to be an ex-butler and toast-master, steps right out of the drawings of "Phiz." Mr. Rudge Harding is the kind old clergyman to the life. Mr. Norman Forbes has never played so well or so sincerely. Mr. Reginald Owen must surely really be Young Jack Sayle, and Mr. Cyril Maude almost surely the Admiral. There would be no need for "almost" if Mr. Maude were not quite so managerially anxious to make things go. In make-up he suggests rather the barge-captain of Mr. W. W. Jacobs than the Admiral K.C.B., and when he presses less he will give more tone and crust to his part. There remains Miss Maude, who takes her place at the head of all the young actresses on the stage. A more charming and delightful performance it would be impossible to find. Miss Maude has art, restraint, imagination, sincerity, beauty, and grace—all the gifts and much of the experience and training that go to the making of a leading lady. We wish her well.

THE NEW DEPARTURES IN SEA LAW

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

THOSE who have followed the national discussion on the Declaration of London will remember that prior to the debate on the speech in the House of Commons at the commencement of the present month, the Chambers of Commerce and other bodies who persisted in protesting against Sir Edward Grey's policy had been severely snubbed by Sir Edward, and that he had informed correspondents whom his arguments did not convince that it was useless for him to discuss the matter with them further. As Sir Edward, and those who advise him, had certainly not succeeded in demolishing the arguments of their opponents in the course of the correspondence, it was generally supposed that Sir Edward was reserving his most effective material for his speech in Parliament.

As a matter of fact the speech delivered by the Foreign Secretary was by no means so convincing as to silence the objections to the Declaration raised by business men and by a great majority of the experienced sailors who are in a position to discuss the subject. But Sir Edward Grey did much to divert attention from the points which had previously formed the staple of the arguments on both sides to a new issue. Little had been said about the agreement on the Naval Law of blockade which the negotiating Powers had embodied in the Declaration. The Foreign Secretary laid great stress upon the importance of this agreement and gave his hearers the impression that we had, by means of it, gained advantages which should be held to outweigh the disadvantages which had alarmed commercial bodies and naval men. It is worth while to recall Sir Edward's words:—

What is the particular weapon which we wish to retain unimpaired and with which we wish neutrals not to interfere in time of war? It is blockade. I suppose our first object in maritime war is to sink the enemy's fleet. I put that beyond everything else. Supposing the enemy's fleet is in port, and we cannot get at it; next in importance comes the pressure upon the enemy by the right of blockade. As the world's fleets have been growing it has become more and more important to us, if we wish not to be crippled when we are a belligerent, to be sure that neutrals will not interfere with what we may regard as the essential and effective right of blockade. Now perhaps hon. members will begin to realise why our two naval delegates at the Conference of London signed the report.

This phrase certainly seemed designed to convey that the naval delegates might have scrupled to signify their approval of the Declaration unless they had believed that they were gaining in the matter of blockade concessions which more than compensated this country for whatsoever it lost in other directions.

Sir Edward Grey, as his speech proceeded, emphasised the point which he had made. "What we have got under the Declaration is an agreement that the right of blockade shall be an elastic and not a fixed right." Again, "What we have done in this Declaration is to avoid the risk when we are belligerent of having set up against us by one or more neutrals the hitherto maintained doctrine in case of blockade, which would make blockade under modern conditions useless for our purpose." Sir Edward quoted the British Naval Delegates who attended the Conference of London in support of his case. They had reported "It is a matter for congratulation that in respect of the important subject of blockade we have been able to secure the recognition of the principles on which you directed us to lay stress." It should be noted that the delegates do not here refer to principles which on their own initiative they regarded as paramount, but to principles which they had been directed by the Foreign Office to uphold.

It is probable that the diversion thus caused by Sir Edward Grey has led the public to consider the Declaration of London a much more profitable document to this country than it had formerly appeared. It is a matter of urgency that this impression should be corrected, and for the purpose no book could be more opportune than "Britain and Sea Law" (1) written by Dr. T. Baty, and just issued from the Press. Dr. Baty was lately Civil Law Fellow of University College, Oxford. He is Honorary Joint General Secretary of the International Law Association, and one of our leading authorities on the subject with which he has dealt. Dr. Baty opens his discussion of the subject of blockade with the following statement:—"Blockade has played a great part in the past, but it is rapidly becoming obsolete."

Prior to the Conference at which the Declaration of London was drawn up there had been prolonged conflict among maritime Powers as to what one may call the right doctrine of blockade. As Dr. Baty says, "there was absolute disagreement here—disagreement secular, prolonged and evidenced in act. It was well to settle it." And then Dr. Baty discloses the significance of the settlement. The difference of opinion was adjusted because blockade will never in the future be an important operation if the Declaration is adopted. "The belligerent will obtain all the benefits of blockade—except the exclusion of raw materials—by a free use of the novel and exceptional principles of contraband. He will say that goods are intended for his enemy's army or navy or Government departments, or that they are going to commerçants or bases of supply, and if verdicts eventually (years ahead) go against him, he need not mind. The neutral will pay the costs while his menace stops the traffic." And Dr. Baty points out that a belligerent may even stop the traffic in raw materials, "the so-called 'free list,' " if he is prepared to pay for it or make his adversary pay for it.

It may be said that if blockade is thus facilitated by the new regulations as to contraband this country benefits by the facilities; but that is not in fact the case. The arrangement to which the Declaration of London commits its signatories in fact adds nothing to the power which our fleet could exercise apart from the Declaration, while it enables a rival Power at war with this country to establish a more or less operative blockade of every British port without any corresponding display or absorption of naval strength.

Dr. Baty explains this point very clearly and asks—

Why have the Continental Powers, which almost without exception stood out for two centuries against our very limited claim to capture food as contraband, suddenly asserted a far more expansive claim to treat food as contraband upon suspicion? Can it be because these islands were not dependent on overseas supplies for their food in those days and are absolutely dependent on foreign food now?

Dr. Baty proceeds to show that the Continental delegates who engineered the Declaration of London carried out their diplomatic victory in the most thorough manner. He demonstrates in his pages that the penalty hitherto enforced upon capturers of contraband has not been severe. It has been "merely a confiscation of the contraband goods." In order to render more efficacious the "paper blockade" which Continental jurists have forged anew as a weapon against this country, it is important that the penalty imposed upon the carriage of contraband should be equalised with the penalty for breach of blockade:—

The authors of the Declaration proceed to assimilate the penalty of contraband trading to that of breach of blockade. They make the ship confiscable. Certainly they impose a decent limit; the contraband must be more than half the cargo, reckoned by weight or value. But in the great majority of cases this condition will be fulfilled. A collier, for instance, carries nothing but coal. A corn-ship is usually freighted with corn alone.

We see, then, that Sir Edward Grey's jubilant utterance about blockade was ill-grounded. He sought further to reassure the House of Commons with regard to the danger arising from the right claimed by Powers that may be hostile to us to convert merchantmen into ships of war upon the high seas, and he told his hearers that by a Hague Convention already ratified neutrals would be under an obligation to prevent merchantmen destined for this revived form of privateering from fitting out in any neutral port or departing from such a port on a raiding cruise. He declared that "vessels suited for this purpose are all known. They are a very limited number. They are fast merchant vessels prepared so that they can be converted readily. It is because they are all known that this is not so important to belligerents as one might suppose. We shall always know what they are and where they are." This is a point which the naval officers who have protested against the Declaration of London must have borne in mind. They know to what extent our trade routes are protected by British warships, and they are able to judge from a practical standpoint whether the menace which Sir Edward Grey treats lightly is in reality serious or not. It seems to me unwise in the highest degree that this country should commit itself to a position in which it will have to rely upon diplomatic means to safeguard its interests during war, when experienced and patriotic sailors believe that the peril with which it would have to contend must be met otherwise than by manœuvres in diplomacy.

Sir Edward Grey, in his speech, sought to meet one of the principal objections to the Declaration of London by an argument which bears the marks of an exercise in sophistry. He said, "I lay down the broad proposition that if we can keep the sea free for the British flag in time of war, we can keep it free for neutrals in time of war. If the British flag is driven from the sea we cannot save ourselves from starvation by dependence upon neutrals even if the bulk of the food required could be brought under neutral flags. The rise in price of freights would be prohibitive. Therefore, the question of starvation in time of war does not depend primarily on the neutral flag, and it would be most dangerous to suppose that we could depend upon the neutral's flag. The efforts of the enemy will be devoted, in the first place, not to attacking neutral vessels, but British vessels. If we have got command of the sea to that extent that we can deal with British vessels coming to this country, the question of neutrals is comparatively unimportant." One of the main contentions of those who object to the Declaration of London is that we have to contemplate a time of transitory crisis during which the supplies of food to be obtained from neutrals would be of vital importance to this country. There might be a phase in a naval war in which Britain had suffered a temporary reverse in some part of the world, or when one part of the ocean trade routes would be insufficiently protected by British cruisers. If we could weather this time of stress our fortunes might be restored, whereas if after a brief period of starvation we were reduced to making terms we should have been ruined by circumstances that had no element of permanence. It is to guard against such a possibility that opponents of the Declaration of London desire to see the freedom of food transit, which, as Dr. Baty shows, has been hitherto maintained in naval war, preserved on the traditional lines.

The Government has declared that the Declaration of London has been the subject of its anxious thought and searching examination. It is hardly possible to accept this statement. In the English version of the Declaration which was officially submitted to Parliament there was the glaring mistranslation of the simple French word commerçant. During the early phases of the discussion it was evident that the defenders of the Declaration were under a misapprehension as to the meaning of the word ennemi in the French text. The important question whether the Renault commentary was or was not as binding on the signatories of the Declaration as the Declaration itself had been left surrounded by uncertainty. These facts show that the consideration given by the Government to the import and effect of the Declaration was neither penetrating nor sufficient.

It is the more necessary to call attention to this remissness because the Government is bringing forward another measure to give effect to undertakings which it has contracted at The Hague. It has laid before Parliament the Second Peace Conference (Conventions) Bill. At the time when these lines are written this Bill awaits its second reading in the House of Commons, and there is only too much reason to fear that the Government will hurry the measure through its stages in the Lower House while public attention is diverted, and that the Bill will ultimately be passed over the heads of the Peers by an exercise of the autocratic power with which the Cabinet is investing itself by means of the Parliament Bill. The Second Peace Conference Bill not only imposes most onerous conditions upon British subjects in their prospective obedience to the International Tribunal which the Declaration of London establishes, but it also imposes upon British seamen an obligation to surrender foreign sailors whom they may have rescued during or after action to the enemies of these combatants. In fact, it makes British seamen the gaolers of those whom they have saved, and if the provisions of the measure had been in operation at the time of the war between Russia and Japan, Japanese sailors in distress picked up by a British vessel would have been compulsorily handed over to Russian captors by the officers of a ship flying the British flag. But the Bill now under discussion contains a far more humiliating clause than that which affects the delivery of foreign sailors to their enemies. It actually provides that wounded British sailors on a British hospital ship shall be surrendered from that ship to a hostile warship on demand. I am convinced that the country has not yet realised that Parliament is being asked to sanction this monstrous disgrace—an outrage upon our naval traditions and our self-respect which is almost inconceivable. Are we to suppose that the Second Peace Conference (Conventions) Bill is another measure to which the Government has given anxious and thorough consideration?

I think there may be Liberals who have the welfare of their country at heart and who believe that Sir Edward Grey effectively vindicated the Declaration of London in the House of Commons. To such supporters of the Government I earnestly recommend a careful perusal of "Britain and Sea Law," and I implore every patriotic Englishman to satisfy himself as to the truth about the Second Peace Conference Bill and to bring home the facts to every elector whom he can influence. It is only by a great movement of national protest that the danger and shame which now threaten this country from The Hague can be averted in spite of the Government's blind obstinacy and self-satisfaction.

SÉLANIK

THOUGH few will be disposed to waste much sympathy on the Imperial captive of Salonika, one can but find a certain pathetic humour in the appeal made recently by ex-Sultan Hamid that the walls and gardens of his villa prison should be illuminated in honour of his successor's presence, as be seemed so memorable an occasion. Himself, be it said, had never in all his reign seen any city of his country lit up to welcome him, and the memory of those sinister torches fired by his orders from time to time in all parts of his stricken dominions can scarce be of comfort to him in his present extremity. Yet, even so, he knows more of Salonika—the second city of his lost Empire—than of any other of his late possessions. It is true that this knowledge is not extensive; but in the intervals of his labours as an upholsterer Abdul Hamid may gaze at will—if the Allatini roof be not out of bounds—at the stately Genoese tower on the quay, the famous Bâaz Koulé where countless committadjis have been incarcerated; he may feast his eyes on much of his private property, for all the wealthiest quarters of Salonika belong to him, and every Consul-General pays him rent; or he may turn to the radiant bay where lately the Barbarossa and the Erthogruhl rode proudly on the sunlit waters whose many natural beauties have caused Sélanik to be known as the "Jewel of the Ægean."

The Jewel has other claims to distinction—one that it is a city of gardens. Blessed with a climate that is almost ideal, it has a soil that will produce in richest profusion and luxuriance practically every sub-tropical tree and flower and shrub known to the botanist. As a result, the gardens of the city are famous throughout the Middle East, and are the pride and boast of her citizens. Another distinction enjoyed by this favoured town is probably unique. It is perhaps the only city in the universe where, admittedly and without challenge, the dominant section of the community in wealth, in power, and in numbers, are of the Jewish race. It is true that they are not all Jews by religion. A great majority of them, indeed, are Mohamedans, and are known as Deunmeh, or Verts—from the Turkish word deunmék, to turn. But these, although they embraced Islam nigh three hundred years ago, have not lost cohesion with their nationals but have remained, in essentials, Jews in all save creed, worshipping in their own mosques, intermarrying with their own kinsfolk, and still using in speech the mixed Portuguese and Hebrew dialect imported by their forebears.

Numbering as they do some two hundred thousand souls, or nearly two-thirds of the population, the Jews and Deunmehs, as may be supposed, hold all the trumps and most of the court cards in the local game of life. They fill, indeed, every profession, trade, occupation, or calling that makes for the existence of a community. For a long time, to be sure, they held aloof from the fascinations of political conspiracy, and were never prominent as committadjis. Yet in the great revolution that gave them Abdul Hamid as an unobtrusive guest they abandoned their position of reserve, and came forward generously with the needed material assistance.

They are early folk, the people of this handsome seaport on the Ægean. At the first grey glimmer of the dawn the whole town is astir. The doors of the cafés, the iron shutters of the shops and booths, are flung open with a mighty clang and clatter. Sleepy-eyed tousle-headed waiters rush out into the streets dragging forth the little iron or marble-topped tables, which they range in rows on the sidewalk, and dash back for more, flinging chairs about and tearing back again—all with such frenzied haste as might lead one to suppose that their very lives depended on their using the utmost speed and making the utmost noise. And in a moment the streets are filled. There seems to be no dreamy awakening, no extra forty winks—as “Fascination Fledgeby” put it—to turn over the general question in the mind. No, these people do not permit themselves as much as a yawn or a stretch; they seem to leap straight from their beds and into the streets. In a moment you hear the bells of the milkman as he drives his flock of goats down the road, each with its udder tied up in sacking, while the tiny, staggering kids follow, bleating for forbidden breakfast. The boatmen rush to the quay, fall into their boats, hastily unmoor and put out—to go nowhere; but because, I must suppose, it is a habit and they cannot help it. The turbaned fishermen hurry to the port with hanks of lines on their shoulders—fishermen who seemed just to have stepped out of the “Arabian Nights”—while the prawn-catchers take up their nets and make for the shore, to bring their catch to you later squirming on a flat basket—weird creatures in life, well-nigh as big as lobsters, and of a transparency that is almost indelicate.

The lemonade seller has his bottle in hand, stoppered with a rose, and his glasses in a brass-bound waistbelt; the peanut merchant bears his tripod and his tray heaped with pistacio nuts and almonds and melon-seeds and squashed dates. The greengrocer is here, creel on back; the jam-seller, with his glass jars and his spade-spoons (you buy your jam by the spoonful here, and eat it while you wait); the butcher, driving his horse heaped high with joints dangling from a wooden saddle; and the flower-seller and the bootlace man and the photographer, with his pictorial postcards and his stereopticon—aye, and how many more?—for all trades are represented here in the open air, and they are all before you at once, grouped like the “supers” in a set-scene, “discovered,” according to stage directions, as the curtain goes up. Soon the tram, heralded by its squeaking horn, comes whisking round the corner, and lorry-men, standing upright on their long, narrow carts, rattle by at a gallop, balancing themselves in marvellous manner. You look towards the port, and there too, all is animation. From the foreign warships (some are always here) the “cook” boats are coming ashore, and steam-pinnaces skimming between ships, and barges plied by a dozen flashing oars, sweep smoothly across the placid harbour. A vessel is being careened close off the quay—a queer, quaint craft, a sort of cross between a dhow, a dug-out, and a Dutch canal-boat, painted a vivid green with crimson trimmings. The men have not been at her for five minutes, and how they have done it with no appliances other than their hands, who shall say? But they have hauled her over until her gunwale lies in the water, and they are scraping and hammering and tinkering, as busy as gnomes in a fairy-tale.

And then you turn to the street again, and there are the children. They seem to come out at daybreak, as do the birds, and are as easy and unconscious as they. Abroad in bands here all through the hours they run about bare-footed, with snooded heads and long striped cotton gowns. Gangs of them range the roads, twenty abreast maybe, their arms round each other's necks, dirty and happy, loving life, eating always—who knows what? picked up, heaven knows where. A row of them are seated down beneath the quay on a mud-bank, in what the fastidious might deem a place of evil odours—not that they mind that—and are kicking their little heels in the water, throwing seaweed at each other, and chaffing the boatmen rocking on their keels hard by—joyous, careless, and content.

It is not for the humble alone and the toiling poor, this life of the street. Open-air, out-of-windows intercommunication is the keynote even of polite existence in Salonika. There is, I will venture to say, far more business transacted at these little marble tables than in the darkened offices of the Hans. We know also that more conspiracies—including that great plot which brought Hamid to the Villa Allatini—have been blandly agreed on outside these smiling cafés, amid the bustling of the perspiring waiters and under the observing eyes of police officials, than have been breathlessly plotted in secret and suspect lurking-places. It is but natural that it should be so. Where every one is in the habit of foregathering in this public manner the fact that half a dozen persons should lay their heads together across a table littered with beer-glasses or coffee-cups excites assuredly no suspicion. At every one of a couple of hundred tables in the same street the like is being enacted. They may be talking business, or of love, or even only legitimately arranging to swindle their best friend; but, on the other hand, some clue to the secret of Macedonia's unrest, the future of the turbulent warriors of the Drin Cliffs, might not wholly without reason be sought in the dregs of the “Seidl” and the grounds of the Finjans of the “Cafenets” of Sélanik.

FRANK SCUDAMORE.

MUSIC

WHAT a delightful thing is good humour! Yet it is none too common in real life, and it is none too common, either, on the stage. Playwrights and managers, of course, have to study the tastes of their patrons, and it is unfortunately true that for every person who likes to go to a play to be amused and put into a good humour there are two who say, “We like to have our heart-strings torn when we are at the theatre.” So we have an abundance of plays that are passionate and very few that are frankly good humoured. On the operatic stage it is just the same. We know that it is easier, or is supposed to be easier, to write tragedy than good comedy, and it would seem to be much easier to write serious music than that which, while gay, is good. Your prima donna, too, thinks that people will judge her to be a much finer singer if she pours forth her high notes in an agony of terror or despair than if she warbled cheerfully like a lark. Though, as to this, the prima donna may be mistaken. Good-natured little Zerlina is a much more popular character in “Don Giovanni” than the desponding Elvira or the tragic Anna, and we have heard it said that even at the present day there is no surer “draw” at any opera-house than the “Barbiere.” People in operas are apt to be angry, fussy, pompous, injured, even when they are not heartbroken, vengeful, or cynical. Take them as a whole, operatic characters are not people we should much like to live with. Good-humoured folk are certainly the pleasantest, and good-humoured music is exceedingly refreshing when we are lucky enough to come across it.

For this reason we were entirely delighted with the little one-act opera “Il Segreto di Susanna,” by Signor Wolf Ferrari, which has recently been produced at Covent Garden. It is a triumph of innocent good humour, and to see it would be a capital remedy for any one who has had an attack of the spleen. No doubt the hero gets very angry when indulging his absurd suspicion that a lover has been smoking in his bride's boudoir. But we only laugh at him, for we are in Susan's secret, and know that all will come right in the end. Susan and her young Count Gil are such natural, friendly people that we find ourselves in sympathy with them at once, and as for their old butler Sante, we should be willing to pay John Thomas his month's wages at once if we could get rid of him and replace him by Sante. So that here we have a good-humoured story to make us cheerful. It is based upon a French tale, the author of which should be mentioned in the programme, but is not. We are only told that the adaptation for the stage is by a Signor Golisciani. It is all such an innocent "Let's pretend" that the little anachronisms so dear to the hearts of stage-managers do not irritate us in the least. Susan and her Count are apparently a French couple, in the days of Louis Philippe, and Susan smokes cigarettes and lights them with wax matches. She has a very modern lamp-shade, over what looks uncommonly like a standard electric-lamp, and she brings in a bunch of roses, some of which are certainly "Mme. Abel Chatenay." Now no one west of Russia smoked cigarettes when Louis Philippe was King; if you had a lamp at all, it was a "Moderator," and did not need a shade, while "Mme. Chatenay" and wax-matches are both modern luxuries. However, as we have said, these little things do not matter in the very least. Long may pretty Mlle. Lipkovska and manly Signor Sammarco and admirable Signor Ambrosiny continue to amuse us in their old-fashioned costumes! And they may surround themselves with all the modern paraphernalia that they choose; we shall not mind.

Now the music which Signor Ferrari has imagined for this dear little trifle of a piece is as light and airy, and tuneful and good-humoured, as any one could wish. That is to say it is as suitable as possible. And in the genre of light music it is of a very high class. It does not belong to the school in which the elder Strauss and Herr Lehar are conspicuous masters; it has nothing to do with the School of French musical fun which counts Offenbach, Planquette, and Audran among its chief jesters; it has this much in common with the music of Sullivan—it is witty and it is scholarly, but there the resemblance ends. It really belongs to the class of comic opera, which begins—does it not?—with "La Serva Padrona" and continues its career with the "Matrimonio Segreto" and "La Prova d'un Opera Sera;" we do not mention "Le Nozze" and the "Barbiere," for they, in their different ways, stand alone.

Signor Ferrari is certainly a scholar as well as a composer of wit and good humour. He exhibits himself as a serious musician, learned even, yet with how light a touch in the overture (which is a little masterpiece) and on almost every page of his score! We never catch him labouring his effects, or writing a note as if it had bothered him and he had had to think about it. Among musical soufflés it is as light as the best of them, with never a lump in it, or a drop too much of flavouring. He makes allusions to other composers' work in the prettiest manner; he bids his orchestra rage and storm while the Count is knocking the furniture about, and the instruments fret and fume and are indignant with finest mockery. All London should soon be humming the charmingly old-fashioned tune which is utilised as an inter-mezzo with happiest effect while Sante is picking up the scattered teacups and chairs. It is a tune which reminds us at the same time of a nocturne by Field, of a well-known strain by Chopin, and of an aria by Donizetti, so that we hardly know to what source to attribute it. Then there is a delicious song for Susan while she is enjoying the naughty cigarette, and the exit of the pair to the merry ending of the overture puts on the finishing touch in the gayest possible way. Mlle. Lipkovska played her part as Susan in a very natural and taking manner, and Signor Sammarco acted almost as well as he sang, while Signor Ambrosiny did the voiceless old butler's part with a quiet humour that made everybody laugh. So that Signor Ferrari was fortunate in his interpreters on the stage, though the orchestra might have played with greater finesse. We English know only too well what a mistake it is when a composer who was definitely intended by Nature to write cheerful operas takes to the line of high seriousness. We must hope that if Signor Ferrari's muse inclines him to attempt tragic opera, or an oratorio, or a symphonic Threnody on such a subject as Bon Gaultier's "Death of Space," he will succeed therein as well as he has done in "Il Segreto di Susanna." That he is scholar enough for the highest flights we are convinced. But we rather hope he will stick to the line which suits him so perfectly. How well, surely, would he set "The Rose and the Ring"! We wish he would try.

THE BRITAIN OF THE WEST

CANADA—that land of immense distances, of tremendous possibilities, and of great historical associations—has always appealed not only to the imagination, but to the pockets of the people of the Mother Country. Confined in its early days to its eastern limits, notably to the Province of Quebec, capital and population, as in the case of the American States, have rapidly rolled westwards, until, thanks to the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Great Northern, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the most remote portions of the Dominion are now linked up not only with the Eastern Provinces, but by magnificent lines of steamships with the Homeland.

Of all the Provinces of the great Dominion, British Columbia, at the end of the chain, stands out as the most attractive to the inhabitants of these islands, and for several reasons. With a long and varied seaboard, well sheltered from the rollers of the Pacific by Vancouver and Queen Charlotte Islands, as well as by its numerous inlets, the Britisher at once feels at home. In his own country he can never be very far from the sea, in whose traditions he has been bred. The moist and temperate climate of the coast recalls the vagaries of the English summer, and incidentally effectually prevents forest fires. So far as British Columbia is concerned, our Lady of the Snows abdicates except on special occasions. The warm wind of the Pacific soon dissipates the fleecy mantle, and here, unlike in the colder Provinces of the East and North-west, the worker may labour all the year round, which state of things is also quite British. Victoria, the chief city of Vancouver Island, is more English than London. Curiously enough, the staple industries of the Province are those of England. The fisheries are world-famed. The salmon of the Fraser and Skeena Rivers is unrivalled, and gives employment to thousands of men in the canneries. The finest halibut is caught on the coast, where shoals of whales and dogfish are annually converted into oil.

Again, huge tracts of the country, notably on Vancouver Island, are coal-bearing, and the mines of Comox and Nanaimo are yearly increasing their already large output of excellent coal. Many valuable deposits of iron ore abound. Smelting works on an important scale are about to be erected on the Pitt River. In combination with cheap coal, a rapidly increasing market at home, and the Orient within fifteen days' sail, the prospects of the iron industry are particularly bright. In British Columbia full scope may be given to wheat-growing on the plains of the Peace River, while Kentish fruit-orchards are reproduced in the Okanagan district.

England, in the old days, denuded her oak forests to build her wooden walls. Here, in the Britain of the West, Nature has made full amends for mankind's utilisation of the Motherland's resources. Of all the potential wealth of the Province, perhaps none is so great, and certainly none leaps to the eye so impressively, as her vast timber reserves. Leaving aside her underground riches in gold, silver, lead, and other minerals, British Columbia has been recently more in the public eye in regard to timber than to any other asset. On this subject, in view of certain propositions which have been placed before the British public, a few words may not be unwelcome.

There can be no question that it is to this corner of the globe the building and construction world must look for the bulk of its supplies. The forests of the United States, both East and West, and those of the Eastern Provinces of Canada, are rapidly becoming depleted, and the attention of lumbermen is being concentrated on British Columbia, where, up till recently, little impression had been made upon the vast tracts of cedar, spruce, fir, and hemlock bordering the numerous deep-water inlets of the coast. In the early days, in the absence of any inland demand, British Columbian timber was chiefly resorted to for sticks of exceptional length and straightness. Now that the cities are growing daily, and towns springing up all over the prairie, the demand has become such that the existing mills are hard put to it to execute the orders flowing in from all sides. One has to remember that east of the ranges for more than a thousand miles there is no timber grown. So here we have on the one hand, thanks to the stream of immigration and the spread of the railways, a daily increasing demand for all sorts of building and railway timber, and on the other, the markets of the world served by vessels which can load right alongside the source of supply. Under such ideal conditions the value of British Columbian timber-lands must be obvious, but in selecting same for investment care must be taken that the timber is available for one or the other (preferably both) of those markets.

Much excellent timber is so placed as to be inaccessible unless at a prohibitive cost. In looking into the merits of timber limits, therefore, one of the first questions to be asked is—"Can it be cheaply and conveniently logged to the holding ground or saw-mill?" Comparatively few of the rivers, while suitable for driving the logs, afford natural facilities for booming them prior to their being towed to the mill, with the result that, owing to the powerful current, many logs are driven out to sea and lost. An important consideration, therefore, is a good holding ground. Given such, an ideal timber proposition is one where the timber grows sufficiently close to the shore or river bank, on not too precipitous ground, to enable the whole area to be overtaken by the powerful donkey-engine or log-hauler.

Timber any considerable distance from the water involves a forest tram-line or expensive handling. Of course inland propositions adjoining a railway and in proximity to a market are on a different basis, and while on the coast a logging cost of $5\frac{1}{2}$ dollars per 1,000ft. would be deemed fairly high, there are mills now working inland which show an excellent profit on a logging cost of double that amount. It must not be assumed that all British Columbian timber is profitable to work. In some cases it may be too scattered to handle economically; 25,000ft. to the acre is considered ample, and compares favourably with some areas in the United States, where 5,000ft. to 10,000ft. is appreciated. Nor does it follow that even where the growth is thick the quality is good. The desideratum in spruce, cedar, or fir is a high percentage of "clear," that is to say wood free from knots and shakes, only to be obtained when the trees grow to a great height straight and without branches; "clear" spruce is always in demand and will command a high price.

These are some of the considerations to which attention must be directed if a satisfactory result is to be obtained; and to ensure such conditions being obtained the services of an efficient cruiser ought to be enlisted—a cruiser who has proved the correctness of his former estimates by the quantity of lumber put through the mill from the limits he has surveyed. By observing such conditions and by simply "sitting" on their standing timber the Ottawa has produced many multi-millionaires. There is no reason to doubt that similar results will be obtained in British Columbia.

For some time past, and while prices were low, the American lumberman has been quietly buying up large tracts of British Columbian timber-land. Two things are certain to enhance stumpage values—the passage of the reciprocity agreement with the United States, and the recent reservation by the British Columbian Government of all the unappropriated timber-lands. The former will give a great impetus to the lumber trade, the latter for the moment restricts the area which can be taken up by the outsider under the usual timber licence—as beyond existing licences no fresh permits can be granted by the Government. Combined, the effect will be to bring increased prosperity to that portion of the Dominion which we have ventured to term "The Britain of the West," and which, under the brilliant leadership of its Premier, the Hon. Richard McBride, now stands so high among the Provinces of the Dominion.

CATULLUS

FROM the Hawke's Bay Herald (N.Z.) of May 12th, 1911, we quote the following article on Catullus, and a reply which it evoked in the issue dated May 15th. We invite any students of Catullus among our readers to contribute their opinions:—

The following is an attempt to show my younger readers who do not know any Latin why Catullus is so dear to those who love poetry.

His appeal is universal. I am no Latin scholar myself, and shall just take one complete poem of two lines and try to explain how it must have affected a Roman reader. The actual words are so few and simple that you may as well print them:—

Odi et amo, quare id faciam fortasse requiris.
Nescio; sed fieri sentio et excrucior.

Now that is one of the jewels five words long

That on the stretched forefinger of all time
Sparkle for ever.

First I give a literal translation:—"I hate and I love. Perhaps you ask why I do this. I do not know, but I feel it is so and I agonise."

Next I omit the padding and retain the four salient words:—"Hate—Love—Bewilderment—Torture."

Next I expand, giving what I take to be the full meaning of the poet's lyric cry:—"I am drawn to you by a spell I cannot resist, I am repelled because I know it is the lower part of my nature that desires you. I cannot understand why the two courses co-exist and do not neutralise each other. The resultant in consciousness is mental torture as of one torn apart by wild horses."

To help a little we may note that Catullus—young, beautiful, noble, reckless—loved the alluring and unscrupulous wife of the great Consul Metellus. She responded, and a bosom friend of Catullus allowed them to meet in his house. Catullus, whose unlimited powers of self-acquittal remind us of Shelley, seems to have been unable to see anything wrong in this; and as for us, the white heat of his passion imparts a look of purity to a relation which even then must have been regarded as vicious. The poet was also unable to see what any man about town could have told him, that Clodia would inevitably change. Political jealousies obliged her to relinquish Catullus, and Catullus was forced to regard Clodia as a mere light-o'-love. When she deserted him he saw clearly enough that she was neither chaste nor honest.

I now attempt a sort of paraphrase just to show how difficult it is to reproduce even the bare meaning; and novices had better understand that in poetry the bare meaning alone avails little; it is essential, but not sufficient. To make poetry you must have accurate metrical form and also the "glamour," the "light that never was on sea or land:"—

Fatally drawn by your spell,
Struggling in vain to be free,
How can the same soul hate
Just the same girl that it loved?
Torn by divided aims,
Tortured too much to reply!

I think I have set out very fully the claims of these two lines to their position. They have lived down the centuries, always in their own shrine in the hearts of the elect. Who will now succeed in taking up the task which I have advanced one step? Who will reduce my version to coherent form, and make it rhyme and scan? Who will next impart the "glamour," the "inimitable felicity" which true poetry must have? This is possible in a translation. Take Rossetti's lines, "Beauty (a combination from Sappho)."

I.

Like the sweet apple which reddens upon the topmost bough,
A-top of the topmost twig—which the pluckers forgot, somehow.—

Forgot it not, nay, but got it not, for none could get it till now.

II.

Like the wild hyacinth flower which on the hill is found,
Which the passing feet of the shepherds for ever tear and wound
Until the purple blossom is trodden into the ground.

These are almost literally from Sappho. The words are so beautiful that had they been Rossetti's original work they would have been delightful. Some one must do for Catullus what Rossetti did for Sappho. It has never been done; the task is not for me. Is it possible that in the far-off summers some young New Zealander may succeed?

A few more words may be added. Why, you ask, are such exceedingly private matters exposed in print? The answer is simple. All we know of Catullus as a poet is contained in a single manuscript found at Verona in the fourteenth century. It may be guessed to be a collection of his lyrics made by a Roman gentleman for his private solace, and in no way authorised by Catullus. There is no doubt that it contains the best things Catullus wrote; we may conjecture that some of its contents were privately circulated, and only among men who could be trusted not to make them common property. Modern parallels could easily be found. What became of the manuscript at the death of its compiler; how it was lost for four centuries, during which no scholar knew that any work of Catullus existed; how it got to Verona—I suppose nobody will ever know.

W. F. H.

Str—In Friday's issue of your paper "W. F. H." contributed some remarks on Catullus, in which he was principally concerned in endeavouring to overtake the meaning of this epigram:—

Odi et amo, quare id faciam fortasse requiris,
Nescio; sed fieri sentio et excrucior.

He did it literally and then diffusely into English, driving the poet rather further than he will go. But "W. F. H." said of doing Catullus into English: "It has never been done; the task is not for me. Is it possible that in the far-off summers some young New Zealander may succeed?"

Here in this immediate autumn, being a New Zealander and young, I submit this very free rendering of the amorous Roman, and ask "W. F. H." to hand me the parsley crown:—

Strong hate, strong love; these twain have hold of me.

Hate speeds desire, and love is long distress,

And all my thought is keen, sweet bitterness,

Hither and thither blown bewilderingly.

Strong love, strong hate; how should these foes agree?

Nay, ask me not . . . I know not. . . . But I know

Desire is great for that I hate her so

For all the evil love has wrought in me.

Of love and hate a cross is built for me,

Self-sacrificed—and captive doubly tied;

Loving and loathing, I, the crucified,

Strive to escape . . . and wish not to be free.

That, as I said, is a very free version—there is no translation; what seems so is transition. This is a more literal rendering:—

I love her and I hate her.

If you ask me why I do it, how I do it, if I rue it,

Well, I simply have to state a Fact that feeling power is greater Than the power to analyse, synthesise, or moralise.

But I feel it and reveal it

In my dour and dismal guise,

And I tell you plain and straight a Man is subject to surprise

Should he love a girl and hate her.

It's a mix, and I'm refraining

From the trouble of explaining

As I sit and agonise.

The reader can take his choice of versions.—Yours &c.,

TOUGH RAG.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By LANCELOT LAWTON

ANGLO-JAPANESE RELATIONS.—I.

IN THE ACADEMY last week I foreshadowed the early revision and extension of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. Since then the negotiations that were in progress with the Tokyo Government have been concluded, and the Treaty of Alliance in its new form has been signed and made public. In regard to this amended instrument, if perhaps we exclude expressions of disappointment somewhat natural in Japan, there is only one verdict throughout the world—that it constitutes a diplomatic triumph of first magnitude for Great Britain. It has been generally assumed that the revision of the contract became necessary in consequence of the fact that its original terms conflicted with the letter, no less than with the spirit, of the comprehensive Treaty of Arbitration which has just been concluded between Great Britain and the United States. To a large extent this assumption is correct; but in the case of international agreements more than in any other kind of document it is necessary to read attentively between the lines in order to detect their true significance.

A careful study of the new Treaty makes it at once evident that an instrument has been created of supreme importance from the Imperial as well as from the purely international point of view. Expressions of opinion received by telegraph from Canada, Australia, and New Zealand afford welcome indication that it has tended in an appreciable measure to bring our foreign policy into line with Colonial sentiment. Thus the greatest service that the mind of statesman could possibly conceive has been rendered to the cause of Imperial unity—a cause which until now had been perceptibly on the wane. It is pleasing to reflect that all peoples and all parties within the Empire have joined ungrudgingly in offering their congratulations to Sir Edward Grey and the Government whom he represents in that they were not slow to recognize the remarkable series of changes which have come over the world since the Russo-Japanese war, and did not flinch at the unpleasant task of persuading our ally to consent to a moderation of the terms of the Alliance so as to meet the new conditions which, strangely enough, its original provisions were mainly responsible for creating.

A comparison of the Treaty in its present form with the covenant it has superseded, together with a brief history of events during the last few years, will serve to show that the relations between East and West have entered upon an entirely new phase. Reduced to its proper proportions, the Alliance as it stands to-day is nothing more or less than a mere record of a platonic friendship between two nations. No longer are the contracting parties compelled without reservation to combine in war for the defence of their mutual interests. This obligation is removed from application to Powers with whom general arbitration treaties have been concluded. The United States therefore is entirely outside the operation of the agreement. Before very long other Powers will also have the advantage of what might be termed the "saving clause" in the Alliance. Both Russia and France have already intimated that at as early a date as possible they wish to arrange general arbitration treaties with Great Britain and the United States; and Japan, by reason of the irresistible force of circumstance, has initiated preliminary negotiations at Washington with the object of taking advantage of the international movement in favour of arbitration.

Not many months have elapsed since Sir Edward Grey made his memorable announcement in the House of Commons that, in principle, Great Britain and the United States had arrived at a decision to submit to arbitration all issues that might arise between them affecting not only disputes relating to territory, but also questions of honour. That this principle should already have been translated into the rigid text of a Treaty; that, in turn, the satisfactory conclusion of this Treaty should have led to a revision of the terms of an Alliance which, in its original form, threatened Anglo-Saxon unity, inasmuch as it was regarded with disfavour by the United States no less than by our Colonies; and that the splendid example set by the Anglo-Saxon peoples in the direction of finding a sane alternative to the mad resort of war should have been followed by not one but at least three of the greatest nations of the earth, marks the beginning of a new era in the world's history—an era when it may with truth be said that civilisation has so far progressed as to have recognised that common sense is mightier than slaughter, and when many statesmen are agreed that peace is no longer a vision of the angels, but an aim inseparable from practical politics.

If four great Powers of the earth—Great Britain, the United States, France, and Russia—are determined that among themselves they will never go to war, but in all cases of disagreement will submit to the arbitrament of a Supreme Court of International Justice, then it cannot be denied that the tranquillity of the world is to a large extent assured; for, having accepted so high a principle as applied to each other, it is not likely that any one of these Powers will lightly enter upon a war with a nation that has chosen to remain outside the ring of international arbitration. But even if we suppose an occasion when, after all the resources of patient diplomacy had been exhausted, hostilities became inevitable, it may safely be assumed that any Power involved would have the moral, if not the material, support of those Powers with whom it had concluded arbitration treaties.

We cannot forget, however, that under ordinary circumstances the Alliance would not have terminated until four years hence, and consequently before the two great nations of Anglo-Saxon origin could pursue in common a policy of peace, it became necessary to reshape our relations with Japan. I have already pointed out that in attaining this end we have at the same time strengthened the foundations of Empire. But even more than this, much as it implies, has been accomplished. By the omission of Article IV., which appeared in the former Treaty, our friendship with Russia has been placed upon a firm and lasting basis, and the sentiment of Anglo-Indians once more brought into accord with the diplomacy of Downing Street. This article, it will be recalled, stipulated that "Great Britain having a special interest in all that concerns the security of the Indian frontier, Japan recognises her right to take such measures in the proximity of that frontier as she may find necessary for safeguarding her Indian possessions." Whatever may have been in the minds of statesmen who were responsible for the insertion of this unhappy provision, there could not be the slightest doubt that its appearance in a Treaty with an Oriental race had a disastrous effect upon British rule in India. It looked as though Great Britain had been forced to realise that in the event of a war with Russia she could not single-handed defend her Indian Empire, and malcontents among the natives were not slow to conjure up, for the education of the untutored masses, visions of battalion after battalion of Japanese troops being transported to the north-west frontier for the purpose of assisting the English to hold their own against the invaders.

As a matter of fact, in justice to British statesmanship, it must be said that at no time was it ever contemplated, even as a remote possibility, that the Japanese should be called upon to take the field in India. Had war broken out with Russia, they would have been expected to help Great Britain by making a counter-move against the Russian forces in the Far East. Apart, however, from the consideration that at first glance Article IV. was open to misinterpretation on this score, its inclusion at all was sufficient to create an uneasy feeling throughout India, and to keep alive an unfriendly sentiment towards Russia. It is little wonder, therefore, that the old treaty met with the marked disapproval of Anglo-Indians, more especially when we bear in mind that the Russo-Japanese campaign had resulted, for the first time in modern history, in the triumph of an Oriental race over a white one, and that it was followed by the widespread dissemination of seditious literature from Japan throughout the length and breadth of India.

The omission of the objectionable clause in the revised version recalls the whole circumstance that led to the alliance with Japan. Until recently British diplomacy has been obsessed with the fear that Russia contemplated a swift and sudden descent upon India. In Russia this idea was looked upon as nothing more or less than an absurd hallucination, but nevertheless there were not wanting sinister evidence of Russian activity in the neighbourhood of Afghanistan and Thibet. Nor did Russia stop at coveting India. She sought to found for herself at the expense of China and, what was of still greater importance, at the expense of Powers having serious interests in China, a vast Far Eastern Empire. Thirteen years ago, after she had actually entered upon military occupation of Manchuria, Great Britain endeavoured to induce her to define clearly her position. An exchange of Notes, known as the "Yangtze Agreement," was the result. Great Britain on her side promised that as far as railway concessions north of the Great Wall were concerned she would give Russia a free hand; while in return Russia recognised the Yangtze Valley as Great Britain's sphere of influence.

The measures taken to suppress the Boxer rising, which followed two years later, only intensified the jealousy existing among the Powers. From that time all the international covenants relating to the integrity of China were torn to shreds and scattered to the four winds. While Russia herself abstained from open interference, she exerted in the Yangtze region an underhand influence through the medium of Belgian capitalists. Moreover she pressed the Chinese for a concession for a railway from the north to the capital itself. These activities, coupled with Russian intrigues in Korea, gave rise to alarm in Japan.

The Tokyo Government, however, wisely realised that unaided Japan could accomplish nothing. Their natural inclinations led them to turn to England. They did not forget that after the Sino-Japanese War we had refused to join the three Powers—Russia, France, and Germany—in robbing their country of the legitimate spoils of victory. What finally decided Japanese statesmen in favour of the Alliance, however, was the knowledge that Great Britain possessed superfluous wealth, some of which might be spared to finance a campaign against Russia. On our part we were inclined towards an Alliance, because we feared that if we failed, then Russia would step into the breach. As a matter of fact, Prince Ito did actually visit St. Petersburg at the time in order to sound the Russian Government on the subject. In the meantime the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was signed. Russians declare to this day that they had no intention of entering into a binding engagement with Japan, and they contend, quite seriously, that we were the victims of a diplomatic ruse.

Succeeding events will be described in a future article. It is sufficient to say here that Great Britain's support of Japan has entailed great sacrifices in the Far East. For our reward we must look elsewhere—in the direction of the Indian Frontier, where the tension has been relieved, and in Europe, where Russia has declared herself to be on the side of England and France, as against the Triple Alliance.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

THE one engrossing topic of general interest at the moment is undoubtedly the great air race round Great Britain for the second £10,000 prize offered to aviators by the Daily Mail, and it is safe to prophesy that the crowd which will assemble at Brooklands by three o'clock this afternoon to witness the start of the race will be a record one so far as aviation meetings in this country are concerned. During the last week or two the daily papers have favoured us, in exhaustive detail and with somewhat painful reiteration, with the personal history and records of the competing aviators, so that it is not necessary to repeat them here. But it may be said that the contest is unique in several important respects, and its results should prove of greater value than those of any previous flying competition in the annals of aviation. For the first time it will be possible for the outside public to form an opinion as to the relative reliability of the various types and makes of machines, as no aviator will be allowed to use more than one during the whole of the contest. And it is reliability, rather than speed, that the aeroplane of the future will have to show if it is ever to become the popular sport some enthusiasts anticipate. Whether it ever can, by any possibility, become a popular sport, or commend itself to the man in the street as a safe mode of locomotion, is a very debateable question. Whatever advances in construction may eventually be made there seems no possibility of eliminating the one serious drawback of the heavier-than-air machine—namely, the certainty that it will fall when the engine stops; and it will take a lot to convince the ordinary individual that the absolutely perfect engine has been, or ever will be, made.

However, whatever opinion one may hold as to the likelihood of universal flying in the future, there is no gainsaying the fact that the art or science of aviation has made phenomenally rapid advances. It is only five years since Santos Dumont flew 235 yards—the first officially recorded flight in the history of the world. Last year, Tabuteau, one of the competitors in the race which starts to-day, flew 365 miles without an intermediate stop. Only four years ago the highest recorded flight was one of 8ft. from the ground by Farman. Last year a French aviator attained an altitude of 10,746ft., and even this is reported to have been recently beaten. In the matter of speed also similar remarkable advances have been made, the record of twenty-five miles an hour made by Santos Dumont having been replaced by one of seventy-eight miles an hour accomplished by the American aviator Weymann only a week or two ago. It must be admitted, therefore, in view of this astonishing progress, that the future of aviation is an unsafe thing to prophesy about.

There are no indications at present of any disposition on the part of the standard tyre manufacturers to respond to the suggestion, made recently by the introducers of a new tyre—the "Victor"—that a general long-distance reliability and durability tyre test should be carried out under the auspices of the Royal Automobile Club. This is a pity, for, after all, such a trial would furnish an invaluable means of enabling the motorist to secure data, from an absolutely reliable source, for his guidance in tyre selection. It is not disputed that, as things are at present, he has no such data. He must either rely upon reputation, or commence a series of experiments. The former process is not satisfactory, for reputation may be, and often is, the result of lavish advertising rather than of intrinsic merit. Another point to be borne in mind is that lavish advertising adds materially to the cost of production, and this additional cost has to be borne, either in the form of increased price or decreased quality, by the buyer. Other things being equal, the logical presumption is that the manufacturer who spends least upon sources of expense other than those of actual production is in a position to give the best value for money. There are still two other considerations worthy of attention in this connection. One is, that once a reputation is definitely acquired, whether by superlative merit or otherwise, there is sometimes a tendency to trade upon it by offering an inferior article for the sake of a bigger profit. The other is, that a tyre which may be indisputably the best in one year may be quite inferior in the next. The best motor tyre in existence is far removed from perfection, and the efforts of inventors and experimenters in tyre-construction are unceasing. There is no reason whatever for assuming that finality has been reached. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that a new tyre, the "Victor" or any other, has solid grounds for claiming superiority to those already on the market, how is it to demonstrate the validity of its claims? Obviously, by being pitted in fair competition against its competitors. And this is also the only way by which the motorist, who is the one primarily concerned, can satisfy himself as to which tyre is the best without embarking upon a course of troublesome and costly experiments. It would be well, therefore, if the premier club would organise such a general tyre-trial as is suggested. It would then be for motorists to place what construction they chose upon the motives of those makers who declined to participate.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Cophall Avenue, E.C.

WITHOUT doubt business is gradually improving, not perhaps amongst those members of the Stock Exchange who rely upon the gamblers in Mines, but amongst those who do a steady, all-round trade. Everybody is becoming more optimistic. This may be accounted for by the fact that trade throughout the country is good, that the weather is bright and cheerful, and disposes people to think cheerfully and act boldly. The savings of the country have to be reinvested in something, and the savings of Great Britain are enormous. Trade demands a large proportion of these savings. But the Stock Exchange must benefit. It is curious to note the great disinclination the public has to invest in new issues. If we take a list of the latest promotions, we find the San Antonio Lands quoted at 6 discount, the Greek Loan at $1\frac{1}{2}$; the Persian Loan has been about $1\frac{1}{2}$ discount, but is a shade better now. The Norwegian Loan is $1\frac{1}{2}$ discount, whilst nearly all the Canadian issues have been failures. Underwriters have been left in almost every instance. The Mond Nickel debentures are 4 premium, and the Cordoba second debentures are $2\frac{1}{2}$ premium, whilst the Chilean 5 per cent. Loan is no less than 3 premium and the Central London $4\frac{1}{2}$ prefs 14 premium. The Lampard Rubber Trust report was not at all liked, and it does not look as though Mr. Lampard would have much success with the five companies he has prepared for the public. This Rubber Trust has made money, which is more than can be said of most of the others. But I should advise shareholders to get out, which they now can at a profit. At last the Woldsea Land Company has had the pluck to go to the public. This concern, in which I understand Messrs. Curtis, Gardner and Company are interested, has made many attempts to get its shares underwritten. The prospectus is a curious document, and is not taken seriously by anybody in the City. Therefore I could not under any circumstances recommend any one to apply. Woldsea may be the most healthy place on earth, and the most picturesque; but it is quite clear that those behind the land scheme are not strong enough to carry it through, and unless a land company has unlimited capital it cannot hope to make a success. A Water Softener Company has been asking for subscriptions, but such speculations should be left severely alone. The Bajoe Kidoel appears to me very much over-capitalised, and I am beginning to grow afraid of Java. The rubber does not grow as quickly as it does in either Sumatra or the Malay. The native rubber-tree of the island is the Rambong; but the tree covers such a large amount of ground, and is so difficult to tap, that it is apparently not suitable for an over-capitalised limited company. Nevertheless, the quality of the rubber from old Rambong latex is extremely good.

MONEY.—The Money Market is very easy, and we shall certainly have a plentiful supply throughout the whole of the summer. The cotton crop does not require to be financed before November, and the big banking houses will have plenty of opportunity before then for making their usual arrangements. A 14-million bale crop will call for a very large amount of money. The other crops in the United States will be about the average and will not disturb our markets. India may require more gold, but unless we have some important political crisis cheap money will remain with us right through to the end of the autumn.

FOREIGNERS.—Foreigners have been steady all through the week, but with very little business, and the movements in the market are hardly worth noticing. Occasionally a slight spurt occurs in the preference stock of the Peruvian Corporation, but every rise is seized upon by the bears as an opportunity to unload. There is now a stale bull account here.

HOME RAILS.—The Stock Exchange is always so impatient. It cannot wait for the dividend declarations, but it makes the excuse of labour troubles to sell everything. The Metropolitan dividend was as much as anybody could possibly hope for and better by $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. than some of us expected. Yet Metropolitans dropped a point. North Easterns have also been sold, but here it is quite possible that the speculator is right, for it is not certain that the North Eastern will increase its dividend, although its traffic returns are good. All the heavy lines have been firmer than more speculative issues, and I again point out to the serious investor what a splendid opportunity he has during the present recession of prices. He may not get such a chance again for some years. Indeed the man who buys London and North-Western ordinary stock to-day and holds it for only eight months will obtain a return of 5 per cent. on his money, and a possible chance of a five or ten point rise in his capital expenditure, and he will all the time have the satisfaction of feeling that he has invested his money in a gilt-edged security. Very much the same may be said of the Great Westerns or Lancashire and Yorkshire. It should never be forgotten that a purchase to-day carries with it an almost immediate dividend, and there is then only six months to wait for another dividend. Great Central are still written up in all the newspapers, but as the junior stocks are speculative, and cannot hope for a dividend for two or three years, there may be a chance of buying in lower down later on. The senior preference stocks are, however, very much undervalued in the market, and form an admirable lock-up.

YANKEES.—The United States is full of optimism. Nothing can stop the progress of this great country, and, in view of the fact that the harvest will be as good as last year, whilst the cotton crop may beat the record, I cannot see that people can go wrong in buying Little Southernns. There is no railway in the United States that will benefit so much by a large cotton crop, and there is no railway that has a better chance of improving its position. The line is in the hands of Morgan, and is much better managed than it used to be. I hesitate to advise Missouri Pacifics, for since Gould made his arrangements with Speyer I am doubtful whether the line is being run in economical fashion. Speyers are good people, but Gould is very shifty, and Bush is a Gould man and not a Speyer man. Union Pacifics are cheap. Indeed, if the preference stockholders could be settled with and that stock withdrawn, there is no reason why Union Pacifics should not distribute their huge savings. How far the line will be affected by the opening of the Panama Canal is, perhaps, doubtful. The Hill stocks are not over-valued, for the Canadian Reciprocity Treaty is certain to go through, and all the little branch-lines that Hill built years ago and now runs at a loss will immediately become profit-earning extensions.

CANADIAN PACIFICS.—Canadian Pacifics are now at a record price, and look like going higher. Nevertheless, I cannot help thinking that stockholders should take their huge profit. I know that the directors still continue to buy stock, but the manipulation comes from New York and from Berlin. The big houses in the United States have very little to do with Canadian Pacifics, and the Levy group are the only manipulators in Wall Street. There is some talk of Canadian Pacifics issuing fresh shares at 175. It is possible that this may be done, for the line is so prosperous that this is the only way to disguise its prosperity. Were it to pay more than 10 per cent. dividend the Canadians would at once complain that they were being robbed.

RUBBER.—The newly-made rubber boom never attracted the public at all, and was a purely manipulated Mincing-lane production. Raw rubber can hardly rise, for the Para stocks must be liquidated; therefore, were I a holder of rubber shares I should sell out with the certain chance of being able to buy in at lower levels later on. It is impossible that any of the companies can make more than half the profits they made during the past year. The Straits Bertam report was an astounding document, especially after all the boom talk we have heard about this company's contracts. Sir West Ridgway should explain what has become of the two ton a month contract at 11s. a pound. This share is very much over-valued.

OIL.—There is nothing new to report of the Oil Market. It remains completely dead. The story that the Gates crowd intend to purchase Mexican Eagles, paying the preference shareholders debentures, appears to be true, and the shares are not dear to-day. It also seems probable that an end will be made of the war in the East, in which case Shells are worth buying. Spies should have a good year, for the price of oil in Russia has risen. But no other oil shares are worth touching at the moment.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir Market see-saws backwards and forwards a sixteenth and an eighth at a time. Neither in Paris nor in London does the speculator gamble in mines. The General Mining and Finance Report was satisfactory, and Messrs. Albus may be congratulated, for they have not the richest mines on the Rand, and they have made the most of what they have. It is difficult to advise any one to go into Kaffirs to-day, for although the shares are not too high, they are certainly not low enough to tempt the average speculator. There is nothing to go for.

RHODESIANS.—Everybody feels that the Rhodesian Market ought to move. But it does not. If an arrangement could be come to between the big houses, and a holding syndicate established, this would be the best solution to the difficulty. All the finance houses have great blocks of shares which they are anxious to market, but each one is afraid of the other, and as a result nothing is done. Rhodesia is moving very fast, and perhaps one day the public will realise this and come in and buy, regardless of the fact that they are buying from the shop. But at the present moment they decline to do it.

EGYPT.—Lord Kitchener has now been officially appointed our Consul-General, and undoubtedly there is a good time coming in the Egyptian market. A new Governor will be appointed to the National Bank, and both this share and the Agricultural Bank shares will be worth buying, but probably the cheapest share in the whole Egyptian Market is the preference share of the Khedivial Mail. The ordinary shares in this company are also a good speculation. United Lands is the best of the cheap land companies, and Aboukir and Behera are the best of the good ones. Bank of Athens shares are an excellent investment, for this Bank is gradually building up a very large business in Egypt, and is doing it upon strong lines. It should pay 10 per cent. dividend, and the £4 shares are quoted about 5½.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Marconis are the only share dealt in in this market with any freedom, for the market in 'bus stock, Cements, Hudson Bays is very limited, and a very small transaction has a very great effect. We await the speech of the Marconi Chairman, and until the meeting is over it is useless to do anything.

THE "ENGLISH REVIEW" AND THE "SPECTATOR"

* * We have received the following letter, with a request that it should appear in our columns, and we accede with pleasure :—

WE, the undersigned, have read the article in the Spectator of June 10th attacking the English Review. We can see nothing in the article but a simple act of persecution. A well-known writer in the English Review has expressed, not editorially, but over his own signature and on his own responsibility, an opinion which is beyond all question a very widespread opinion, not only among so-called men of the world, but among medical men and serious moralists. It is an opinion which shocked some of us precisely as some of the Spectator's opinions shock others of us and shock the editor of the English Review. But its suppression can be justified only by arguments which would equally justify the suppression of every organ of advanced or reactionary thought in Europe, and could easily be pushed for party or sectarian purposes to the destruction of the liberty of the Press. Under these circumstances, without in any way committing themselves as to the merits of the two journals, or the validity of the views with which they are identified, we feel bound to protest against the attempt of the Spectator to annul the compact of tolerance upon which the maintenance of the highest literature and the best journalism depends for its very existence.

* Mr. Maurice Hewlett signs the Protest with the following reserving clause :—I agree with and join in the protest against the Spectator's article with this modification of its terms, that I do not suppose it to have been an act of persecution. I regard it as having been inspired by that smug confidence in one's own opinion and conviction of its importance to the world at large, which are still, as they have always been, common to all vulgar natures. The Spectator is not malevolent ; it is a prig.

THE "SPECTATOR" AND THE "ENGLISH REVIEW"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The many persons of rank and nobility who wait upon my slightest nod for the shaping of their opinions and the manufacture of their morals have become importunate in their desire to know my attitude in regard to the controversy between the Spectator and the English Review.

Now that the correspondence is closed to lesser persons I am pleased to allow it to become known that I consider the woman Godiva (about whom report, as ever, undoubtedly speaks with truth) a lamentable example of modern effrontery.

Assuming that his eyesight was perfect, the courageous attitude assumed by my friend Peeping Tom over this reprehensible performance is worthy of my commendation, and I congratulate my colleague upon his good fortune in being the only Spectator.—I am, Sir, yours portentously,

GEORGE E. W. MUZZLE.

Lochinyar, Bycullah Park, Enfield, July 13th, 1911.

[We print this effusion, but we are inclined to think that the Editor of the Spectator and Mr. Russell will not be "much impressed" by Mr. Muzzle's personality, and will agree with us that he ought to undergo a further disability—namely, hand-cuffing.—ED. THE ACADEMY.]

THE SOVEREIGN'S RIGHTS OF FREEDOM AND THE CREATION OF PEERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There seems to be a grievous form of general ignorance with respect to the Sovereign's rights of freedom, which must never be misconstrued with Crown privileges. In other words, the fact appears to be entirely overlooked that the Sovereign is a rational as well as a constitutional, economic, or physical factor in the life of a nation. For instance, the Sovereign possesses, just as the most ordinary individual possesses, rights of private indulgence, and to rob him of these rights would be an act on the part of the other estates of the realm contrary to common law—that is to say, contrary to the very formulas of liberty upon which our House of Commons is founded.

As a constitutional, economic, or physical factor in the life of a nation, the Sovereign is, of course, like every other unit, a subject of law; but as a rational factor he possesses as much liberty of mind and spirit as the greatest and meanest of his subjects. It is, therefore, an extraordinary present-day weakness which misconstrues the free heritage of our King into forms of mere Crown privileges or prerogatives.

Now, from the common or privy forms of the Sovereign's rights—not by any means from a point of view relevant of mere privilege—the predisposition of the existing Government to create a breach of common law (that is to say, to abuse the supreme or national ground of freedom by seeking to overrule, by its own privy or common rights, the privy or common rights of others) is an answer in itself to the political deadlock of the moment.

A few suppositions will do much to explain.

Suppose the House of Lords, irrespective of all amendments or compromise, elect to make a firm stand against the passage of the Parliament Bill. What do they actually maintain by such a stand? Why, the rights of personal freedom. In fact, by such a stand the Peers discover to the Commons their own basis of freedom.

And the Government? What is its intention in attempting to pass such a Bill? Why, to make mere private convictions common law. In other words, this Bill simply seeks to make private individuals, in the shape of Cabinet Ministers, omnipotent. The gain, therefore, to the nation at large by such a real act of nobility on the part of the Lords goes without question. Likewise the fictitious nature of the loss to the nation on account of the Veto of the Lords goes without question.

But suppose, as the Government leads us to think, a correspondingly bold objection is made to the Lords' attitude towards the Bill, for we must not forget that the Commons have as much right to personal liberty as the Lords themselves. What course is to be taken by the ruling heads of the Commons? Obviously the same recourse as the Lords have—a negative recourse and nothing more. The Government is at liberty (and this is the limit of its freedom) to persist in sending the Bill to the Lords until the two Houses agree or come to terms upon it. So long as personal liberty remains to us the rejection of any Bill, no matter what Government introduces it, can never be assumed to be an act which destroys the ground of personal liberty. A Bill which is repeatedly repulsed must in some form be detrimental to the interests of free government. This, of course, is not saying that because a Bill is passed by the Lords it is necessarily not detrimental to the interests of free government; it may or may not be so.

But the great thing I have at heart is the emancipation of the Sovereign from a form of illegal procedure. This constitutional battle, for instance, is at present being waged upon equal ground between the Government and the Lords; but, in the event of the basis of our personal freedom becoming endangered, that the supreme representative of it—namely, the Sovereign—is to be called upon to surrender his own rights; it is surely time for free Englishmen to be up and doing, for, with the destruction of the Sovereign's rights of freedom, all personal liberty becomes destroyed.

It is not merely a question of whether a certain Bill shall or shall not become law, but whether a political privilege or prerogative (that of creating Peers) is to be used to subvert political freedom. As I have previously pointed out in these columns, the situation is an alarming one, and calls for a national and not merely a party protest. This foolish idea that a Prime Minister is within his constitutional rights even to approach the Monarch with a view to over-ruling the Veto of the Lords should no longer be countenanced, since such a procedure would be a breach of common law—that is to say, it would be a gross subversion of the Oath of the House of which the Prime Minister is the head. If, therefore, the nation allows the passing of this Bill, a Prime Minister will no longer be a subject, but a despotic ruler.

That such a breach of common law has previously occurred is no argument for a repetition. The legal course to pursue is a negative course—that is to say, the two Houses must continue to act independently of all other free powers (the free power of the Sovereign included) until an agreement takes place between the said Houses. Failing this free agreement, the only course open is one of Opposition policy. An appeal to the nation as a whole is only legal as an extreme form of settling political differences, and, as an extreme form, it can only be held to deal with matters beyond the limits of common or national law, and not, as the present Government imagines, with matters which are to be settled by common law.

Thus the constitutional or legal rights of the House of Peers to free action in matters of legislative policy is not a question which calls for an appeal to the Electorate. The Oath of the Commons justifies such rights.

Likewise the constitutional or legal rights of the Sovereign to free action in matters of legislative policy is not a question which calls for an appeal to the electorate. The Oath of the Commons again justifies such rights.

The constitutional or legal rights of both the House of Peers and of the Sovereign to free action in matters which are not relative of legislative policy is wholly a different affair, since, in this sense, they simply possess not free, but restricted rights. But then the same must be said to be the case with the Commons. In a constitutional sense, therefore, there can be said to be no political crisis or deadlock, but merely a Ministerial muddle or checkmate to Ministerial rule. The Opposition can well afford to treat such a situation with an assured, and therefore a quiet, attitude of protestation or negation.

Finally—and I think I have earned the right to ask such a question—what is to be said of the value of the authoritative prestige of such leading Opposition journals as the Times, that such spurious ideas as the present Government possesses of English justice, English law, and English freedom should have been countenanced in the least degree? I make bold to say that when such leading journals fail to lead others worthier of the name should, with all honour, be allowed to precede them. Apart from this, all national progression must rest in abeyance.—Yours obediently, Cambridge.

"THE CRUCIBLES OF TIME"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is, I think, rightly considered unwise for an author to make any comment on a review of his book. The earth is big, and it takes all kinds to fill it. Therefore a robust difference of opinion is both healthy and wise. It is even desirable, since there is no tuition so admirable as the tuition of a resolute opposition, however severe that opposition be. But your anonymous reviewer's article last week on my recent volume of poems is so grossly unfair that it seems to call for comment. For instance, he mentions one poem and cites one passage as, apparently, marked instances of "pure verbiage," and he appends to them both the remark that, with all their vices, they are "such as not every versifier could produce." Well, then, on his own showing, one would be inclined to wonder of what extraordinary metal the good things in the volume were hammered if the chosen bad things won this tribute. But throughout the article he fails to give one instance of the good things. It is true he says of certain poems that they attain "a real dignity and eloquence;" but he takes excellent good care not to quote from them. The only one poem he quotes from, and likes, he dismisses (and I agree with him in dismissing) as but a light and passing fancy.

Surely, Sir, you must agree that such biased quotation is both undesirable and unfair. But it does not suffice your reviewer. He even drags lines from their contexts for the purpose of holding them up to folly. It is not for me to speak in praise or blame of my own work. But in the interests of fair criticism I may point out so smug a travesty as this. He quotes these lines:—

"Yet with stricken horror saw we, for it settled, melted, dwindled, Seeming gradually less."

He says that they "might have been fitly found in the pages of a humorous poet." Well, that very largely depends on what it was that did this "settling, melting, dwindling," whether universes or abdomens. It happens to apply to a heap of gold, and those who have seen a heaped mass of metal in pieces, under the influence of heat, may judge themselves of the appropriateness of the picture used. But who could judge from your reviewer's method of citation? He adds the complacent remark that the lines are not Elizabethan. Whoever said they were? It is very kind of him to say that he is sure that I "can give him much better work than anything in" the volume; but, in view of his article, he can scarcely blame me for characterising this as mere sentimental wish-wash to tail off an unfairness.—Yours, &c.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE Spectator is—unconsciously—too funny for words. Its Editor has formed himself into a sort of universal information bureau. All the information disseminated is, moreover, inspired, and is quite as lucid and authoritative as that vouchsafed by the oracle of Delphi. For instance, in last week's issue the question of the Crisis is succinctly dealt with by the Editor in notes, leading article, and sniping comments on correspondence in rather over four columns—the whole of this space being needed to explain that Mr. Strachey having spoken the controversy is at an end. As was to be expected, the policy of running away has received his sanction. There are one or two delightful tributes to the Editor's omniscience:—

We may note that on Thursday evening the Press Association issued a statement to the effect that the Government had already obtained the King's consent to the creation of Peers . . . The Association's information will hardly be called news by the readers of the "Spectator."

In the odd moments of compiling four columns, the Editor is needed, it seems, on the telephone to give authoritative enlightenment to the editors of other papers. The Evening News prints the following telephonic message received from Mr. Strachey:—

I have never wavered in the opinion that the duty of the House of Lords was to pass the Bill, bad as it is, and so prevent the creation of peers and the consequent ruin of the peerage.

The ruin of the peerage would be bad enough, but it would also mean something like the ruin of the Unionist Party, for after the creation of peers there would be nothing to prevent the immediate crisis of a Home Rule Bill, Plural Voting, and other legislative projects equally injurious to the nation.

I feel certain that in the present circumstances the wisdom, statesmanship, and high qualities of leadership belonging to Lord Lansdowne may be relied upon to prevent the creation of peers.

Steele, in No. 562 of the Spectator, refers to Wolsey's "Ego et rex meus" as "the most violent egotism I have met with in the course of my reading." If he could only read the Spectator commencing with No. 4,300, he would, we think, see cause to modify that opinion. The one indispensable man has been found, but alas! he is not exempt from human fate. We shudder to think what will become of the Empire, and indeed of the world, when in the nature of things this great and sapient personality is no longer available to pronounce definitely on human problems.

There are no fresh developments in the situation in Morocco, and a better atmosphere hangs over the conversations in Berlin, which are likely to be somewhat protracted. The Daily Mail published a few days ago what purported to be the German demands of France in return for permission to establish a protectorate over Morocco, but these were of such an extravagant nature that the French Press made it unofficially clear that they could not for a moment be entertained. They included a large stretch of the French Congo including the sea coast and the port of Liberville; and also a port in Morocco and special trading rights over the Sus. These demands are equally unacceptable to ourselves as well as to the French, for they would doubly threaten our lines of sea communication to South Africa and also to India, for the Suez Canal could be so easily "accidentally" blocked in time of war that we should have to fall back on the old route round the Cape of Good Hope. Mr. Lloyd George came out with a timely little speech, stating our determination to stand by France, and containing a veiled warning to Germany of the serious consequences which may result from pressing any impossible demands on our ally. This has done much to clear the air, for we must convince the German Government that they have little to hope from internecine party strife in this country, and that both sides are equally united to maintain the status quo in Morocco and to keep our binding engagements with France.

The issue of the Parsi for July 2nd contains the concluding instalment of a very interesting article on Edgar Allan Poe by Mr. Khandalavala; but one sentence in it reads rather cryptically. Referring to "The Raven," the author writes:—"The poet passes through successive gradations of despair, the natural and prophetic refrain of which is 'Never More,' than which there is not a happier word in the English language." This is not particularly happily expressed, and we had been under the impression that there were many "happier words" in our language than the refrain of "The Raven." The rest of the essay is excellent. We note also in the Parsi a reproduction of Mr. Hubert J. Norman's paper in the Westminster Review on the poet Cowper; and the Wednesday Review reprints an article which appeared in THE ACADEMY some weeks back, entitled "A Reminiscence of Forty Years Ago," by "An Eye-Witness," who passed through the terrors of the Commune.

LOVE'S REQUIEM

Love is dead !
 On bed of roses
 Now his lifeless form reposes ;
 Heap the lilies round his head,
 Tell them softly, " Love is dead."
 Let sweet song
 Bemoan his dying,
 Strew late violets, softly sighing,—
 And, lest Love should be forgot,
 Twine the blue forget-me-not.
 Let your prayers
 Like incense rise
 Winged with dolorous harmonies ;
 Let four tapers star the gloom
 Like tall lily-wands in bloom.
 No black pall
 Shall drape his bier,
 Lay no yew nor cypress here,
 But, since Summer dies without him,
 Strew her choicest blooms about him.
 Through the glory
 Of his hair
 Wreath white roses, pure as fair ;
 O'er his heart, now still and dead,
 Lay this rose of deepest red.
 Lo ! he rises
 From the flowers !
 Petals fall in very showers ;
 " I am living ! " hear him cry,
 " Think ye Love can ever die ? "

WINIFRED SUTCLIFFE GREAVES.

THE WAGES OF WEAKNESS —

MR. BALFOUR and Lord Lansdowne have written on the crisis at home, but they have advanced no new arguments in favour of the Peers submissively passing under the yoke.

Lord Lansdowne offers his personal opinion and advice, which is, of course, entitled to consideration ; Mr. Balfour hints not obscurely at effacing himself as leader of the Conservative Party if Lord Lansdowne's advice is disregarded. It is possible that Mr. Balfour attaches exaggerated weight to his continuance in his present position. All admire his Parliamentary dexterity and his devotion to the Unionist cause. Since, however, he has spoken plainly himself, he cannot complain if others who have worked for the cause as long as he, and who are equally devoted to it as he is to-day, speak plainly also. I am prepared to do so, and to give chapter and verse for what I advance. I refrain, however, on this occasion because the European situation is such, that no man who occupies a position of authority should be the object of criticism which might tend in any degree to diminish the influence which centres in him. For the same reason it is incumbent to reserve criticism of Lord Lansdowne, the late Foreign Secretary.

Writing with all reserve, I hold strongly that, unless the foreign situation demands it, no concession should be made to the arbitrary attitude which the Government has adopted. If the situation of Europe is such that internal dissension must be composed, it is not for the Peers alone to offer concessions.

I am not writing with the freedom I desired, and I shall therefore adhere to essentials. The indisputable fact is that the Parliament Bill is not the Bill which was mentioned to the constituencies at the last General Election. The position which was taken up at that time by the Government candidates was that the House of Lords—as we know it—is indefensible and that its powers are in need of restriction. Reform and limitation were to march hand in hand. An old Chamber with traditional powers was to give place to a new one with a written constitution and circumscribed powers.

Many who are qualified to judge agree with my opinion that the House of Lords should have declined to read an incomplete measure a second time. Their position in that case would have been impregnable, and the Crown would have been justified in refusing guarantees until the Bill, which was foreshadowed at the General Election, was presented to the House of Lords, and either rejected by the House, or altered by it in essentials which the constituencies may have been thought to have sanctioned by a general mandate. That proceeding would have been a courageous, and at the same time a perfectly defensible, course to adopt.

The House of Lords under Lord Lansdowne's guidance gave a second reading to a partial measure, with no popular mandate behind it, and having accepted the principle trusted—as is now seen vainly—to the Government being conciliatory and accepting reasonable amendments. One might perhaps put the case thus : Lord Lansdowne finessed against the knave and the cards, and lost the trick.

Assuming that external affairs do not claim an overriding influence, I think that the Peers should resist overweening extortion to the last. If running away were a profitable policy, the Conservative party would now be in a very strong position. I believe that the party will never improve its prospects until it is strongly led, and ready to give battle against the oppression of a hybrid majority.

It is seen how much can be effected by comparatively small minorities which are strongly and resolutely led. The compact Conservative host is almost negligible, because its leaders always have specious arguments for sounding a retreat. It is opposed to all teaching of history and all instincts of mankind to argue that enthusiasm can be kindled for that which is invertebrate and complaisant under injury.

I admire Mr. Redmond not only for his loyalty to Parnell in his dark days, but also for the dogged determination with which he has imposed his will on the Liberal majority ; I shall have no admiration for the Peers if they accept from the Government a short lease of life bereft of all which makes life worth living. Viewing the domestic crisis by itself, enthusiasm for the Unionist cause can only be called forth by forcing the Government to carry out their at once tyrannical and ludicrous threat of a wholesale creation of peers. The constituencies will thus be able to perceive that they are being governed internally by a despotism of a degrading kind, because the ultimate power of fashioning the destinies of the country resides in a group which is avowedly utterly indifferent to its Constitution or legislative welfare.

CECIL COWPER.

WHY DIE?

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

THE political world has been in a turmoil during the past week. When Mr. Asquith announced in a formal letter to Mr. Balfour that he had obtained his guarantees, all the pent-up passions of both parties broke loose. Lord Halsbury, in an impassioned speech in the House of Lords, declared that he would never yield. He has been supported by a large number of peers and by many of the Commons, who are to give him a dinner at the Hotel Cecil to-night (Wednesday). The leaders of this demonstration are Lords Selborne and Salisbury, Sir Edward Carson, and Mr. F. E. Smith. They form the "Die in the Last Ditch Party," but they will not die after all, because saner counsels will happily prevail at the eleventh hour. They will eat a good dinner in the last ditch; they will emit panegyrics on themselves in the last ditch, but in the end they will stand by the decision of their leaders—Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne. One by one the leaders of the Unionist party have stated their views. Lord Lansdowne's were already known. On Monday Lord Curzon set his forth in a masterly letter to the Press, and on Wednesday Mr. Balfour announced his intention of standing or falling by Lord Lansdowne in a letter which is a masterpiece of logic and tactics. There are many who criticise Mr. Balfour's leadership, but no one can beat him when it comes to a subtle display of Parliamentary tactics. His letter has completely taken the wind out of the sails of the Halsbury demonstration. With delightfully cynical and remorseless logic he shows how totally out of place military metaphor is at the present crisis, and with polite and mild irony raises a laugh against those who indulge in these mock heroics. He mildly points out that the Constitutional struggle is but just commencing, and gently hints that it is the duty of all true Unionists to prepare for the struggle, and not rashly to commit harri-karri at this early stage of the game. In Japan a man commits harri-karri if he feels he has disgraced himself, and has incurred the ill-will of his Emperor. He never does it because he has been beaten in the first stage of the battle. He would be considered a coward if he did so. He will fight to the end, and when all is lost, why then, if he sees no other means of saving his honour, he may stick his two-handed sword in his bowels, and pass into the keeping of the spirits of his ancestors.

The political situation has developed exactly as I foresaw it would in these columns in our issue of July 8th. I then advocated that the Lords should yield rather than have their vote swamped by the Hireling Batch. That is what they are going to do, and it is the only sane and proper course. We must be left in a position to meet Home Rule with a decisive majority in the Upper House. Thus no Home Rule measure can become law until after two years, and by that time the coalition will have torn itself to pieces and split into its natural component parts—namely, Liberals, Socialists, and Nationalists—all quarrelling with one another. There only remains one step for the Lords to take, and that is to pass by resolution a solemn protest firmly placing on record that we only yield to force majeure, and do not accept the Veto Bill as a final settlement of their powers and prerogatives.

No settlement can be final until we have a Redistribution Bill and a reform of the Constitution of the Upper House. When these two all-important questions have been settled it will be time to adjust the final balance of the powers of the two Houses of Parliament. That day is not far distant. It may come at any time within the next two years. Let the Unionist party face the task of convincing the electorate as a united party. Let the threatened split be buried in oblivion. Let us close our ranks and march on the divided hosts of the enemy in one solid phalanx until we have split and scattered them like chaff to the winds. The country will not mistake or misconstrue the attitude of the party leaders at the present crisis. It is not weakness which causes them to yield—it is a wise choice of two evils. The electorate will not judge ill of those who sacrificed a little pride to preserve their liberties. So black is Mr. Asquith's record that his day of retribution cannot be far distant. He has sold the Constitution for eighty Irish votes; he has dragged the King's name into party strife rather than ask the people for their support; he has offered peerages to party parasites in return for cash down and promises to support any measure the Dollar Dictator may order him to pass; he has substituted a bureaucratic mandate for the vote of the people, and he has brought Parliamentary institutions to the verge of ruin and into public contempt. Nine-twentieths of the total electorate voted for the Unionists at the last General Election. There are many more of the remaining eleven-twentieths who will vote for Unionism at the next. Never were the prospects of the party brighter than at the present time, provided no internal schisms divide our counsels and our attack. Our leaders may not fulfil all our requirements. There have doubtless been greater battle-chiefs in the past; but let us not forget those words of Abraham Lincoln, "It is dangerous to swap horses whilst crossing a stream."

"THE ACADEMY" DINNER

It is just a year since the present management took over THE ACADEMY. There were many pessimists at that time who looked askance at the great task we had undertaken, and who prophesied, with the unfailing wisdom of their class, that in less than six months the paper would have ceased to exist or would have passed into other hands. Those who professed to be our best friends warned us against wasting our efforts to revive the fading fortunes of a journal which had gone through so many vicissitudes and which had fallen to such a low ebb. It is true we have gone through some anxious moments, but we have remained steadfastly confident that our readers would support our efforts, and that in the end they would meet with success. Our trust has not been misplaced, and to-day THE ACADEMY stands in a far stronger position than even the most optimistic believed it would a year ago. We have had great difficulties to face in the past, and we shall have troubles to meet in the future. In the first place, we desire to appeal to the impartial and to the intellectual, not to the strict partisan and to the sensation-lover. We indulge in none of the favourite schemes for increasing our circulation; we offer no prizes and organise no competitions; we make no effort to give our readers weekly thrills or special sensations; we wish the paper to succeed simply on its merits as a literary production run on original lines. Every one is entitled to a hearing in our columns. In the same number may be found totally different views on the same subject. We wish to give both sides on any question a fair and impartial discussion, and no considerations of mere profit can turn us from this course. We made a confident appeal to our readers a year ago; we make a still more confident appeal to them now, and we trust that all will continue their support and secure their friends' support throughout the coming year.

The anniversary of the new management assuming the control of THE ACADEMY was celebrated on Wednesday last by a dinner at Claridge's, which it is proposed to make an annual function. A distinguished company of thirty guests—all good friends and many of them contributors to our columns—attended the dinner. Earl Fitzwilliam presided, and the general company included Lord Howard de Walden, the Uruguayan, Brazilian, and Argentine Ministers, Sir Charles Walpole, Major Kingsley Foster, Sir William Bull, M.P., Sir Edward Ward, Mr. W. Keswick, M.P., Mr. Cecil Cowper (Editor), Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett, the Hon. Arthur Hill Trevor, Messrs. Wilfrid L. Randell, R. B. Turner, A. E. Hall, R. C. G. Richards, Arthur Machen, W. Negus, W. H. Koebel, Lancelot Lawton, Senhor J. Sanceau and Señor de Campilo.

The following sent letters of regret for being unable to attend: Sir Maxwell Aitken, Major Norton Griffiths, Sir Herbert Tree, Mr. John Murray, Mr. Waldorf Astor, M.P., Sir Owen Philipps, Captain Morrison, Dr. Sampaio, and Mr. George Cave, M.P.

Earl Fitzwilliam proposed the loyal toasts in a felicitous speech. Sir Charles Walpole proposed "The Two Houses of Parliament," which was responded to by Lord Howard de Walden in a most witty speech, and also by Sir William Bull, M.P. "Success to THE ACADEMY" was proposed by Mr. Negus, and responded to by Mr. Cecil Cowper, who briefly sketched the progress made by the paper during the past year, and who took the opportunity to thank those who had rendered their support. Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett proposed "The Distinguished Visitors," which was responded to by Sir Edward Ward and his Excellency the Uruguayan Minister, Senhor Regis de Oliveira.

FLIGHT AND FORTUNE

By WILFRID L. RANDELL

"Well have we speeded, and o'er hill and dale,
Forest and field and flood, temples and towers,
Cut shorter many a league."

AN innate, eternal desire for change, a certain irresistible, divine unrest which takes possession of healthy men and women from the cradle to the grave, is part of the secret of all human progress, and to this is allied the delightful virtue of curiosity, inquisitiveness—the wish to discover fresh lands, to find out new sensations, to peer into the crystal with the eyes of faith, to see visions and to dream dreams. Emulation then steps in; the craving to do what other men have never yet done, to succeed where others have failed, to rise, it may be stormily, above the tranquil, commonplace waters of mediocrity. A dozen other attributes, strong and weak, commendable and reprehensible, add their quota to the gathering impulsion—the longing for fame, for money, for the applauding crowd and the exultation of victory, for a woman's adoring glance, or an enemy's envious frown. So, driven by many complex forces intersecting and interacting beyond all possibility of precise computation, we explore equatorial swamps, we search and suffer in Arctic snows; we devise in huge laboratories schemes for the healing of the nations; we contrive machines that shall carry men on business or pleasure to the four points of the compass round the rolling world, and, at last, we fly through the air with the speed of a swallow and the ease of a seagull.

The past week is a memorable one in the history of human flight, and those of us who watched the spectacle at Brooklands on last Saturday afternoon have a memory which may easily be eclipsed by more notable scenes during the next year or two, but which at any rate will not be obliterated. To see the flimsy-looking monoplanes wheeled slowly from their sheds, rocking awkwardly as they traversed the rough ground; to catch a sudden spurt of blue vapour; to hear the quick, impetuous rattle as of a distant rifle-volley, and to behold the dead things spring to life one by one and soar into the hot sunshine, murmuring and muttering in the teeth of the treacherous wind; to hear them settle into a definite purring, musical note as they swerved, ever ascending, and flew arrow-like past us, the light glinting from their whirling propellers, on the first stage of the thousand-mile journey—these were new sensations indeed, even though we had seen flying of sorts before. The experience had the cumulative force of numbers. It had, too, its terribly thrilling moment, when Lieutenant Porte's smart little Deperdussin came to grief. "Beaumont" had sloped up steeply and surely; Astley had wavered, but cleared the dangerous eddies; Paterson had become a speck in the sky, and then, with a sickening feeling that something was going wrong, we gazed fascinated at the hazardous swoops which Porte's machine made when he had ascended fifty or sixty feet. In another moment a gasp of horror, of irrepressible sympathy and sudden fear came from the crowd, for the Deperdussin simply turned half over, dived fiercely, and crashed to the earth a wreck. The silence that enveloped us for one interminable pause was deadly—it could almost be felt. And then from the cloud of dust stepped a man unhurt, waving his arms, and we clapped and cheered him, partly because we were heartily sorry for his ill-luck, partly because the hand of death had missed its grip for once, and the terror had vanished.

After that the slow, solemn biplanes varied the story, and nothing very serious happened. A big "Bristol" careered twice round the oval, lifting herself a few feet now and then, reminding one of the story of the tug that described erratic circles in the river and drew profane comments from the rest of the traffic because her engineer had jumped overboard and nobody knew how to stop the machinery; one or two others had to alight and make fresh starts, but the majority were safe at their destination long before. The crowd lessened, seeking hotels and refreshment; and as we sat at tea in a cosy cottage-garden, high over our heads boomed the three last competitors, shapely as dragon-flies, speeding away from the sunset towards the goal.

So at last we fly in companies, and fairly safely, and by the time these words are being read doubtless some of the gallant adventurers of the air will have completed their thousand miles of danger and sought the less risky armchair, whence to expatiate on winds and weather. What will come of it all? When man has securely appropriated his three dimensions, will some patient mathematician unearth that long-sought fourth dimension from his store of bewildering figures, and teach us how it may be conquered? Probably not; long before then we shall be so bothered by problems arising from the development of the art of flight that three measures of space will be ample for us.

For ages past men have envied the birds and striven vainly to wrest from Nature the secret of feathers and wings. The swallow darts across our path tantalisingly; the seagull floats, circles, progresses subtly on outspread pinions with scarcely a quiver; the lark soars twinkling into the blue until it vanishes. How has man rivalled these graceful, ethereal creatures? He has taken a contrivance of iron and steel and brass, fed it with explosive vapours, built round it surfaces of canvas, pleasantly called "wings," and by the deafening heartbeats of that engine has forced the tilted planes against the air until they pull and rise, taking the engine and himself with them. Unpoetic, unnatural, indefatigable, ingenious Man! Still, it is a triumph for the featherless, wingless creature who has hitherto roamed a kind of Flatland, and a wondering uncertainty must greet those who demand what future there may be for the sport which is developing so rapidly into a science. "Who knoweth the spirit of man, that goeth upward?" "A bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

And as to fortune—who would not strive to fly a thousand miles for ten thousand pounds? We seek fortune in various ways, from the artless methods of Moses Primrose with his "gross of green spectacles" to the keen and complicated operations of the commercial magnate. There is something poetic in the idea of flying for money—much more so than in the idea of writing a poem for money. Poetry, as Richard le Gallienne continues to emphasise, should be paid for in roses, not in such sordid things as cheques and coins of the realm. We are not aware that the experiment has ever been tried on any living rhymester, but we should like to be present when the rose arrived, if only to hear the deep and rhythmic language which even the most imperturbable poet would probably use. He, however, does not risk his life in writing his sonnet or his rondeau—he merely risks slight casualties to his readers who may not be in dithyrambic mood. The aviator, on the contrary, takes his life and all its possibilities in his hands every time he ascends—a fact which was very vividly proved at Brooklands on Saturday last; and no one would blame him for requiring in return a handsome addition to his bank account. The uncertainty of the result is illustrated by the number of entries for this present competition; slow machines are pitted against swift ones, "Cody's Cathedral"—all honour to Cody the plucky and persevering!—against the speedy little monoplanes, every one well aware that a rebellious motor or a snapped wire may alter the whole order of things, may allow the stately biplane to sail home to victory, and leave the leader helpless in some wayside meadow.

As we go to press, the news comes to hand that Lieutenant Conneau ("Beaumont"), of the French Navy, has arrived at Brooklands, completing his flight after a journey that was at times really terrible, and winning the prize. Well within twenty-four hours of actual travelling he has covered the thousand and ten miles, with his compatriot, Védérines, not very far behind him. It was an astonishingly close race between the two Frenchmen, and heartily must the brave Lieutenant be congratulated, in spite of the drooping flag of hope that one of our own countrymen might this time have succeeded. Of Hamel, young and hopeful and energetic, we had strong expectations, but unfortunate delays have been his portion; many of the other competitors are still farther in the rear. And so the great race ends. What will come next? Who will be the first hero, I wonder, to fly round the world, and how will his necessary food and drink and fuel be supplied as he crosses the great expanses of ocean? It can hardly be doubted that some day the feat will be attempted, since airmen have started from and "landed" easily on the deck of a battleship. But such speculations, for the present, are profitless; the suggestive fact remains that two men have flown over a thousand miles, through rough weather, thunderstorms, hot sunshine and freezing hail, since we watched their winged engines lift sweetly off the turf into the brilliant sky last Saturday afternoon.

Fortune, then, to whom it is due; and let complaining tongues for a while be silent. In a gallant company, compact of courage, skill, and daring, the airmen have departed good-humouredly, and like true sportsmen the vanquished will be ready to give honour to the victor.

STATE INSURANCE

FROM THE WORKMAN'S POINT OF VIEW

It is proposed by the Government that compulsory provision against sickness shall be enforced upon 14,600,000 people, and that the wage-earners comprising this total shall pay £11,000,000 yearly towards that end. That provision against sickness and invalidity is in itself a desirable thing few men will be prepared to dispute. But whether the scheme now submitted by the Government is either economical, sound, or likely to benefit permanently those in whose special interests it is framed is a very different question. It is of immense importance to the workers of this country that the benefits obtained should be in proportion to the cost, and a careful eye should be kept upon any scheme which involves twice the cost in the providing of benefits that can be obtained by any workman under existing Sick and Benefit Societies. A careful examination of the figures of Sick Insurance Funds reveals the outstanding fact that unless there is anticipated an alarming increase of sickness after the Bill becomes law the total amount contributed under the Bill by all concerned will be out of proportion to the benefit to be received.

This can best be seen by taking the case of a firm employing 1,355 men and boys, having a scheme of sickness insurance in operation under which 15s. per week is paid to all men earning over 20s. per week and 7s. 6d. per week to boys earning under 20s. per week until return to work is possible. Taking the average amount paid by this firm for the last three years, it works out at £382 18s. 8d. per annum, with an average staff of 1,355 men and boys employed, and the cost, calculated on the basis of 4d. per head from each worker, 3d. from employer, and 2d. from the State, would during this time have cost the workers, master, and State a total sum of £2,642 5s. per annum. Even allowing for provision for maternity allowance and medical attendance, a sum amounting to from £120 to £150 per annum would cover the former, and if we add 6s. per head (actual cost according to Friendly Societies' returns) for medical attendance we get an additional cost of £406 10s. per year. By adding these figures together—£382 18s. 8d. paid out of funds for sick benefit, £150 estimated cost of maternity benefit to wives, £406 10s. for medical attendance; total, £939 8s.—we find that far greater benefits can be had for £939 8s., as against a cost of £2,642 4s. under the Government Bill, with the added advantage to the worker of 15s. and 7s. 6d. respectively per week as against 10s. per week all round under Mr. Lloyd George's proposal.

The very obvious deduction from this is that those firms which are already providing benefits equal to those proposed under the Bill could easily establish insurance funds of their own, under a system of State regulation which would be far more advantageous to the workmen concerned—more economical, alike both to employer and taxpayer, stimulating all concerned in the direction of promoting physical efficiency where—judging from the experience of France and Germany—State Insurance tends in the opposite direction. Apart from this important aspect of the scheme, does this Insurance Bill really reach that class of workman we are anxious to help? Let us carefully and impartially examine its proposals.

The Lancashire cotton operative may fairly be taken as representative of all other trades, both in point of numbers and wages earned. From four loom-weaver to mill-owner is a common experience. The operative of to-day is the employer of to-morrow under the system of hiring "room and power," a system upon which a gigantic business has been built in Lancashire, and one that is severely threatened under this Bill. Thousands of cotton operatives are in receipt of fairly steady employment and wages as a result of the enterprise of two or three of their own fellow-operatives hiring "room and power," pooling their savings together, and embarking on a manufacturing business on their own. Surely this type of man should be encouraged? This enterprise is the very foundation of the Lancashire trade, upon its maintenance depend the wages and well-being of half the cotton population of Lancashire. Increasing competitive conditions, combined with narrower margins and restricted markets, are taxing the resources of Lancashire to their utmost, and now it is threatened by a scheme which will undoubtedly make it increasingly difficult for the operative to rise, and will preclude from the realm of possibility the successful continuance of the small but thrifty working-man employer without the compensation of even touching the fringe of the really deserving poor; and where benefit does accrue we are asked to pay 9d. per week for that which, under individual management, can be gained for 4d.

The sum demanded from the cotton trade is equal to 40 per cent. of the total profit taken upon a basis of 5 per cent., an increase in the cost of production that cannot be borne, entailing grievous unemployment and hardship upon a trade and its workers, to whom a margin of 1 per cent. often makes all the difference between full employment and none. To prove this, it is only necessary to take the case of 1,000 looms. These looms will employ on an average 400 adults, entailing a cost of 3d. each per week, amounting to £260 per year. These 1,000 looms under the "room and power" system will involve a capital outlay of £16,000. Five per cent. on this sum is £800. £260 for contributions and at least £60 a year for clerical work, auditing, and collecting gives us a total of £320 a year, or 40 per cent. of the total of £800. The same process of reasoning applies throughout the whole of the country in thousands of cases, and is bound to be reflected in increased unemployment and the squeezing out of the "little man." Examination reveals this Bill as essentially plutocratic; it saves the "big man" while the "tryer" and the wage-earner are specially penalised.

How is it going to affect the really deserving poor? A poor man as defined by the Bill is one in receipt of less than £160 per annum, but Lancashire cotton operatives cannot be thus classified—the whole thing is a farce. It is rather the rule than the exception for a family working in the mill to be in receipt of over this annual sum, yet they will join in any benefits.

These people are not to be classified as the "deserving poor" any more than the newly married couple, without any family, earning between them £150 per annum. You must not tell these people they are poor; it is not true, and would be deeply resented as a great insult. Yet these, for the purposes of the Bill, are the "deserving poor."

The poor widow under seventy who takes in the washing of the above couple is classed under the head of "Casual Labourers," and as such is not entitled to any benefit.

The man of no trade, who must needs get a living by odd jobs or anything he can catch, forming the host of casual men hanging around our stations and docks, is likewise barred unless he pays a sum of 7d. per week to get that which 4d. would assure to him from outside sources.

Just exactly how Lancashire will be affected can best be shown by taking the daily routine of a cotton operative's life. And what applies in his case will incidentally apply throughout industrial England. Let us assume he marries at twenty-four a young woman working in the same mill. Quite naturally there are no incumbrances for a beginning. He is running six looms, his wife running four, from which an average of £3 per week is being made. Out of this something can, and is, as a rule, saved, say £50 the first year. Then she falls out of the wage-earning line sick. Recognised as a worker, she receives 10s. a week and a doctor. My point is, Does she need it, as compared with the casual labourer's wife? Is the former really to be considered poor, needy, and necessitous compared with the latter? The answer under Mr. Lloyd George's scheme is, Yes. This is the particular person who is to benefit—for what? So that she can as speedily as possible return to work. If it be a case of her becoming a mother, 30s. allowance, and back again to work at the expiration of four weeks. Following this same couple as typical, what do we expect to find in ten or twelve years' time? Family increased to four or five, woman stops at home, circumstances demand she should; the savings of their early married life are now gone, she is now in the class called "Casual Labourers," who can be insured providing she pays the whole amount herself. This, with her family and only her husband's wage, she cannot afford to do. Many, many sacrifices she makes in order to dress her family neatly. Much-needed rest and comfort are now denied; result, she becomes ill. Now, when State assistance is really needed, both the 10s. per week and the free doctor are missing. The poor husband and father is now told that State assistance is only for workers, still he goes on paying by his labour his proportion to the revenue which provides the twopenny dole of State assistance. Yet now, when he and his wife and family are actually placed in the position of the deserving and necessitous poor, no hand is extended to him.

It is no affair of the State to help these people, whose only crime consists of having bravely shouldered their responsibilities as citizens. It is now that care and attention are needed. This is the time for State aid. An emergency which the Chancellor meets by the vague and ambiguous promise that "if" a surplus fund should be created possibly the members of a worker's family may be allowed to share the benefit.

Having passed through this trying period of his family history, what is the man's position later on in life when the family have become self-supporting? The four children running sixteen looms among them are earning an average of 6s. per loom per week, and the father is occupying the position of an overlooker in the mill with 50s. per week—a total weekly income of £7 10s. Now we find that State aid is forced upon them. Both children and father are entitled to benefit as workers—with a joint income of £390 per year they have advantages which were denied them on an income consisting of the father's wage alone.

It will hardly be contended that these people are belonging to the "deserving poor," or that the Government's scheme at all adequately deals with that section of the State to which every one is desirous of rendering assistance

The poor and ill-paid casual labourer class are placed at a great disadvantage; involved in an expense they cannot afford to pay, yet needing more than any other class the help of the State. A Friendly Society can give sick benefits of 7s. 6d. per week and an average of £12 at death for 3d. per week. Why should a worker in the "Casual Labourer Class" be called upon to pay 7d. per week for 10s. a week and no benefit at death under the Government scheme?

It is the custom of people to enter Sick and Burial Societies quite early in life, and it appears to be the policy of the Government to destroy these institutions without giving the members any real advantage in return.

It cannot be held that people, and especially the rising generation, are going to join two clubs; one consisting of their Friendly Society, the other a compulsory State Insurance scheme, with an increased cost of commodities forced upon them, following upon increased cost of production. In addition to this their trades organisation will call for maintenance. No increased security of employment can possibly arise from this scheme; advance in wages will be more difficult of achievement, and competitive power is bound to be curtailed. When bad trade comes along, and the workman is earning half wages under short time, he will be compelled to pay his full contribution of 4d. and the employer 3d. This lends itself to the discharging of half the men, and running the concern on full time with the remainder in order to cut down the contribution. If the price of commodities is increased, then the worker will pay the employer's subscription in addition to his own, with his share of the State contribution as well. Therefore, it appears in this light that the workers are to be called upon under the State to pay a far greater sum for just the same benefit they can now obtain as individuals under Friendly Society management. The deserving poor are not reached. They are outside Mr. Lloyd George's scheme; he knows them not.

However attractive the proposal may seem at first sight, examination reveals the lack of accurate knowledge of the actual economic conditions governing our industrial workers which is responsible for such a loosely-constructed system, under which the workers are asked to believe that poverty and want shall vanish from our land. The multiplicity of inspectors and officials will all fall as a charge upon the worker. Smart dodges will be introduced into the mills and workshops calculated to confound the Government official, which will render the efficient working of the Bill well-nigh impossible; and while the operative will be called upon to find the money for these men's wages, they will have nothing whatever to do with appointing them to their positions. Evidently the Government thinks the parties concerned are not capable of providing them, and very considerably undertakes this duty from them.

Let us turn our attention to the question of Unemployed Insurance. This part of the Government's scheme again fails utterly to grip the problem it purports to solve.

Unemployment chronic and long standing is not to be remedied by Government paying a sum of 6s. to 8s. for a period not exceeding fifteen weeks. Every unemployed man is a charge upon his employed brother; and the robbing of the employed to maintain the unemployed is no solution of the problem, as all concerned are poorer in the end. It is only by the introduction of a scheme whereby the root-causes of this social cancer can be reached, that the good of the whole industrial population at large can be made the best insurance of the individual interests of all. Some relief, it is true, may be gained in cases of temporary unemployment such as is inseparable from change in seasons and other like circumstances for which the workman himself is in no way responsible. Still, much as this may be desired, the real economic problem remains in the main untouched by these palliative proposals. One cannot very well stand still and accept the theory of Sir Charles Wright Macara, who says, "Unemployment is an act of God." To accept this would be to admit that finality has been reached, and that Government is an impotent factor in dealing with that which lack of direction and regulation has undoubtedly produced. To create an evil—which has been born of the changing channels of our industry from skilled to sweated trades—and then propose as a remedy the Government's measure, is unsound national economy, and at best a mere tinkering with the symptoms, while the cause is left untouched. What sort of consolation is it to the young man, who has at great cost to his parents and the nation been through our technical schools, learned a trade, been reared to the position of a skilled workman willing and anxious to shoulder the responsibility of citizenship, and who through lack of employment is driven to emigrate, that, if he will hang on, a benign Administration will grant him from 6s. to 8s. for fifteen weeks until he can find employment? This after £200—at least—has been spent in training him to earn an honest living. What sort of political economy can it be that involves this nation in the expense of training and educating boys up to men and then perforce must either make a present of them to the United States of America, or dole out to them a pittance in lieu of the legitimate employment which our money has been spent in fitting them to follow? It appears to me that the best form of unemployment insurance would be the adoption of a policy which would obviate unemployment. To safeguard employment and wages is surely better than this feeble attempt at the protection of the unemployed, whereby the Government tax and penalise the hard-working, steady man, and drive armies of our most desirable workers out of the country, in the interest not of the legitimate tradesman, the skilled artisan, but rather that of the indifferent, inefficient, and incompetent. By all means let us assist the honest, industrious workman; let us so direct the trade policy that the fullest measure of regular employment comes his way. To claim that the life and property of every man should be safeguarded as being the first duty of Government, and then to leave out the means of obtaining a continuance of that life and property, is a mockery that the Chancellor's proposals cannot hide. It is simply playing with the existence of every worker. Every Trades Unionist knows it. The whole policy of their movement is based upon the very principle of trade defence I am contending for. The system of "out-of-work pay" is one of the sources of their strength.

The Chancellor knows this and his proposal is directed against their movement. Workmen cannot pay their Trade Union contributions, special levies, sick and burial contributions, and at the same time contribute to the Chancellor's scheme. No man can object to voluntary contributions; freedom and full liberty of action are the sovereign blessings we enjoy. To be compelled to pay without any option is not democratic, is not just, more especially when it is remembered that we are to pay very much more under a State scheme for benefits we now obtain under our own management, with full control over all that is done. It means a great weakening of the individual liberty of the subject, and the destruction of those very characteristics which have built our commercial supremacy and made the British workman the best in the world.

THE SISTER OF SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE

Martha, Lady Giffard: Her Life and Correspondence (1664-1722). A Sequel to the Letters of Dorothy Osborne.
 Edited by JULIA G. LONGE. With Preface by his Honour JUDGE PARRY. Illustrated. (George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.)

It is long since the perusal of a volume of memories has given so much pleasure or proved so enjoyable as those of Martha, Lady Giffard. The subject of the memories herself was no well-known historical personage who took a prominent part in the life of her day, nor was she one whose name has of itself persisted during the two centuries that have elapsed since her death. She lived a simple private life, devoting herself to the interests, first, of her brother and his family, and, secondly, of her friends. The picture which stands out from this volume of letters is that of a sister for whom any brother would be grateful, and of a friend who should have been to those who had the good fortune to possess her the most treasured of all possessions. Merely as the diary of an unknown lady of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with the light it throws on the domestic life of the country gentlemen and women of that period, the book deserves a warm welcome, for what might otherwise have appeared merely as a dry and little interesting record has been vivified and warmed by the glow of life which the editor has breathed into it. Apart from these more general considerations, however, the book will prove invaluable to a large circle for the charming picture it gives of the vie intime of Sir William Temple, the diplomatist and author, and of his wife, Dorothy Osborne, the brother and sister-in-law of the nominal heroine of the volume.

Lady Giffard was left a widow a few months after her marriage. From the death of her husband she went to live with her brother, and remained with him until his death. Thus a considerable portion of the book consists not only of the life of Lady Giffard, but also of the private life of Sir William Temple and of Dorothy Osborne. Under the same roof lived for a long period Jonathan Swift and "Stella," and others, and of these interesting personages also we get, not occasional glimpses, but long-sustained accounts.

Lady Giffard's letters possess a special charm of their own, and this charm is increased by the setting, for which the editor is responsible. Miss Longe has given herself full rein in her task. The connecting narrative far exceeds the space occupied by the letters themselves. Her narrative, it is true, is often a little disordered and wandering. We may best describe the editor's method as feminine. But it must not be thought that this arrangement, or want of arrangement, diminishes the charm or the interest of the pages. The book is not one for serious study: to pass a pleasant afternoon, or series of afternoons, few if any recent volumes would prove more valuable.

From a work of this description quotation, if kept within limits, is difficult. Once embarked upon that pursuit it is very hard to know when to cease. Satisfactory selection of passages is also impossible, yet no notice of this volume can be considered complete, no matter what limits may be laid down by the reviewer, unless it gives at least one passage in the words of the writer and another in those of her editor. The account of the Great Plague as it affected the Temple household, early in the book, calls for attention. Temple had gone abroad on diplomatic business, leaving his household at home at Sheen. The plague soon spread there, and one of the servants was attacked. Thereupon Lady Temple and her sister-in-law resolved to remove to London. In London, of course, the condition of affairs was far worse:—

They found a dismal scene there, soe many houses shut up with crosses upon the doors, as they passed into the town, the people in them crying and wringing their hands at the windows, the bells all day tolling, the streets almost empty of everything but funerals, that were perpetually passing by, the difficulty of finding a lodging from the fright everybody was in of receiving the infection with them, few going thither on any other occasion but flying from it at home, people coming in like Job's messengers all day, with one sad story before another was ended. Yt. after two dayes spent in this dismal place they ventured to go home and trust with God's Almighty's blessing what the use of care and cordialls could do to preserve them at home. Above all the great one of resolving whatever happened never to leave one another, and with this and God Almighty's blessing on the family, they recovered ye servant and continued all the rest of them in perfect health, and though I hope nothing so dreadful will ever again befall my country it may not be thought wholly impertinent to set down the methods wch under God I thought they owed their preservation to wch I think a greate part was the cordiall of Sir Walter Raleighs found in most Recipe Books a soveraigne (remedy) . . . against the Plague, which they made and gave a spoonful or two of it round the house every morning, burnt Burgamot Spirit, and made as many servants as they could after ye smoke was gone take tobacco for a great part of ye day, strew'd rue in ye windows and held myrrh in their mouths when they came anywhere that they apprehended infection.

Miss Longe in her comment on this passage emphasises Lady Giffard's modesty, which sinks her personality in the "we" or the "they" of her narrative.

In another passage Miss Longe draws a moral illustrating the character of her heroine. The occasion to which she refers is that immediately following the death of that brother to whose welfare Lady Giffard had devoted practically the whole of her life. Dorothy and all their children had predeceased him, and the sister was now left alone:—

So in the dead of a chill January night Lady Giffard found herself alone. The chief object of her life was over; the man who had been the centre of her existence—practically all her life—was gone. His suffering life was ended, but she had long to live and much to suffer.

Miss Longe quotes from the letters which were written to her in her bereavement, and comments:—

Such letters are not written to exacting and self-seeking people. . . . Busy men in high position, and with full lives themselves, thought of her, and for her, and made plans for her advantage.

In the course of these pages many an interesting sidelight is thrown on public life in the days to which they relate. Temple was more than once offered office in the Ministry, but on accepting it he would have had to buy out his predecessor in office. On one occasion his friends offered to lend him £6,000, the price asked by Arlington for the vacation of the office. Apart from other reasons, however, Temple objected strongly to such a method of appointment, and he refused both offers. Many are the good anecdotes with which this volume abounds. It is related of the poet Waller, who had written an ode to the Protector, that after the Restoration he wrote another extolling the happiness which must necessarily follow that event. The King, who was well aware of Waller's previous connections, after reading the verses, said: "These verses are extremely good, but I think some of those you wrote to Cromwell were better." Waller was wanting in neither presence of mind nor wit, Bowing low, he replied: "Oh, may it please your Majesty, we poets always write better on fiction than on truth." He kept and deserved the King's favour.

From another page we learn that the rent of a house of Sir William's had had to be reduced as "the value of the house is decreased owing to the Duchess of Marlborough having a house at the bottom of the garden." The Duchess was the great Sarah, and her influence on Sir William Temple's rent must give rise to many a well or ill founded suspicion. There are other passages touching on the great Duchess. One of the most pleasing is the following extract from a letter from the Duchess of Somerset, her rival, written after the death of the great Duke:—

I don't wonder she is in great affliction for him, for she married him for love, and he has always made her see good a return as to deserve a continuance of her kindness, and tho' his ill health had very much affected his understanding, yet he had still enough to make him sensible of the care she had of him, and there is nothing titchese so neere as the parting with an old friend.

The book is embellished with many good portraits. A genealogical tree showing the connection between Sir William Temple and Lord Palmerston closes the volume, with which one is sincerely sorry to part.

A HANDBOOK OF GOTHIC ART

Gothic Architecture in England and France. By the REV. G. H. WEST. (G. Bell and Sons. 6s. net.)

IN the preface this book is described as a handbook rather than an encyclopædia. Its author is a clergyman, and also an architect. Its essential feature is an appreciation of the historic parallelism of Gothic methods in England and France, including a comparison of the divergencies in design and detail of Gothic structures in the allied countries. The introduction contains an interesting discussion of the problem of church building from the point of view of the material locally available. Owing to the difficulties and cost of transport, the early architect was, of course, largely dependent on the district of his labours for the raw material to be used in construction. In cases in which these obstacles were overcome, and exotic stone, &c., were employed we have evidence of growing wealth and enterprise. The present writer has at the moment to deal with the problem of constructing a railway in close vicinity to a noble Gothic cathedral. His first glance at Mr. West's book was therefore to see if the word "foundations" occurred in the Index. It does not, and the author is silent on this branch of his subject. It may perhaps be argued that the design of typical structures does not necessarily involve a discussion of the varying conditions of platform on which such structures are intended to rest. Part I. of the book consists of four admirable chapters devoted to details of design. In Part II. the author attacks his subject from the historical side. With great skill he draws the moral of the inbred idealism of the Latin race type, as reflected in French Gothic architecture, comparing this with the inveterate makeshift of the Teuton, as illustrated by corresponding church work on this side of the Channel. The author's nearest approach to a definition of the principles of Gothic art is given on page 199, where he states four canons of construction, in which he says the race characteristics of the Norman builder are enshrined. Few will agree with A. H. Clough:—

Come, leave your Gothic worn-out story,
San Giorgio and the Redentore,
I from no building gay or solemn
Can spare the shapely Grecian column.

He must indeed be dull of soul who is not stirred by the ethereal loveliness of a high-soaring poem in stone such as a great Gothic cathedral. All architectural work unconsciously reflects the character of the ideals of its designers. It is probable that the men who reared the stately cathedrals, which are the delight not of an age but for all time, and which were centres of refuge against tyranny, in turn helped to plan feudal castles and their oubliettes. They were men to whom personal liberty, in the modern sense of the word, was anathema. The author's field of observation is largely technical and detailed. Here and there the voice of the clergyman predominates, but the scope of his inquiry hardly brings into prominence a sense of that mysterious spirit-call, in the strength of which the monkish creator and his master-builder or lay-associate strove to materialise their dreams and visions of a temple not made with hands. To them and to the mason who worked at their side the labour was of love and high ideal. The maker of architectural handbooks is apt to treat his subject as if the distinctive features of building construction were parts of a puzzle to be fitted together, rather than as the creation of an imperative inspiration.

A particularly interesting historical sidelight is that (pp. 51-2) in which the author shows how the funds for building English cathedrals and churches were obtained from the stream of pilgrims to the relics and shrines of saints, whereas the great works of France were largely due to the efforts of organised guilds of artificers. The mediæval guild was the lineal descendant of the Roman collegium, and, as the City Stone of Chichester demonstrates, that institution had an English home as early as the first century. The author traces primitive church architecture back to Roman domestic buildings. In view of recent investigations of the planning of temples, such as Stonehenge, and the theories to which these have given rise, the domestic basis of church architecture must be regarded as a secondary solution of the matter. Its root idea is lost in the mists that hang about the lichen-grown stones left by unknown races of men. Mr. West describes in an interesting way the refinement and skill of the poise of French thirteenth-century Gothic, as illustrated in the "supreme but splendid folly" of Beauvais Cathedral. This book may be commended to the thousands of visitors who will this summer be spending a rambling holiday in England and France. Its more technical portions will not appeal to them, but for purposes of comparative study the book will be of much service to the architectural amateur. To professional architects its value lies in the condensed information it affords. It is largely a compilation, in which detailed observation is focussed. It compresses much matter into small compass. The parallel lists of English and French Gothic buildings, with their respective dates of construction, are a very happy idea. The book is profusely illustrated, and the illustrations are admirable and excellently reproduced, but it is a pity that they are not printed on better paper.

STYLE, SUPERMEN, CANNIBALISM, AND A PHILOSOPHER

The Philosophy of a Don. By G. F. ABBOTT. (Stephen Swift. 5s. net.)

IN the "Philosophy of a Don" Mr. G. F. Abbott has achieved the impossible. Posing as an Englishman, a gentleman, a Christian, and a scholar, he compares himself with the highly sophisticated, slightly attired, contemplative cow, ruminating at leisure over the boundless pastures of creation; and further, he describes himself thus in his preliminary essay entitled "Heretics." "I am not great enough to be careless, nor small enough to be reckless, of public opinion. I have a certain reputation for respectability to maintain, and I cannot afford the luxury of individuality. I am a Don." This being so, as we implicitly believe, from the first word to the last of this pyrotechnical book, Mr. Abbott has achieved the impossible in that he has provided us with several hours of immense enjoyment, of great laughter, and given us enough quotations to last us for a year.

A born essayist, a keen observer, and a writer endowed with a witty and epigrammatic pen, Mr. G. F. Abbott, who is palpably Oxford and, we should think, unobtrusively Balliol, has thrown his essays into a quite original form. By conducting a series of intimate conversations with two typical great men whom he has taken infinite care that we shall not recognise by calling them Shav and Chestnuton, he has strung his pearls together on a sort of rope, and has given to a volume which might otherwise have been dry the flavour of fiction. His readers get to know the two poseurs Shav and Chestnuton, and take a keen delight in the way in which Mr. Abbott, in his self-abdicating rôle of Don, pours common sense upon their swollen heads. "You are," says Shav to his apparently humble admirer, "and always will be, one of the semi-colours of life—a piece of conventional mediocrity with a blameless record, a spotless collar, a prosperous banking account and a stiff outlook." This is the way in which Boanerges Shav always talks. Ordinary people would call it excessively rude, but when we remember that Shav is an Irishman and a man who throws most of his journalism into dramatic form, and who, in addition to these things, is a vegetarian, it is foolish to call him rude. The word is eccentric. His own word would be great. Mr. Abbott, anticipating Nemesis, kills and buries Mr. B. Shav, and in these epoch-making lines sums him up:—

A turbulent humourist, an intellectual anarchist, an ego maniac of the first magnitude—a man who considered the centrifugal caprices of the individual the supreme test of virtue and the quest of his own good a sufficient excuse for making other people uncomfortable—a unique anomaly of whom no counterfeit can even be attempted with any shadow or hope of success.

Where did Shav derive his singular perversity from? Was it an inherent or an inherited infirmity? Most people declare that it was an outcome of his Irish birth. But I, who knew him better than most people, could never accept that explanation. For if Shav was Irish for England, he was also too English for Ireland. He was an alien in this, an outcast from John Bull's other island, an undesirable in both. He was, as one might say, a man of no country, no creed, no age. He was just Shav—a monadic nomad, or a nomadic monad; a unit of discontent unattached, unlabelled, unappreciated, and unprofitable, disporting itself in a social vacuum; a naughty ghost, noisily wandering in a Hades of its own creation, and there pursuing in a restless, erratic, superior fashion a cult that it considered higher than any culture. He was immensely popular in Peckham Rye, and I have no doubt he would have been equally popular at Westminster. There all his peculiar powers might have found a congenial field for fruition; his lightning rapidity of thought, his unhesitating readiness in repartee, his superb command of invective, his bitterness, his truculence, his colossal confidence in himself, real or apparent, and his total contempt for everybody else—all these gifts would probably have stood him in good stead, provided, of course, he remained in perpetual opposition. His fatal mischoice of a field of activity robbed English politics of an entertaining figure and endowed English letters of an irritating solecism. Oh, the pity and the pathos of it!

Mr. Abbott's witty and satirical analysis of his other purely imaginary character, who writes thousands upon thousands of easy paradoxes for many of the weekly papers and for all the first numbers of papers which one seems to read, all the while drinking port wine and deploring the death of poetry, must be read to be appreciated. The conversations with these two people upon life in Boeotia, upon a plea for plagiarism, in praise of poverty, on degeneracy, the stage, Imperial ideals, the British oak, arms and the superman, and a hundred other things, make most excellent reading. It is not difficult to imagine that "The Philosophy of a Don," while causing Homeric laughter in the Savile Club, will bring down upon it the virulent abuse of Adelphi Terrace and Peckham Rye. Mr. Stephen Swift is to be congratulated upon having given it to the world.

ABSOLUTE CRITICISM AND EDMUND SPENSER

The Critics of Edmund Spenser. By HERBERT E. CORY.
(University of California Publications in Modern Philology. Berkeley, U.S.A. The University Press. $1.)

MR. CORY, avowedly in quest of the "absolute method of criticism," provides us with an illuminating experiment. He attempts to put before us the true estimate of Spenser by a comparative study of the judgments that literary criticism has produced during the three centuries since the poet's time. He is of course fortunate in his example, for few of the great English writers have endured the whole history of English Literary Criticism, or have weathered the changing climates of so many eras and thought-movements. We stand now at a very convenient remove from Spenser's day, and it would be a much more difficult, if equally fascinating, task to determine in like manner the quality, say, of Browning, or even of Shelley. Nevertheless, that the method is instructive and valuable appears abundantly in the course of Mr. Cory's present study.

Criticism is apt to be biassed not only by the individual taste of the critic, but also by that indefinable zeitgeist which works so subtly in all ages. The very qualities which are the worship of one age are often the execration of the next. Spenser's poetry was born in what the essayist calls the Age of Enthusiasm. It was the dawn of a National Literature, when anything English was greeted with whole-hearted praise. There is scarcely a dissonant note, therefore, in all the chorus of adulation which characterises the period immediately succeeding Spenser's own time. It is extravagant with a unanimity that is nowadays rare. One admirer places him forthright with Theocritus and Virgil, while another pits him bravely against the world; even shrewd Drayton couples him with Homer.

Then, as a natural reaction, comes an Age of Reason, when the real spirit of criticism awakes. Rugged Ben Jonson leads the way, and Spenser's archaisms, his disregard of the cæsura, his didactic tone, and his allegorical method, all come in for adverse discussion. The break-up of the old ideals follows with what Mr. Cory distinguishes as the Age of Literary Anarchy. He makes the chaos of this period the subject of a piquant parallel:—

It is a breach of decorum now to try to believe less than five conflicting theories at once. . . . Science has destroyed religion, we wail. But never was the world so full of creeds, innumerable variations of Christianity, the worship of mankind, the worship of the superman, the worship of the Unknown God, neo-paganism, the religion of a literary man, the religion of an undergraduate, the religion of the free-thinking proprietor of a country grocery store. We have a magnificent choice. We preach democracy and practise oligarchy. . . . Never was the human mind in a more active and a more healthy state. So it was at the close of the seventeenth century. "Hallelujah!" shouted the Elizabethans. "But hold," murmured the rationalists. After that the deluge.

Many distinct schools began to form, and between them all Spenser's importance begins to wane; with the emergence of Dryden, however, comes a more distinct note. He blames Spenser's lack of unity, and the "ill choice of his stanzas;" but judges him "established in" his "reputation," though here again the queer distortion of contemporary criticism appears in his naming Waller as superior to Spenser.

The interest of the subject deepens with the rise of the Neo-Classicism. Mr. Cory claims that Spenser exercised a greater influence on the Augustans than he afterwards did on the Romanticists; in reality each age took only a partial view of the poet—that, of course, which best suited it—and it is curious to compare the respective judgments. The Neo-Classics emphasised beauties in Spenser that were lost on the Romanticists. The former loved his fidelity to Virgil, and deplored his "debauchery" by Ariosto; while the latter, when their day came, praised him for his debt to the Italians, and regretted his Latin "blemishes." His didactic tone and his allegorical method are his chief excellences to the Augustans. But when the Romantic Revival came, the boot was on the other leg. He is now sought "rather as a poet of ardent emotion and sensuous glow than as a poet of vast moral visions"; his appeal is to the "feelings of the heart rather than the cold approbation of the head." He is even conceived as a true Romanticist blushing for his enthusiasm, and cloaking his romance in morals to hide his shame.

There is no attempt at a conclusive summary or final statement on the part of the essayist; he leaves the reader to form his own judgment. His own leanings, however, are sufficiently apparent. He has no sympathies with the modern cult of l'Art pour l'Art: indeed, he often pauses to launch a bolt at the doctrine.

Our present-day romanticists sometimes look upon Spenser askance because of his idealism, and sum it up with the accusation that he has no human interest. They think this because present-day romanticism often means the reverse of idealism. . . . It is certainly true that contemporary romanticists need a revival of sentimentalism as badly as the eighteenth century, though for a different reason. The Augustans were hard because they believed in repression and glittering reason. Present-day romanticists are hard because they are jaded and do not respond to normal emotions. And better for us than sentimentalism would be the beautiful idealism of Edmund Spenser. His sweet leisureliness would cure us of our literary dyspepsia induced by our breathless short-story technique which we admire with such blind exclusiveness. His profound moral consciousness would impress us again with the high function of poetry and make us laugh at Art for Art's sake.

We are occasionally startled by a queer Americanism, such as "disgruntled" (!) and "nearby." There are misprints on pp. 125, 133, and 134—where Allan Ramsay hides under the alias of "Aamsay;" but these are small flaws, and the essay is well worth reading to all who are interested in literary criticism.

HISTORICAL NOVELS

A Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales. By JONATHAN NIELD. (Elkin Mathews. 8s. net.)

PERHAPS the most favourable criticism that can be passed upon a book of this description is to call attention to the fact that it is now in a fourth edition, having first been published nine years ago. This survival, coupled with the announcement that the work is now in its sixth thousand, shows that, in the first place, Mr. Nield has supplied a real need, and, secondly, has satisfied it adequately. If there were no desire for a bibliography of this description, which must needs be caviare to the general, the book would never have passed beyond a first edition if it had ever been published at all. Unless Mr. Nield had dealt with his subject adequately, the second edition at best would certainly have been the last.

Beyond a practical criticism of the character of the foregoing, it is hardly possible to give an adequate notice of a work of this description. No matter how exhaustive the author may be, or how careful and judicious in his selection, he can at the best represent but his own opinion, which inevitably in many respects differs from those of others. The critic on his part also has views as to which works should be included in and which omitted from a list such as this, and if the views of both author and critic coincide, the coincidence would indeed be astonishing. To indicate the books which should, in the opinion of the present writer, have found place in a list of the principal historical novels of the English language would therefore be a useless task, for his selection must inevitably differ from the choice of his readers, and would be little likely to prove more satisfactory to them than is Mr. Nield's list, which, moreover, holds the field. Concerning this list, however, a few details are in place. First, it may be stated that the book has grown in the course of its four editions from 132 pages to 540. The stories noticed in it are grouped in chronological sequence. First come those dealing with the Pre-Christian era; then the first century, second century, &c. Previous to the thirteenth century historical events have given but little inspiration to the novelist, but from that period onwards it would appear that the writer of fiction has made far greater use of the muse of history. Other features of the volume are a list of semi-historical novels, an index of authors and another of titles, a bibliography of books and articles on the subject of the historical novel, a list of fifty "Representative Historical Novels," a long list of selected historical novels for children, supplemented by notes on juvenile literature.

The task of Mr. Nield and other bibliographers in this field is in many respects a difficult one, for at some periods there is a plethora of works, out of which the compiler must needs make only a selection, while at others historical novels are so few and scanty as to make the period almost a desert, and historical novels thrice-welcome oases. Even in these bald patches Mr. Nield has, however, exercised a wise and careful discretion, and has rigorously excluded all works which fall short of the standard which he has set. The difficulty of defining the historical novel, of course, often arises, and Mr. Nield offers the following solution. He includes in that category works which respond to the following definition:—"A novel is rendered historical by the introduction of dates, personages, or events to which identification can be readily given." Novels which give merely the general atmosphere of a period, such as Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," or Maurice Hewlett's "Forest Lovers," he relegates to a supplementary list of "Semi-Historical Novels." Mr. Nield puts well the case for the historical novel as a means of educating the young:—

Where the text-book fails in arousing interest the tale may succeed, and, once the spirit of inquiry has been stimulated, half the battle is gained. In saying this I am far from wishing to imply that the reading of romances can ever take the place of genuine historical study. I know well that such a book as Green's "Short History of the English People" may prove to some more fascinating than any novel. There are, however, cases in which recourse may be had to a high-class work of fiction for the attainment of a truer historic sense; while taken only as supplement to more strictly academic reading, such a work may prove to have its uses.

A CONFERENCE OF CRANKS

Nationalities and Subject Races. Report of Conference held in Caxton Hall, Westminster, June 28th-30th, 1910. (P. S. King and Son. 3s. 6d. net)

It is, after all, a charitable view to term this conference, a report of the proceedings of which is before us, a Conference of Cranks, for it is to be regretted that many who took a prominent part in the discussions are far more dangerous than cranks, and our principal object in noticing this report is to warn readers against the harmful doctrines advocated by many of the speakers. To be patient with them is often difficult. With all the effort in the world to sympathise with the self-appointed spokesmen of "oppressed" nationalities one can find nothing in common with, for instance, the Hon. William Gibson, who, we believe, is the son and heir of Lord Ashbourne. Speaking on "Ireland's Greatest Need," which, judging by his remarks, is himself, he is reported to have said—after addressing the gathering in Irish, "my national language," and French "as a protest against the idea that English is the language of international relations"—that the conditions in which he found himself forced him to have recourse to the English language, "the tongue of the stranger . . . much as I dislike the language. But I must remind my hearers that there is only one use an Irishman could have for this tongue, and that is to lay it about the back of the stranger himself." Mr. Gibson is, however, not satisfied with this balderdash. He continues, "There is one language which has been a persecution to me ever since my childhood. It has done serious damage to my mouth, tongue, throat, and organs of respiration." Presumably the organisers of the Conference, once they had saddled themselves with Mr. Gibson, could not prevent him from giving utterance to this nonsense from their platform; but it is surprising that they troubled to print the rubbish which, according to their report, composed practically the whole of his address. In our turn we must remind our readers that Mr. Gibson is not a boy of sixteen, but a man of middle age.

Mr. Gibson's speech is, after all, but harmless nonsense. The same cannot, however, be said, for instance, of that of Mohamed Bey Farid, the Egyptian Nationalist, who was subsequently committed to prison on account of his seditious writings. We do not propose to follow this individual in his diatribe against English rule in Egypt with which he regaled the Conference. It will be sufficient to indicate his attitude by pointing out his reference to the foul murder of the Egyptian Premier as "the unfortunate act of Wardani."

Egypt, India, Morocco, Finland, Persia, Georgia, Ireland, and Poland are the countries with which the various papers read before the Conference, and reprinted here, deal. England and Russia are the two principal States which are held up to the opprobrium of the world. The bracketing of these two Empires by itself shows how far removed from the realities of life are the organisers of this precious Conference.

The Coast Scenery of North Devon. Being an Account of the Geological Features of the Coast-line Extending from Porlock in Somerset to Boscastle in North Cornwall. By E. A. NEWELL ARBER, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S. Illustrated. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. ARBER is the most companionable of geologists. He makes the earth's crust digestible for the most dyspeptic of intellects. The reason of this is that he is an artist, with an eye no less for the wood than for the trees; if we have permitted ourselves a rather loose description of the materia geologica, we may console ourselves with the reflection that geology is as special in its use of terms as Humpty-Dumpty. Turning to the Appendix of this book we find, for instance, that the word "rock," of whose proverbial connotation hardness is the chief member, denotes, among other things, so soft a substance as clay. Mr. Arber has written avowedly for a double public, for the layman and for the savant, with all the intermediate shades, the tyro, the dilettante, and the merely curious. We would recommend, however, to the extreme parties divergent methods of approaching the subject; the initiated may begin at the beginning, and will probably skip the more elementary parts; the less instructed would do well to begin at the end, where he will find the groundwork of the whole edifice, and a catalogue of the obscurities. Better still, he will look through the excellent and original photographs, which are sown through the book with no unsparing hand, before turning to the concise information of the final chapters and appendices. But this counsel is almost too obvious to be worth the making; the pictures would attract, even if they had no scientific message to give. The later chapters, with their more general point of view, contain important and original work on the evolution of coastal waterfalls, the marine denudation of inclined and folded rocks, and other interesting and difficult points. To each of the earlier chapters, where the various districts are discussed in detail, is appended a very useful itinerary in the Baedeker style, with indications of routes and means of accommodation. The only feature of the book to which we are inclined to take exception is the system of referring to plates and diagrams by their numbers, without indicating the page. As Lector says to the gifted Auctor of "The Path to Rome," "It is not easy to watch the book in two places at once." Here it is inevitable, and we admit it; but we should like a little of the weathering processes, of which the work is so full, called into action to make the rough places smooth for us. Plate xlv. we found particularly elusive.

Medical Revolution: A Plea for National Preservation of Health based upon the Natural Interpretation of Disease. By SYDNEY W. MACILWAINE, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. (Retired). (P. S. King and Son. 2s. 6d. net.)

WE do not think that the author's views expressed in this book will attract any more attention or cause more upheaval in the medical profession than they appear to have effected in the past. Mr. MacIlwaine wishes to classify disease according to its ultimate causation and not by any one conspicuous pathological process; the former depends on a multitude of factors, and the result of his efforts would therefore be chaos. Any improvement in treatment would be absent, for the intelligent practitioner seeks a cause whatever be the name of a disease, while the unintelligent medical man—for whose benefit the reform is presumably intended—is under any circumstances futile. There do not seem to be any definite reforms proposed in regard to the relations of the general practitioner and the specialist, and advancement in preventive medicine is not brought into consideration, for there appear to be no suggestions as to how to advise humanity with regard to avoiding illness.

Gasc's Little Gem Dictionary of the French and English Languages. Edited by MARC CEPPI. (G. Bell and Sons. 1s. net.)

As its name implies, this is the smallest of the various forms in which Gasc's well-known French and English Dictionary is issued by the publishers. Consisting of nearly three hundred pages, it is handy in size, and will take up but little room in a breast-pocket. It is necessarily very concise, and the choice of words is thereby limited; but nevertheless they are extremely well chosen, and the booklet should prove a useful pocket-companion. We note a mistake that has crept in on page 14, where "bluet, s.m. (bot.)" is translated as "blue-bottle." It should, of course, be "cornflower," in the botanical sense. We have always found Gasc well up to date, and during the many years we have used the parent work we have seldom found it fail us.

FICTION

Tabloid Tales. By LOUISE HEILGERS. With Preface by HORATIO BOTTOMLEY, M.P., and Portrait Frontispiece. (Odhams, Ltd. 1s. net.)

THE astute Mr. Bottomley announces in his "word of Preface" that Miss Heilgers "is the only female writer of short stories at the present day." As this collection of sixty-four "Tabloid Tales" is dedicated to the "considerate editor" of John Bull himself, it might be thought that he was unduly prepossessed in the fair authoress's favour when making this sweeping assertion. Without agreeing with it in toto, we may, however, unhesitatingly go so far as to admit that this little volume places Miss Heilgers in the front rank of English short-story writers. These homœopathic doses of fiction, which have previously helped to fill a column or two in various publications, deal cunningly with life in its multifarious phases, and display a remarkable knowledge of the complexity of human nature. Miss Heilgers does not mince her words; her language is always plain and to the point. Hence the pictures she draws of frail humanity are delineated with no uncertain hand, and appear vividly before the reader. Mr. Bottomley singles out for special mention the short story "Albert George," and it is certainly deserving of all his commendation. It is curious that a young lady of culture should have acquired such an insight into the low life of this vast metropolis. "A Few Hours" is a powerful story of quite another kind; and so is "Anna of the White Hands," in which we learn that "to dream of heaven when one is in hell does not bring heaven nearer, but only adds to the torture of the damned." A creepy ghost-story is "The House with the Crimson Creeper." And, though somewhat unequal, the majority of the other "Tabloid Tales" are sure to find many appreciative readers.

Alistair. By MARIE STAR. (Constable and Co. 5s. net.)

WHEN we say that Mrs. Star has written a pretty and descriptive little story round her hero we think that we have said as much as it is possible to say in praise of "Alistair." Of plot there is next to none, the main aim of the book apparently being the putting forward of several Buddhist tenets. For instance, Gismonda, who acts as a sort of foster-mother to Alistair, teaches him that if during this life he attains "the power to suffer with resignation and to rise above misfortune by self-renunciation" he "may not have to undergo another incarnation on this unhappy planet." She herself lived in the hope that she had attained to this great height, but Alistair's grief moves her so deeply on her death-bed that she promises to offer a prayer to be reincarnated for his benefit. Many years later Alistair meets her again in the person of Gladys, who suddenly turns pale, opens her eyes wide, and would have fallen into a trance had not Alistair blown "lightly upon her eyes" and otherwise endeavoured to dispel the dream, much to Gladys's dismay. After a few meetings and partings Alistair and Gladys are eventually married and live permanently in Gismonda's castle in Italy. Let us hope that they will suffer all their trials with resignation, and so not be forced again to dwell "on this unhappy planet," especially as Alistair promises on page 103 "another translation later on of the works of Omar Khayyám."

The Ninth Duchess. By GURNER GILLMAN. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

IN a foreword the author tells us that he has written "The Ninth Duchess" in obedience to the wishes of his public, who, following the publication of "Her Suburban Highness," wrote asking him to take them to Garstein again—Garstein being a Grand Duchy in Germany. We have not had the advantage of reading "Her Suburban Highness," but the present volume deals with an English duke of the early Georgian period, the Grand Duke of Garstein, and a prince and princess, his son and daughter. It is another version of the "Taming of the Shrew," and is full of life throughout.

Gentlemen are killed by the hero without any questions being asked or coroners' inquests. The age of chivalry, however, had not quite passed away as the hero, after a terrific sword-fight, killed his man, and with courtly grace soothed his dying moments by telling him he had fought like a gentleman; and then, folding his arms on his breast and laying his sword by his side, left him. It is a very well-written book of its kind, and we hope the author's readers will be as equally satisfied with it as they appear to have been with his former work.

To relate anything of the actual plot of this story, which is a detective one of somewhat uncommon type, would be impossible without telling the tale in full, for almost with every page there is some fresh incident, which complicates the solution of the problem. Perhaps in dealing with such a book it may be considered hypercritical to cavil at any lack of plausibility; the reading public who wish to while away an hour or two really do not care whether the characters in a novel are according to life or purely fiction. At the same time, to read of a distinguished physician who calmly takes the law into his own hands and poisons any patient he considers undesirable, and to be told of a Cabinet Minister who is ready to plunge his country into war in order that he may rid himself of a military leader whose wife he covets—well, perhaps it is as well that such people dwell only in the realms of romance. One thing is certain, Mr. Wilson is never dull.

The Soul of the Moor. By STRATFORD D. JOLLY. (W. Rider and Son. 2s. net.)

THERE really is not much to be said about a book like this. It is a kind of spiritualistic "shocker" written for the benefit of those who are interested in hypnotism, clairvoyance, transmission of souls, and the occult in general. The author displays no literary skill, and it is difficult for the ordinary sceptic to find his story anything but a little mad and extremely tiresome. The elect will probably object to his sensational treatment of the mysteries that occupy their terrestrial minds.

"THE FATHER" AT THE REHEARSAL

IN selecting this difficult play of Strindberg's for exposition on Sunday evening last the Adelphi Play Society showed considerable courage. Psychological discussion carried to extremes, at times approaching the ponderosity of a medical treatise when the questions of fatherhood and motherhood are concerned, make for boredom in the listener unless the exponents are true artists; and when insanity is added to the bill, to convey the necessary sense of horror and fear and despair across the footlights requires unusual nicety of acting. Overdo it, and the tragedy becomes a farce at once; under-act it, and the effect is as dull as though the words were read by emotionless amateurs.

Fortunately the talent of the Adelphi Players was equal to the task—if only just equal. We prefer Mr. Maurice Elvey in lighter parts, such as his delightful interpretation of Percinet; but, despite the disadvantage of having been compelled to take the leading rôle of Adolf, the cavalry captain, at short notice, he fairly well expressed the harassed mind, the desperate fears, of the father horribly uncertain of the love of wife and child. Mrs. Alice Chapin as Laura was calm and cutting; once or twice during the evening a little more energy in her retorts would have doubled their effect. Miss Hilda Honiss as Bertha, the daughter, showed hardly a fault; it was a pleasure to watch her apparently spontaneous movements and glances. Dr. Ostermark, who has to listen to both sides, and to judge between the wife's story and the husband's—a very trying part—was represented with dignity and discretion by Mr. Harold Chapin. His keen looks at the man he suspected of insanity, his fine scene with the irritating wife, his general demeanour, were all in thorough correspondence with the theme. Miss Marion Sterling, Mr. Townley Searle, and Mr. Leslie Gordon adequately portrayed Margaret, the nurse, Jonas, the pastor, and Nöjd, a trooper. Incidentally, when so fine an artiste as Miss Phyllis Emanuel renders the music of Chopin and Debussy in the intervals, why do nine-tenths of the audience immediately talk furiously and spoil completely the pleasure of the courteous tenth who desire to listen?

"The Father" may be ranked with those plays of Brioux which invariably force the stream of criticism into two diverse channels. To our mind, as we have pointed out in previous articles, questions and problems which verge on the province of the physician are better dealt with by other means than the art of the stage. There is a strong dramatic situation, of course, and in its presentment there is plenty of room for all the resources of capable and refined acting; but, when all is said, why should any audience be sent from the theatre with a sense of awful depression—a feeling that the most severe, most brutal aspect of human relationships has been carefully worked up, dissected, and exploited before their eyes in the name of art? A good many modern dramatists are busy at present turning up the mire, hunting for the ugly side of life, searching for material that shall show the withering of love, the fading of everything that is beautiful, the collapse of youthful dreams. Ibsen was a great man and a great artist, but his methods can be carried too far, his lessons can be learnt too well. In the name of art, let us have a little more sweetness and fragrance and harmony on our stage, a little leaven of the gracious and hopeful before the spirit of scientific investigation takes entire possession of the world.

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR—VI.

By FRANK HARRIS

THOSE last exultant centuries of Christian faith have a singular appeal in them, an unearthly attraction. "Leave everything," cried Bernard, "fight the infidel, redeem the Sepulchre, and life beyond the grave, an eternity of bliss shall be your exceeding great reward." The world was quickened, thrilled with the Great Hope. That life of the Middle Ages which is regarded as so barren, so tedious, so dull, possessed nearly every interest that our life possesses, and was, besides, illumined, so to speak, by a sun which never set. The partition dividing this visible world from the world beyond the grave was so thin that the warm light of Paradise shone through and glorified all the squalid details of the earthly pilgrimage. There is to me an inexpressible pathos in a life all illumined by the beauty of a mirage. A sigh of the night wind and the vision vanishes, the pictured Paradise dislimns and fades and darkness covers the earth.

The spirit of man is unconquerable; the chief interest taken away, the sun gone out, so to speak; one finds new meaning in what is left, new glory in the stars. All through these ages, so-called, of Faith the ordinary business of man's life went on as usual; as usual he worked and ate and loved and died. And as the Heavenly Kingdom faded out of his thought and grew dim the real world became more beautiful and more wonderful to him and all the interests of life more absorbing, especially the chief interest—love.

Sainte-Beuve sees that sexual love has a larger place in modern life than it ever had before; he cannot understand why literature is becoming more sensual; this is the explanation. To us moderns love is the central sun of life; the fount of all art, all beauty, all delight; the soul of all our singing; the heart of all our hope.

The Middle Ages, too, had songs of war and love; the trouvères stirred the blood with Roland's death at Roncesvalles and brought tears to the eyes with the piteous tragedy of the Châtelaine de Vergy.

This romance of the Châtelaine told in Old French verse is one of the most charming love-stories in the world.

I should like to go back to the beginning and tell the whole of it, tell how that wise Alix of Burgundy, wife of Eude III., played Regent for eleven years (1218-29) during the minority of her son Hugue. She was thirty-five years of age when she took the helm of State in her firm white hands. There were debts to meet on all sides, debts for wars never completed, debts for crusades hardly contemplated. Alix began by swearing fidelity to the King of France, and, in order to set Philip's mind completely at rest, she even swore she would not contract a second marriage without his consent, and having thus ensured peace she set herself to clear off the debts. In four years she had paid every penny, and then she began to buy lordships and counties and lands to increase her son's estate. When Hugue came of age she retired to her own property at Prenois to live out her life quietly among her own people.

Hugue IV., her son, was a hot-tempered, passionate man, who, as the most powerful feudal chief in France, fought up and down the land till Pope Gregory himself was compelled to interfere and warn him "to cease disturbing the peace of a happy kingdom."

Amid all his wars he found time to marry twice and became hopelessly enamoured of his second wife, Beatrice of Champagne, as your hot-blooded men often do when they marry young women, in later middle life.

At this time Laure de Lorraine was Châtelaine of Vergy. The story goes that Laure fell passionately in love with a young knight of the Court of Burgundy, but as she was married and compelled to prudence she had to find some way of meeting her lover without exciting suspicion. She showed feminine ingenuity in strategem: she trained her little dog to find her knight at a word, and when her husband went abroad the lovers used to meet in all security, and according to the old chronicler "took great delight in each other's beauty."

It soon got talked about at Court that this knight cared nothing for any woman, and his unwonted austere reserve excited curiosity: some said he was under a vow, others hinted at a shameful secret. Hearing the gossip, the Duchess Beatrice began to pay attention to him, and finding him "very noble and of splendid presence," she too presently fell in love with him and took occasion to declare her passion. But the knight sheltered himself under his duty to the Duke and declared flatly that nothing would induce him to betray so honest and kindly a lord. Thus scorned, the Duchess fell to hatred of the knight, and resolved to destroy him. She set about the work with womanly cunning:—

La nuit, quan ele fut couchie
Jouste le duc, à souspirer
Commença et puis à plorer,
Et li dus errant li demande
Que c'est qu'ele a, et li commande
Qu'ele li die maintenant.

Which, being translated, means that when in bed with the Duke she began to sigh and then to sob, and when the Duke asked her what was the matter she replied that she had been insulted by the knight, who was sick with love of her and pursued her continually.

The Duke at once got up and called the knight to him, and charged him with the offence. The knight denied it. But the Duke told him roundly that his life witnessed against him. He reminded him that he never paid court to any one, and never carried any woman's favour, and declared that it had already been whispered about that his aloofness was due to some unhappy passion. Having thus convinced himself, he concluded angrily that unless the knight could free himself from the charge he would banish and outlaw him, so that any one might do him to death. The knight, seeing that in that case he must lose his love absolutely, resolved to tell the Duke the truth:—

Ses venues et ses alées
Et la convenance première,
Et du petit chien la manière.

He related the whole story of his passion and described the little dog as go-between. He told it all under the condition of the strictest secrecy. The Duke, however, insisted that seeing was believing, and so on the following night he hid himself behind some trees and witnessed the meeting of the two lovers, who had been brought together as usual by the little dog.

When the Duchess Beatrice learned that the Duke was not going to revenge himself and her on the knight, she made up her mind to find out the reason, and at length by dint of contemptuous sneers at his weak credulity, varied with tears and promises, she got him to tell her everything.

It was then near the feast of Pentecost, when all the Court assembled after Communion to pay homage to the Duke and Duchess. At the great reception the Duchess waited for her rival, and when the Châtelaine of Vergy came in with her husband, the Duchess received her with extravagant courtesy, and told her that she might well be satisfied, for she had indeed won a splendid and noble lover:—

Chastelaine, soiez bien cointe,
Quar bel et preu avez acointe.
Et cele respont simplement:
Je ne sai quel acointement
Vous pensez, madame, por voir,
Que talent n'ai d'ami avoir
Qui ne soit del tout a l'onor
Et de moi et de mon signcr.
"Je l'otroi bien," dit la duchesse,
"Mais vous estes bone mestresse,
Qui avez apris le metier
Du petit chienet afetier."

The verses tell how Laure replied simply that she did not know what the Duchess meant, for the only talent she possessed was fidelity to her lord and master. "I would like to believe it," retorted the Duchess, "but you are a very clever quean and can even teach a little dog to play strange tricks."

Struck to the heart by what she thought was the manifest traitorism of her lover, the impetuous Châtelaine immediately left the hall and went to her own room and flung herself on her bed in bitter grief and misery and there died presently of a broken heart.

Seeing her in her room alone the little dog immediately set off to find the knight, and a few minutes later the knight entered and found his dear mistress dead upon the bed. Without being told a word he guessed the truth, and not being able to live without his sweet lady he stabbed himself then and there with his own sword and died beside his mistress.

As soon as the news of the double tragedy spread abroad the Duke and Duchess hurried to the scene. There the Duke was told by the waiting woman how his wife had insulted the Châtelaine, and suddenly understanding all her vileness and how she had brought two lovers to death out of base envy and jealousy, he snatched the sword from the body of the knight and thrust it into the throat of his wife. So the romance of the Châtelaine of Vergy and her lover ends with the death of the wicked Duchess.

A few weeks later, filled with remorse at his own action and mourning continually for her whom he had loved, Hugue took up the Cross and became a Templar, and led a crusade to the Holy Land in company with his ancient enemies, the Counts of Nevers and Montfort. In a desperate battle near Gaza the Crusaders were beaten and Hugue of Burgundy retreated and built the great fortress at Ascalon. Later still, he embarked with St. Louis at Aigues-Mortes and took part in the campaign in Egypt, fighting bravely at Damietta and Manzourah. When quite an old man he went as a pilgrim to the shrine of Saint-Jacques de Compostelle, hoping at last to be freed of his mortal sin.

The story so affected me that I tried to discover the scene of the tragedy; I motored through the country between Beaune and Nuits where the great castle of Vergy once stood. It has disappeared many years ago, but I found the place, I think, where it must have been:

The castle was built (the old historian tells us) in the form of a great ship, and was surrounded on all sides by high rocks and cliffs so that it could only be come at by one narrow way leading to the portal. And this way was so arduous and difficult that it could only be reached on foot, and it wound about so that those who pressed forward to the attack were separated, so to speak, from their companions and exposed to wounds and death from the enemies hidden above them.

In fact Vergy was so strong that it was attacked again and again by the Princes of Burgundy in vain.

But if the castle has disappeared and the very place where it once stood has been forgotten the story remains, and the noble devotion of Laure, the Châtelaine of Vergy and her lover, still quickens all our sympathies.

We were so loth to leave this storied land of Burgundy that we reached Fontainebleau too late to visit the Château of Francis I., which was added to by Henry IV., and is full of memories of Louis XIV. and of the great Condé and the greater Napoleon. Here is the vast Cour des Adieux where Napoleon, after his abdication, in 1814, said farewell to the Grenadiers of the Guard. It is curious to notice that the Napoleonic legend still lives in France and is certain to show fresh life if ever the two lost provinces are regained.

Half an hour later we ran through Melun, with its memories of Bertrand du Guesclin and its capture by the English in 1420, and by Henry IV. in 1590, and so to Paris and its crowded streets just before midnight.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE AMBIGU-COMIQUE—I.

BY MARC LOGÉ

THE love of melodrama seems to be one of the fundamental instincts of humanity, or rather of the lower classes. Perhaps one reason is that their more simple temperaments, from which, in most cases, intellectuality is excluded, experience, in the heartrending vicissitudes of the heroine, or in the sinister schemes of the villain, a relaxation from the sorrows and worries of their daily life. Whilst some persons find diversion for their thoughts in comedies, or even in farces, the amateurs of melodrama forget momentarily their own troubles in sympathising with those of the fictitious personages parading on the stage.

The Ambigu-Comique has, for more than a century and a half, been consecrated to melodrama. Since its foundation this theatre has been the cradle of most of the celebrated dramas which later have electrified emotional audiences in both hemispheres.

In 1769 an actor named Audinot, belonging to the troop of the Théâtre Italien, settled at the Foire St. Germain—which at that period was, with the Foire St. Laurent, one of the popular Parisian centres of amusement—and opened a puppet-show, a spectacle which in those days was in great favour with the population of the capital. Audinot's marionnettes had a considerable success, for they characteristically impersonated some famous actors of the Comédie Italienne by humorously mimicking or ridiculing their particular traits or foibles. Audinot soon found it possible to establish the third playhouse opened on the Boulevard du Temple, and he named his small theatre the Ambigu-Comique; but the critical and satirical remarks expressed on his stage concerning the other Parisian theatres drew the attention of the police. The restraint subsequently imposed upon him by the authorities became at length so contrary to his interests and enterprise that he substituted children in the stead of the puppets, and resolved to abandon the style of spectacle which had brought him such success. Two other actors, Moliné and Planchesne, discharged like himself from the Comédie Italienne, undertook to furnish him with the plays he desired. The Ambigu-Comique soon saw itself the rendezvous of both courtiers and townfolk, and was more appreciated than the theatre run by Nicolet—even when the latter possessed as usher his famous monkey, who, dressed in astounding attire, imitated the acting of many of the leading stars of the Comédie Française, with, it is said, great talent.

The officers of the Gardes Françaises decided, in 1771, to give a public representation on Audinot's stage; but the performance was of so licentious and gross a character that the Duc de Choiseul, then Minister of War, revolted by the cynicism and obscenity thus paraded before the public, ordered all the officers who had taken part in it to be placed under arrest at Fort l'Evêque. This punishment, however, was never executed, as it transpired that amongst those who had most enjoyed the jests and plot of the spectacle was Monseigneur le Duc de Chartres! Silence fell upon the incident, and the officers were left unmolested.

Audinot's troop of children attracted all the theatre-going public of Paris; but certain kind, well-meaning souls often wondered what would be the future morality of those little ones, who were already acting parts of which they ought to have ignored the nature for many years to come. Bachaumont (1700-1771), who belonged to the celebrated coterie formed by Mme. Doublet (1), and who wrote for it a remarkable literary and historical diary (2), in which were entered day by day the most interesting or curious events of the period, says in the same:—

Les amateurs de théâtre sont enchantés de voir la foule se porter à l'Ambigu-Comique, pour y applaudir une troupe d'enfants qui y fait fureur. Ils espèrent que cette troupe deviendra une espèce de séminaire, où se formeront des sujets d'autant meilleurs qu'ils annoncent déjà des dispositions décidées, et donnent les plus grandes espérances. Mais les partisans des mœurs gémissent sincèrement sur cette invention, qui va les corrompre jusque dans leur source, et qui, par la licence introduite sur la scène, en forme autant une école de libertinage que de talents dramatiques.

One of the plays which most attracted the attention of the public was "Le Triomphe de l'Amour et de l'Amitié," which in fact was nothing else than the opera of "Alceste," arranged to suit the Ambigu. This provoked an indignant protest from the Archbishop of Paris, because a chorus of priests appeared at a certain moment on the stage. The authorities did not, however, think fit to inquire into the matter, and the "Triumph of Love and Friendship" continued to draw a full house each night. It is amusing to note that although before the Revolution all the plays represented by the theatres of the Boulevards were submitted to the censorship of the "comédiens français" and the "comédiens italiens," the smaller shows, or "spectacles forains," as they were then called, were allowed extreme liberty as to the morality of the plays enacted: they were only asked not to encroach on the privileges of the Royal theatres.

Audinot's playhouse could not, of course, escape the hatred and jealousy of the more important Paris theatres, and for a few months its vogue seemed on the point of waning under the repeated attacks directed against it. But a happy circumstance recorded by Bachaumont in his delightful memoirs helped to consolidate its reputation:—

En 1772, Mme. Dubarry qui cherchait tous les moyens de distraire le roi, que l'ennui gagnait, avait eu l'idée de faire venir Audinot jouer à Choisy avec ses petits enfants. C'était la première fois que ce directeur forain paraissait devant Sa Majesté. On a donné d'abord "Il n'y a plus d'Enfants," petite comédie de prose d'un sieur de Nougaret, où il y a de la naïveté, mais des scènes d'une morale peu épurée; "La Guingette," ambigu-comique de M. Planchesne, c'est une image riante et spirituelle de ce qui se passe dans les tavernes: un joli Téniers. On a fini par "Le Chat Botté," ballet-pantomime par le sieur Arnould. On n'a pas même oublié la "fricassée," contre-danse très polissonne. Mme. Dubarry s'amusait infiniment, et riait à gorge déployée. Le roi souriait quelquefois: en général le divertissement n'a pas paru l'affecter beaucoup.

It is, however, to be hoped that Audinot soon showed himself more careful in choosing the plays represented on his stage, as amongst the young actresses of his troop was to be found his own daughter, Eulalie, who, when only a child of eight, was noted for her fine voice and astonishing intelligence. An amusing anecdote of the time records that the director of the Ambigu-Comique had the following inscription written on the drop-scene:—"Sicut infantes Audinus," which phrase was gravely translated by a jester to mean, "Ci-gît les enfants d'Audinot" (Here lie Audinot's children!).

The vogue of the Ambigu-Comique became so great after its actors had had the privilege of playing before the King that the opera saw itself deserted, and in 1771 the administration of that theatre, being exceedingly powerful and feeling anxious as to the lessening popularity of its playhouse, obtained a decree ordaining that the Ambigu-Comique should henceforth be ranked amongst the theatres of the last class. Its orchestra was reduced to the absurd number of four musicians, and songs and dances were prohibited. This ordinance provoked public discontent, which took so menacing a form that it was deemed wise to come to a more amicable arrangement. The Ambigu recovered permission for songs and dances on the condition of paying an annual contribution of 12,000 livres to the "Académie Royale de Musique."

Gradually, however, the style of the spectacle forming the daily programme of the Ambigu changed—young men and women replaced the children, and some of the celebrities of the Comédie-Française, such as Damas and Varenne, starred there in their youth. Great historical and romantic pantomimes replaced the mixed shows which had formerly attracted the public. One of them, "Le Maréchal des Logis," had a colossal success, being founded on a real incident. The actual hero of the adventure thus dramatised assisted at the play several nights, to the great delight of the audience, and from a box witnessed complacently his own exploits immortalised on the stage. In 1792, at the eve of the most fearful of tragedies, in which were to take part nearly all the citizens of Paris, a great pantomime called "Dorothée" was produced at the Ambigu-Comique, in one Act of which appeared a grand religious procession, headed by priests, white-surplined choirboys, acolytes bearing reliquaries, crosses, and many other emblems of the Roman Catholic faith. Brazier says in his amusing chronicles:—

This procession passed down the stage in the midst of the cries and plaudits of a multitude which was already beginning to feel the pangs of a wound which later was to engender so many excesses. And then we saw processions of another kind: the churches sacked and wrecked, the sacred vases submitted to horrible profanations, bourgeois comedians attired as priests and abandoning themselves to the most infamous of sacrileges. I myself have seen, as a child, a miserable scoundrel who, dressed in sacerdotal garments, and in a state of complete inebriety, run down the Faubourg St. Martin, carrying some false consecrated bread in a ciborium, and feigning to administer the Holy Communion to the passers-by, thus mocking the most holy and saintly possessions of mankind—God and His Symbols.

Many of the actors of the Ambigu-Comique took part in the Revolution, either as spectators or victims of the great movement; one of them, Bordier, had the misfortune of incurring popular wrath, and was hanged in 1789, charged with having participated in a riot. It is affirmed that this comedian faced death serenely, and even gaily. When belonging to the Ambigu company, he had taken a part in a play called "Le Ramoneur" (The Chimney-Sweep), in which, just as he was about to enter the chimney, he used to hesitate a moment and say: "Y monterai-je? Y monterai-je pas?" ("Shall I climb up? Shan't I climb up?") At the foot of the gibbet, on the point of ascending the fatal steps, Bordier is said to have stopped and interrogated, laughingly, the executioner: "Y monterai-je? Y monterai-je pas?" He finally climbed the steps, bowing gaily to the crowd, which was hooting him furiously.

MUSIC

THE musical season, which began while the primroses were out, has lasted till the geraniums are at their hottest blaze and the dahlias are telling us that autumn is close at hand. Those who are in the secret tell us, and our own observation confirms the truth of the tale, that it has not been an entirely successful season. London's mind has been too much occupied with the doings of those who bear rule over us with sceptre and crown to remember the homage due to the princes of Art, whose sway is exercised by liquid voice or nimble finger. Many of these, both native and foreign, have summoned us to their court—from the mighty rulers of international influence to the collaterals of the house of Pumpernickel and the Transparencies whose power is only makebelieve. But they have not been so numerous as in other years, and their reception, in most cases, has been polite rather than enthusiastic. Empty seats and meagrely filled money-bags have been the portion of almost all—even of some of the real potentates. What a disappointing history of indifference could be told by the organisers of the splendidly attractive programmes of the "London Musical Festival"!

What are we to think of the preoccupation of the amateurs when a new symphony by Sir Edward Elgar could be passed by almost without notice? It would appear that the only providers of music who can be jubilant over the state of these affairs are those who direct the fortunes of Covent Garden. Until the arrival of the Russian Ballet they saw their house filled every night, though, with a single exception, they presented operas whose spring has long ago departed, and artistes whose radiance will soon be as autumnal as that of the operas. Latterly the heroines of opera have had to lament a sadly-diminished interest in their joys and sorrows, for their former patrons have saved their sovereigns for the Russian performances. We are glad to think that, although the powerful Fairy Fashion has no doubt helped to collect the crowds which besiege the doors of Covent Garden when the Russians are to dance, these crowds do certainly give evidence that Londoners can appreciate what is good. And it speaks well for their perseverance in well-doing that, in spite of the torrid atmosphere, they have neglected no opportunity to attend the ballet—perspiring, yet praising; boiling, yet blissful. We must do the dancers the justice to say that, be their evolutions never so intricate, they are the least hot-looking people in the theatre. How they manage to look so "airy" is one of the greatest mysteries of their art, and "Les Sylphides" is probably the most cooling sight now to be witnessed in London, cooler than the Serpentine bathers, cooler than Ministerialists at tea on the Terrace. But when the thermometer began to play its gridiron tricks in earnest, why did not Mr. Forsyth and M. Fokine obtain permission from the Ranger to give their ballets under the trees of Kensington-gardens, or by the waterside in St. James's Park?

We ourselves have long held the opinion that music is worthy to be heard in comfort; that it is even disrespectful to the divine art to give concerts, &c., in stuffy, disagreeable rooms, except perhaps in winter. And, as regards the ballet, we are of the same opinion. On one of the hottest of the recent dog-days we were privileged to be of a small company which sat under the dense shade of immemorial limes and beeches, on a lawn that was still emerald, washed by the gentle waves of Father Thames. In a natural grotto at the foot of the wooded cliff a young Greek maiden lay stretched on a magnificent tiger-skin. Presently she arose, and, taking up an amphora, danced languidly and gracefully round the statue of a cymbal-player which stood in the midst of the green, while unseen flutes and violins made music from within the thicket. Her pretty glidings ended, she lay down again; the bushes rustled, and a sylphide bounded on to the grass, there to go through one of Pavlova's lightest dances for our delight, a green thought in a green shade. So, refreshed in spirit by the movements of these nymphs, we wandered to an impenetrably shaded terrace where the flavour of fruit sat upon its thousand thrones, and wondrous beverages that might have been concocted for one of Theodora's evenings at Belmont, invited us to pour them into icy goblets, to be touched by beautiful lips. We thought of that lady's vision of the "Good time coming," when all banquets would be refined into "only fruit on a green bank with music," for the distant strains of the flutes and violins followed us to where the cooling fountains played.

It had all been very simple, yet it was a very perfect entertainment. Bilitis and the Sylph were students only; they will never, perhaps, dance as elegantly as Mmes. Will and Karsavina, but we are not sure that we did not receive as much pure pleasure from their innocent efforts in the open air as we have received from the ballet itself, enjoyed at Covent Garden as far as it is possible to enjoy anything when one is sitting in an oven. We quitted the groves and the river more than ever convinced that we are right in maintaining that music and dancing can be better appreciated (in hot weather at all events) when they are enjoyed in garden, wood, or park.

For a brief fortnight, until Queen's Hall begins its beneficent weeks of "Promenade Concerts" (for beneficent they are, though given indoors), the only music offered us is that made by the bands in the parks, and it is music by no means to be despised, especially when it is an evening performance. Heard from a discreet distance, the Hyde Park Band soothed our parched spirit the other evening much more than Massenet's opera "Thais" had done at Covent Garden. It is hard to understand why the directors should have selected that feeble, joyless opera; why they thought that it might succeed in pleasing London, when even Manon, played by such an artist as Miss Mary Garden, failed here as it did a few years since. We have heard "Thais" in France, and Italy, and Austria, and have only met one person who liked it. The dull, insipid music might be endured for the sake of seeing so witching a performance as that of Miss Garden's "Thais," but at Covent Garden the part was essayed by Mme. Edvina, an excellent singer whose powers as an actress are only moderate. Now if Thais cannot by her charm make Athanaëls of all the audience, there is no hope for the opera—its reason for existence is gone. But what a fine subject for an opera it is! Anatole France was magician enough to give life and glow to the old legend of the Thebaids: and though we believe the truth is that the monk (who was no lusty neophyte, but an old Anthony with one foot in the grave) converted Thais from her wicked ways by the simple expedient of locking her up in a cell and starving her into repentance, M. France's version is much more interesting, and in stronger hands than those of Massenet it might have inspired some noble music.

But if the Opera Syndicate has miscalculated the effect of "Thais," it has made up for it by permitting the Russians to show us their wonderful "Scheherazade," which some good judges regard as the very flower and crown of the art of St. Petersburg. We cannot help complaining, however, that Covent Garden Theatre (even were the weather more temperate) is not a place where "Scheherazade" can be fully appreciated unless the spectator is fortunate enough to have a front seat in one of the best boxes, or at least be in the front row of the stalls. It is absolutely of the first importance that one should see all the movements and the groupings of "Scheherazade" without let or hindrance. But the stalls at Covent Garden being on the same level, one can only see parts of the stage, never all of it at once, owing to the eager heads and shoulders in front. From the balcony and the amphitheatre stalls a complete view of the stage is certainly possible, but owing to the great size of the theatre the dancers, as seen from those parts of the house, look no more than marionettes. The theatre at Monte Carlo is the best known to the writer in which to appreciate "Scheherazade." Of course the stage is not so large, but one can see it all, and that is the great point. M. Rimsky-Korsakov's music to "Scheherazade" is both brilliant and moving, and the Covent Garden orchestra does not play it badly, but it might play it a good deal better.

LOST KINGDOMS OF THE SEA

THERE is fascination in looking across a waste of waters as we try in imagination to recreate old lands which lie engulfed beneath. Unconsciously such a scene typifies kingdoms and dynasties which have gone under. We are reminded of the vast hordes of extinct forms of life which "have had their day and ceased to be." Could some traveller but hap upon an unexplored continent where the colossal brutes of the Jurassic Period still roamed his experience would be worth thousands of miles of "personally conducted" travel in those lands in which men's engrossing ideal is but to copy conditions grown commonplace elsewhere. One walks through a picture-gallery wherein is work done by artists of some particular school—men whose art is standardised. In an obscure corner hangs a tiny canvas from whence the soul of the painter looks forth fearlessly on those who have eyes to see. That little scrap of autobiography, past which the stream of average men and women flows unheeding, holds us like a magnet. "There was a ship," says the artist. His poem in colour whispers in our ear—"The place is haunted." We feel the conviction that beneath phenomena abide those spiritual forces in which all outward shows live and have their being.

Could we thus repeople the scenes of our imaginary continent with the vast brutes who had half-forgotten to be reptiles and not yet learnt to be birds, we should wander in a dreamland Zoo, strange and uncouth perhaps, but still subject to the physical conditions of to-day. On such an earth, if the fauna and flora belonged to a region of nightmare, the soil and the sky, and day and night, and the hosts of Heaven would be familiar objects to us. Was all that intolerably drawn-out drama of evolution, were those hecatombs of living creatures pacing in a "seeming-random" procession to violent death, merely designed as a curtain-raiser to usher in the advent of Man? By infinite gradation he was destined to escape from his brutal surroundings, to climb with halting feet the slow ascent, gaining at each step nimbler intellect and keener conscience. From uplands of his existence he would be free "to look before and after," to store past records, to predict the flux of things to come. "Sufferance was the badge of all his tribe."

Thoughts like these flow in upon the man who broods and muses on the lost kingdoms of the sea. Let him start with the severance of Great Britain from the Continent as accomplished, and there still remain the sunken lands of the North Sea, which we now call the Dogger Bank, the legend-shrouded land of Atlantis, and, on the near horizon, the drowned "Park" of Selsea, the reefs and rock-strewn gulfs which lie around the Channel Islands.

St. Brandan, so they say, sailed away from a fierce world, peopled with wild men, to the blessed island of Atlantis, which lay dreaming before his strife-worn eyes in the lap of the sunset. There the birds and the fishes flocked to listen to him, and the human drama faded from his vision and his thoughts. Ill for St. Brandan, for he to whom the human interest ceases to appeal ceases to be human, and begins to slip back into the brute. But to leave behind the clamour and nonsense-noises of the world, and, in converse with choice spirits, to rediscover forgotten lore, is surely to live a new existence.

Atlantis, embalmed in the works of Plato and other classical writers, has been generally held to be mere historical mirage. The grandfather of Critias had heard from Solon, who in turn had it from the Egyptian priests at Sais, who again repeated ancient history, how a vast continent once lay beyond the Pillars of Hercules. The Mediterranean Sea was but the inner basin of a land-locked ocean, round the shores of which flourished the vast empire of Atlantis. Egypt and Hellas, so the story went, waged successful war against this swaggering empire of the West. Then came a world-shaking earthquake, and Atlantis and its warrior race sank beneath the salt waves of the great ocean which men now call the Atlantic. Is not this a parable which our modern "Admiral of the Atlantic" might to advantage take to heart and ponder?

Atlantis may be myth, but the engulfing of the "Park" over which the Selsea fishermen now catch lobsters is historic. The waters closed over it only some 400 years ago. England, which has already see-sawed up and down so often, may yet re-emerge her tracts of shallow subsidence. The shell of the earth holds in check the fierce throes of her inner forces. Let them give way but a few feet and we should see the lost lands back again. On that wrecked seabed at Selsea lies the bell of old Bosham church; in punishment for carrying off this bell the Danish rovers were supposed to have suffered shipwreck. Poetic justice was thus done, and the story rounded off to fit in with the equities of things. The fisher-folk will tell you that its warning note may be heard on still nights even at the present time.

When the receding tide leaves them bare, a wilderness of rocks clustering to the west of Cap de la Hague is revealed, and even to the tyro in geological evolution this plateau has been obviously an age-long battlefield of Titanic forces. How did that fretwork of reef and shoal, pinnacled and sculptured by the ceaseless play of "roosts" and races, torn by the tremendous currents which for ever ebb and flow about it, first come into being? That the embroidered fringe of the mainland was once linked to it is obvious; in fact, a mediæval chart shows a sweep in the coast line jutting out into what are now the islands. Perhaps the ancient artist sketched a scene which existed but in his own mind's eye. We want a new word to describe the man who is the complement of the prophet—the fore-speaker. Such an one—he who speaks of days and scenes that are no more—would imagine in his backward glance Great Britain and Ireland linked to the Continent of Europe, and a huge—sometime tropical but now semi-arctic—river, gathering to itself the overflow of inland waters, and sluggishly pouring from the neighbourhood of the Solent of to-day to the embouchure of the Seine, thence to the basin where Paris lies, and so into the ocean. That was a condition of things which persisted for untold æons; and then the shadow of change crept on. Owing to the melting of part of the ice-cap of Northern Europe the escaping waters, for a while penned in the upper reaches of the North Sea estuary, burst their bounds. By them the chalk dam which lay between Dover and Calais was breached, and the eroding torrent ploughed its way westward. Under the stress of that force the English Channel came into being, and thus also, after passing Cap de la Hague, by the action of the gigantic whirlpool so created, the Bay of Cancale was carved out and the superficies of the land area to the north of it torn away, our Channel Islands and their rocky frontiers being left to tell the tale. How terrific must have been that whirlpool force is evidenced by the fact that in St. Malo Bay to-day the tidal rise is over 50ft. Truly the cutting-tool of the whirlpool current bit deep.

About land which the sea has partially swallowed up eternally flits the seamew of Romance. Each jutting frieze and bastion headland which dreams over the waste of waters has some legend to tell or quaint name to recall. The human inhabitants of the rocky islets are a race apart. On every few yards along the coast-line of Sark, for instance, he who has ears to hear may listen to the story of days that are no more. Who that loves that little island, its history and associations, but will hail "the light that never was on sea or land" stealing across its waters of Mediterranean blue and around its "chapel of the gulls"? In its hardy and close-grained Norman tillers of the land and toilers of the sea he will meet the descendants of the Norse rovers. Feudalism walks like a mummy restored to life about its ferny lanes and rock-bound ramparts, up and down its coombes and dells. The blue-eyed Normans who inhabit there have the blend of independence and repression which marks the meeting of the old world and the new. Even the Hanoverian rat has never gained a foothold on the island; the British black rat still holds the field. The Seigneur is sovereign lord, with rights and privileges which go back to days before the Conquest. The island has two Houses of Parliament. These meet under the presidency of the Seigneur in a building, in size perhaps 30ft. by 20ft., which also serves as school-room. Their discussions turn mainly on such questions as whether the harbour buoy shall be repainted, or if some derelict boat or cask is rightly the property of the Seigneur, under the law of "flotsam, jetsam, and lagan." The islanders have no "constitutional crisis" foisted upon them. Happy islanders!

HOMeward BOUND: A NEW ZEALAND SKETCH

By W. H. KOEBEL

THE last song has been sung, and the final trick has been taken on the green-covered table, where the cards now lie in a heap. The lamps glow softly on the flowers, the pictures on the wall, the deep carpets, and the thousand and one objects that make a really pleasant room out of four wide walls. Through the open French windows come the scent of verbena and orange-blossom, and the mingled odours of a hundred other flowers.

It is time to say good-night.

The wide verandah is in part lit up from within, in part lost in deep shadow. Where the beams of light strike upon the supporting posts hang great clusters and festoons of roses, their blossoms pricked out in tender brilliance from the inky blackness of their background. There are other flowers beyond that, caught up in some chance shaft of illumination, seem to float in mid-air, stars of passion-flower and clematis, and the hazy wreaths of the jasmine.

Beyond the verandah and out into the unbroken darkness. The way is through an invisible garden that yet sends its messages across the night. Soft branches stretch out their sprays of leaf and blossom, each giving up its own odour as it fans the passer-by. Now and again sounds the rustle of heavier leaves, and the cool, silky body of a weighty magnolia bud bumps against the shoulder of the intruder.

A blind man's holiday, this! Here is the gate by the feel of it, and here is the wooden bar that slides back with a rattling of timber. Presently the feet are treading upon turf; the scent of the blossoms has grown fainter, and the airs blow in free and unimpeded breaths. This is the paddock, sure enough. Somewhere quite near by are the slip-rails in which wait the horses. Here they are, found by the touch rather than by the eye, and by the same sense it becomes clear that they are as empty as charity!

The poles that guarded the entrance are on the ground. Thrown into their sockets with a censurably impatient haste, they have been shaken from their places by the restless steeds. As for the latter, they are somewhere in the paddock, somewhere in the midst of the dense velvet black of the night. What a situation! Not a star in the sky! The clouds must have rolled up in volumes, which means that there is rain to come.

From where a faint light shines somewhere at the back of the invisible tree comes a distant hail. "All right?" There is a moment's hesitation out here in the paddock. But why should those within be made to share the discomfort of a mistake of others? The onus of rectifying our own carelessness lies with us alone. And so the call goes back: "All right! Good night!" It is not true. But the lie is pardonable.

I have never been in a collision on the high seas. But the abrupt transition from the broad decks and halls, the electric light, and the music to the small open boat tossing alone in the night is surely one of the most dramatic in life. Our case just now is mainly farcical, but it has an element or two in common with one of those great tragedies of the waves. A rider without his horse on a night such as this is as helpless as any shipwrecked mariner. Five minutes ago we were in a brilliant place of light, where the dresses of the ladies rustled graciously to and fro, and where the perfume of the after-dinner coffee rose, giving out a delightful sense of an assured and eternal comfort. Now we are in the outer darkness: I should say we must have travelled a thousand miles since then!

And now for the horses. Thank heaven that the paddock is a miniature one that can boast no more than a couple of acres! Across the night comes a welcome sound—the rasping of torn grass as the blades are snapped off by the massive teeth. If ever you went with care, grope cautiously in the direction of the noise! Only a few paces, and the sound has ceased. Two heads have been raised, and two pairs of ears are pricked acutely forward. This you know as well as though your eyes had pierced the night and had seen it for themselves. A step or two more is ventured in the agonising certainty of what is to come. There it is! A rumbling and thudding of hoofs that passes close to the left, and dies away to the rear. Then, very faintly now, the cropping of grass sounds again.

There is nothing for it but to turn about and to follow the champing music. The result is the same as before. If there was ever an audible and invisible will-o'-the-wisp it is present here, materialised in the horses' hoofs. Futility is annoying at the best of times: at midnight the state becomes unbearable. How infinitely irritating, moreover, is the reflection that the homeward way is not to be won until those elusive thuddings have been brought into subjection directly beneath one's own person!

The black of the sky above is tinged by a faint, shadowy pool of light. As the pool spreads into a small, starry lake, the world near by seems to roll forward from out of space. The dark silhouettes of the trees swell out of a sudden against the horizon; the level stretch of the paddock leaps upward from the depths, and there in the corner are the dim forms of two horses. A few moments later the reins rest securely in the hand. Never was an object more comfortable to the touch than this leather! A grasp of the mane, a pleasant creak from the saddle—and the night may do its worst!

The sky, indeed, is already repenting its moment of generosity. As the horses pass through the paddock-gate the twinkling lake above shrinks into nothingness, blotted out by an advancing curtain of black. When the outlines of the trees have died away in sympathy, the faint paint of light no longer gleams from their rear. The hospitable station is asleep. The ever-vigilant dogs alone suspect the presence of belated guests. As the horses' hoofs leave the turf to strike upon the bare soil of the track, there is a distant rattle of chains and a chorus of protesting barks—a crude godspeed, but a welcome one, since it heralds the start on the homeward way.

Our part is done with. All that is necessary now is to keep in sociable touch with the horses' mouths, and they will do the rest. Not once do they hesitate, although from time to time they come to an abrupt halt in the midst of their walk or canter. Then you may stretch out your hand with certainty and feel for the bars of a gate. And then, when you have latched it again with the dutiful care that is part of the sheep-farmer's daily creed, you may go thudding onwards once more along the invisible track.

There are times when, if your mood chanced to be in tune for such a feat of the imagination, you might imagine that you were careering along a level turnpike road set between the hedges of England. In which case the land will not permit the mental picture for long. To the front sounds the ripple of water, musical and clear, through the still air. The movements of the horse have grown cautious and tentative. He has gathered himself together for an effort, and the next moment one is sinking in a sheer downward glide to the accompaniment of the grinding and rattle of loose earth and stones. With a lurch and a jerk the sensation of falling ends. The noises of the descent have ceased; we have shot down the face of the river bank.

Nothing is audible now but the rush of the waters. The ripple has swollen of a sudden to a deep cascade of sound that overwhelms the ear with its fullness, and that brings with it a strange sensation of giddiness. As to the horse, his nerves are on the rack. If you would remain dryshod draw up your feet as he paws the water and plunges into the invisible stream with the staccato leaps of the anxious-minded.

The deep swirling of the passage has given way to a tumultuous splashing that covers the face and body of the rider with spray. Then the great frame of the steed halts to crouch for a spring. One knows full well what he is demanding on the part of his rider—a hand in the mane, and the body drawn high up in the stirrups from the saddle. Now he is springing upwards in a paroxysm of bounds, and in a moment he is pacing the level ground, while the song of the river dies away to the rear.

When the pace has settled down once more to a steady canter you may do one of various things. You may converse with the companion who is thudding along sometimes at your side, at others elsewhere, according as the way is broad or narrow; you may yield to the drowsy influence of the night and fall into the guarded doze of the man in the saddle: or, again, it is just possible that you may become reflective, and may think of many matters.

You may wonder, for instance, why you are ploughing onwards through the lonely night when all other folk are in bed. There is another ford ahead, and half a dozen more miles ere the journey will be done. It has been a fairly long ride this, in search of—what? A meal, coffee, cards, a little music, a glimpse of tasteful rooms, and the sound of women's voices! Was it worth the trouble? Elsewhere, scarcely, perhaps; but here in the wide airs of the bush there is room for neither cynicism nor doubt. These visits are vital things; periodical rubbings and furbishings that keep bright the machinery of the mental horizon. Were the distance twenty miles—

The horse shies violently and plunges to the left as a sudden scurry and a rapid trampling sounds from the neighbourhood of his hoofs. It is evident that some sheep sleeping by the side of the track have aroused themselves only just in time. They are bolting away with a flurry that resembles to the ear the rising of a covey of pheasants. Steady now! So much for philosophy in the saddle! The business of the hour is to get home.

All rides have an end. One had almost forgotten that in the song of the beating hoofs that bade fair to go on for ever. Beneath its influence one had grown drowsy again, when the noise of distant barkings rings out from the front. As the sound is approached it swells to a fierce chorus of threats hurled across the gloom. Then of a sudden the angry notes turn to joyous canine bays of welcome. The homestead is at hand.

SOPHOCLES IN RHYME*

THERE is a kind of poetry which demands rhyme, even as there is a kind of poetry to which rhyme is in the nature of an insult. It is impossible, for example, to imagine Dryden without rhyme. On the other hand, it is impossible to imagine "Paradise Lost" in rhyme—even so dogmatic an enthusiast for the rhymed couplet as Johnson had to confess that his imagination failed to conceive it other than it was. To Dryden the clipping sounds at the end of the line were necessary to swell out his somewhat slender music, and to give form and coherence to his meaning. It may perhaps justly be said that the matter of poetry despises the pretty adjuncts of verse, being its own sufficiency, whereas the matter of prose can only be given the appearance of poetry when it is duly decked out with the superficial appearances of that high rhythm that great poetry must needs choose to speak through. However that be, Euripides not only takes his proper stride in the habiliments of English rhyming couplets; he makes his gestures so aptly in them that they seem to be his natural vesture. It is impossible to say why; these are things that the instinct divines, and must needs trust. There is a fitness in a rhymed "Medea" that is past all thought. Similarly there is an unfitness in a rhymed Sophocles that almost defies explanation. It violates immaculateness of conception, even as the attempt to conjure up a "Paradise Lost" in French rhymed Alexandrines.

Yet it is worth explanation. To bring it home to an English thought one would need to adduce English examples, and unfortunately there is nothing distinctively Sophoclean in English literature. King Lear, for example, is Aeschylean.

* Oedipus, King of Thebes. By Sophocles. Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with Explanatory Notes, by Gilbert Murray. (George Allen. 2s. net.)

Aeschylus, in rugged splendour of soul, reached sometimes almost over to the Gothic, whereas Sophocles is always marmoreal. Aeschylus was always somewhat of an anomaly, while Sophocles was always the perfect exemplar. The Dionysean broke through Aeschylus with its vintage revelry and high suggestion; while with Sophocles the Apollyan was ever supreme, though it reached heights in him it has never aspired to elsewhere. Despite this fault, however, imagine "King Lear" in rhyme! Or, better still—for we have this very process already exemplified in English—read the splendour of "Antony and Cleopatra" in Shakespeare and then compare the same subject in Dryden.

It may be that the difficulty is somewhat deeper than this. It may be that the difficulty is in Professor Murray himself, not less than in the manner of verse. Reading his verse carefully over, one is surprised to note how unsure he is on his metrical feet. This is marked over and over again in his translations of Euripides. Take a passage chosen quite at random from his translation of the "Medea":

When first I stood in Corinth, clogged with ill
From many a desperate mischance, what bliss
Could I have dreamed of like to this,
To wed with a king's daughter, I exiled
And beggared?

Imagine it without the supports that the clipping rhymes give to its faulty sense of form! And then conceive how superbly Milton hews out his paragraphs of music to progress forward with! In other words, it would appear that Professor Gilbert Murray had to brace Sophocles down to his measure by the artificialities of verse. He had to put Sophocles cheek by jowl with Euripides before he could undertake his rendering. As an example of this one may recall with what terrible majesty Oedipus receives the stupendous revelation that he is indeed the son of his own wife, the murderer of his own father, and the bringer of trouble on Corinth, and how through all mischances and obstructing human agencies the prophecies are working themselves out for his downfall with almost fiendish malignity. The majesty in it is knit to terror. But this certainly fails to appear in the following passage:—

Enough!
And will come true . . . Thou Light, never again
May I behold thee, I in the eyes of men
Made naked, how from sin my being grew,
In sin I wedded and in sin I slew.

It totally fails to convey the requisite majesty. Yet, though it is a matter to be perceived, not to be explained, lying past the logical consciousness, some of the causes of its failure can be made patent. For example, no better indictment of rhyme for Sophocles could be more damaging than the "jingling round of like endings" in the last two lines; and Milton's other charge that "Rime" is in "invention" to "set off . . . lame Meeter" is justified by the metrical insecurity of the whole passage. So also the inversion in the second line, and the vowel elision in the third line, tend to destroy that simplicity that is essential to all dignity, but particularly to the dignity of pain. Compare it with:

I pray you, give me leave to go from hence;
I am not well: send the deed after me,
And I will sign it.

The whole question raises problems that one would much like to discuss, since they deal with the vital matter of verse-form, but several things forbid. Space forbids, occasion forbids, and Professor Gilbert Murray himself forbids. To find fault with a work is not necessarily to decry it. If he has sought to strap and harness Sophocles, Sophocles is yet often himself breaking away these unnatural fetters and striding forth into the light of the sun. There are also excellences in which Dr. Murray lends the great tragedian music of a later day than his, such as in the choros that succeeds the exit of Oedipus in the passage criticised :

Nothingness, nothingness,
Ye Children of Man, and less
I count you, waking or dreaming!
And none among mortals, none,
Seeking to live, hath won
More than to seem, and to cease
Again from his seeming.

While ever before mine eyes
One fate, one ensample, lies;
Thine, thine, O Oedipus, sore
Of God oppressèd—
What thing that is human more
Dare I call blessèd ?

For all that it owes something of its music to Swinburne, this is quite excellent. It is also in the fit tragic vein.

Moreover, this very suggestion of debt awakes a criticism. If there was one thing Swinburne excelled in more than another, it was speed in verse. In a sense he very largely introduced it to English verse; but since he introduced it into verse, and since he was the latest of the great poets, this speed has come to usurp all the virtues. Professor Murray endeavours to get speed into his translation, notwithstanding the fact that speed and dignity are but rarely compatible. It is an incidental fact that we sadly need a slower, mightier movement in all modern English verse, but such a movement is absolutely essential to a right rendering of Sophocles. Many of the passages in the present translation read almost as if they had been made in a violent hurry to catch a train. This is symptomatic of the time, truly enough; but it is a considerable matter for praise that Sophocles is not symptomatic of the time. A half-hour's contemplation before the bust of the mighty dramatist surely would have set this right.

Such criticisms are necessary. Professor Murray himself, in his very self-denying ordinance of translation, asks attention not for himself but for his author. In other words, he asks us to complain if he should fail to convey to us all that his author is. He does fail in this, but he nevertheless has given us what we have not had hitherto, and that is a readable translation of "Oedipus." Other renderings, in seeking to give us the might and marmoreal power of the original, have given us merely ponderousness—a likeness much unlike! So that if the vivacity of the present rendering fails to give us the severe and terrible might, it has at least that inalienable property of all vivacity, companionableness, and charm, both qualities that win to affection. And for this much we render our very substantial thanks. It would be very splendid to see "Oedipus" acted.

STREET-ORGANS

It is very true, as Mr. Chesterton must have remarked somewhere, that the cult of simplicity is one of the most complex inventions of civilisation. To eat nuts in a meadow when you can eat a beef-steak in a restaurant is neither simple nor primitive; it is merely perverse, in the same way that the art of Gauguin is perverse. A shepherd-boy piping to his flock in Arcady and a poet playing the penny whistle in a Soho garret may make the same kind of noise; but whereas the shepherd-boy knows no better, the poet has to pretend that he knows no better. So I reject scornfully the support of those amateurs who profess to like street-organs because they are the direct descendants of the itinerant ballad-singers of the romantic past; or because they represent the simple musical tastes of the majority to-day. I refuse to believe that in appreciating the sound of the complex modern instruments dragged across London by Cockneys disguised as Italians, the soul of the primitive man who lurks in some dim oubliette of everybody's consciousness is in any way comforted. I should imagine that that poor prisoner, if civilisation's cruelty has not deprived him of the faculty of hearing, is best pleased by such barbaric music as the howling of the wind or the sound of railway-engines suffering in the night; and indeed every one must have noticed that sometimes certain sounds unmusical in themselves can arouse the same emotions as the greatest music.

But it is not on this score that street-organs escape our condemnation; their music has certain defects that even distance cannot diminish, and they invariably give us the impression of a man speaking through his nose in a high-pitched voice, without ever pausing to take breath. If, in spite of this, we have a kindness for them, it is because of their association with the gladdest moments of childhood. To the adult ear they bring only desolation and distraction, but to the children the organ-man, with his curly black hair and his glittering earrings seems to be trailing clouds of glory. For them the barrel-organ combines the merits of Wagner, Beethoven, Strauss, and Debussy, and Orpheus would have to imitate its eloquent strains on his lute if he wished to captivate the hearts of London children.

When I was a child the piano-organ and that terrible variant that reproduces the characteristic stutter of the mandoline with deadly fidelity were hardly dreamed of, but the ordinary barrel-organ and the prehistoric hurdy-gurdy, whose quavering notes suggested senile decay, satisfied our natural craving for melody. It is true that they did not make so much noise as the modern instruments, but in revenge they were almost invariably accompanied by a monkey in a little red coat or a performing bear. I always had a secret desire to turn the handle of the organ myself; and when—too late in life to enjoy the full savour of the feat—I persuaded a wandering musician to let me make the experiment, I was surprised to find that it is not so easy as it looks to turn the handle without jerking it, and that the arm of the amateur is weary long before the repertoire of the organ is exhausted. It is told of Mascagni that he once taught an organ-man how to play his notorious Intermezzo to the fullest effect, but I fancy that in professional circles the story would be discredited, for the arm of the practised musician acquires by force of habit a uniform rate of revolution, and in endeavouring to modify that rate he would lose all control over his instrument.

Personally, I do not like hearing excerpts from Italian opera on the street-organs, because that is not the kind of music that children can dance to, and it is, after all, in supplying an orchestra for the ball-room of the street that they best justify their existence. The spectacle of little ragged children dancing to the music of the organ is the prettiest and merriest and saddest thing in the world. In France and Belgium they waltz; in England they have invented a curious compound of the reel, the gavotte, and the cakewalk. The best dancers in London are always little Jewesses, and it is worth anybody's while to go to White-chapel at midday to see Myriam dancing on the cobbles of Stoney-lane. There is not, as I once thought, a thwarted enchanter shut up inside street-organs, who cries out when the handle turns in the small of his back. But why is it that I feel instinctively that magicians have drooping moustaches and insinuating smiles, if it is not that my mind as a child founded its conception of magicians on itinerant musicians? And they weave powerful spells, strong enough to make these poor little atomies forget their birthright of want, and foot it like princesses. Children approach their amusements with a gravity beside which the work of a man's life seems deplorably flippant. A baby toddling round a band-stand is a far more impressive sight than a grown man circumnavigating the world, and children do not smile when they dance. All the laughter is in their feet.

When from time to time "brain-workers" write to the newspapers to suggest that street-musicians should be suppressed, I feel that the hour has almost come to start a movement in favour of Votes for Children. It is disgraceful, ladies and gentlemen, that this important section of the community, on whom the whole future of the nation depends, should have no voice in the forming of the nation's laws! This question of street-organs cannot be solved by banishing them to the slums without depriving many children of a legitimate pleasure. For, sub rosa, the children of Park-lane—if there are any children in Park-lane—and even the children of brain-workers, appreciate the music of street-organs quite as much as their humble contemporaries. While father buries his head under the sofa-cushions and composes furious letters to the Times in that stuffy hermitage, little noses are pressed against the window-pane, little hands applaud and little feet beat time on the nursery floor upstairs. This is one of those situations where it is permissible to sympathise with all parties, and unless father can achieve an almost inhuman spirit of tolerance I see no satisfactory solution.

For children must have music. They must have tunes to think to and laugh to and live to. Funeral marches to the grave are all very well for the elderly and disillusioned, but youth must tread a more lively measure. And this music should come like the sunshine in winter, surprisingly, at no fixed hour, as though it were a natural consequence of life. One of the gladdest things about the organ-man in our childhood was the unexpectedness of his coming. Life would be dragging a little in schoolroom circles, when suddenly we would hear the organ clearing its throat as it were; we would all run to the window to wave our hands to the smiling musician, and shout affectionate messages to his intelligent monkey, who caught our pennies in his little pointed cap. In those days we had all made up our minds that when we grew up we would have an organ and a monkey of our own. I think it is rather a pity that with age we forget these lofty resolutions of our childhood. I have formed a conception of the ideal street-organist that would only be fulfilled by some one who had realised the romance of that calling in their youth.

How often, when the children have been happiest and the dance has been at its gayest, I have seen the organ-man fold music's wings and move on to another pitch in search of pennies! I should like to think that it is a revolt against this degraded commercialism that inspires the protests of the critics of street-music. The itinerant musician who believed in art for art's sake would never move on so long as he had an appreciative audience; and sometimes, though I am afraid this would be the last straw to the brain-workers, he would arrive at two o'clock in the morning, and the children, roused from their sleep, would hear Pan piping to his moon-lit flocks, and would believe that they were still in the pleasant country of dreams.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

TOKYO

PSYCHOLOGICALLY speaking, the city of Tokyo, like the Japanese civilisation, which is often unmoral, if not immoral, is a wanton growth, not a true development from the inner force of impulse; its immensity in size, and perhaps in humanity too, is not the consciousness of sure development, but more or less in the nature of an accidental phenomenon.

It appeared like a mushroom without any particular reason; the wonder is that it has stayed, and grown bigger and bigger. It fairly well represents the Japanese mind in its incapacity for spiritual concentration; if it has any charm (it has, in fact, many and many charms, often fantastic and always bewildering) it should lie in its ignoring of definite purpose, or its utter lack of purpose. It is almost too free to be called democratic; it has no discrimination. (My friend critic, that unique N. Y., scorns Tokyo as the human beehive of mobbishness.) Many millions of Japanese, dark in skin, short in stature, live here looking as if the increasing summer clouds had fallen on the ground, now parting and anon gathering again with a sort of mystery of Oriental fatalism; the first and last impression is a weariness not altogether unpleasant, ghostly at the beginning and tantalisingly human afterward. That weariness originates in the confusion, physical and spiritual, to speak symbolically, the strange mess of red, blue, yellow, green, and what not. (Fame be eternal of Utamaro, Hokusai, and Hiroshige, those colour magicians of art, the true exponents of Japanese life!)

This Tokyo was at the first the town of samurai of two swords, of mind more bent on learning how to die than how to live, proper to say, founded by Iyeyasu Tokugawa, the mighty prince of the Tokugawa feudalism, four hundred years ago, whose want of artistic education made it quite natural for him not to see the poetical side of city-building; he allowed every whim and imagination of the people to take their own free course. This neglect, more fortunate than otherwise, produced a great variety in colour and humanity that system and wisdom never could create, that were at once paradoxical, but highly interesting. It is for ever the man's city, if we can call Kyoto the city of women for the sake of comparison; in consequence, it is apt to be naked, bizarre, and often arrogant, but there is no other city like Tokyo, which is honest and simple. As a piece of art the city is sadly unfinished; in its unfinishedness we feel a charm, as I said before, the charm of weariness that rather breaks, in spite of itself, an artistic unity. Consciousness of perfection is unknown to the city; while it is quick and bright on the one hand, it is, on the other, verily lazy and uncivilised, like the Japanese temperament itself. I can count, on the spot, many a street which raises an apologetic look, as if they did not approve their own existence even themselves; it is quite natural, I say, as it is the city as a whole, without a definite purpose.

I think that "New Japan" (what a skeptic, shallow sound it has!) has little to do with the real Japan of human beauty, because it was created largely by the advertisement, for which we paid the most exorbitant price to get the mere name of that; in short, we bought it with ready cash. Therefore it is no wonder that it is so perfectly strange to many of us. I hear a whisper too often at some street corner: "Is it really our Japan?" I know that old, true Japan, every inch of it, was the very handiwork of the people in general, while "New Japan," "the rising country first class in the world," as it was proudly written by a newspaper man, as I can imagine, who wears a single eyeglass straight from London, was created by a few hundred men, we might say; the Westerners born in Japan, whose hopeless ignorance of the old civilisation of their old country, strange to say, helped them up to fill the highest place in the public estimate. They were almost reckless to bring everything from abroad, good or bad; we did not mind trying it under one condition, that we might change it for another if it was not fitting. We discovered profitably Shakespeare and even Ibsen lately; and it seems to me that a copy, doubtless, of the American edition of "How to Build a City" fell one day in the hands of the Mayor of Tokyo, who proclaimed in the voice of a prophet that the city should be rebuilt in the very fashion nobody, at least in the Orient, ever dreamed. Figuratively speaking, we were changing our kimono of old brocade, precious with tradition, for a plain sack-coat, perhaps made in Chicago. The municipality has been for the last two or three years spending an enormous amount of money for the sudden enlarging of the streets, and the hasty building of houses of brick or stone, of white or red; but I wonder why our Japanese city should be one and the same with that of the West. And again I wonder if it was her weakness or strength that she accepted the foreign things so easily. It makes me reflect what right she has, however, to object to the foreign invasion, as she had no definite purpose as a city originally. And is it the only way to put the Western morality in the old heart of the city? Can she ever become really civilised?

WE once heard a young lady make a gentle little speech against Woman's Suffrage. "Let us keep to the drawing-room of life," she said. The Royal Society of Miniature Painters does that, and a certain number of its members have succeeded in making the drawing-room very attractive, and that no doubt is just what is intended, and what the miniatures themselves will do when they are in the Sheraton cabinets, to which they already seem to belong. The artists have said no more than their sisters would be likely to say in their social life; it is all very orderly and smooth and polite. But there are flashes of individuality here and there. There are, for instance, Miss Emily Gertrude Thomson's "Madame Vera Figner," Mr. Edwin Ernest Morgan's "Miss Macnamara" and "Mlle. Sorel," Mr. S. Arthur Lindsey's "Miss E. S. Jacob," Miss Edith Grace Wolfe's "Le Bien-Aimé," and Miss Maud M. Wear's "Blue Veil." But a drawing-room may be a very pleasant place, and there is surely life in such a one as will welcome Mme. G. Debillemont Chardon's "Mère Mélie," Miss Bess Norriss's woman and baby—called "Bon jour"—and the beautiful little bronzes and plasters by Miss Phoebe Stahler, of which we have spoken before.

SOME MODERN ETCHINGS

MESSRS. DOWDESWELL are exhibiting at their Gallery in Bond Street an exceptionally interesting collection of modern etchings. There is some fine, strong work by the Hon. Walter James—always vastness and ruggedness and angry weather. There are the "Duddon Sands" of Mr. Oliver Hale, and Mr. Percy Robertson's "Plough"—both examples of free, fine work—and Mr. Albany E. Howarth's and Mr. Hamilton Mackenzie's strong, clear-cut impressions. There is also work by Mr. Francis Sidney Unwin, Mr. Randolph Schwabe, and Mr. Hedley Fitton. But among much that is interesting and in several cases really fine an etching by Mr. Ernest S. Lumsden—"The Pier"—remains one of the most exquisite things of its kind which we have seen. Equal to Whistler in delicacy and suggestion, in the management of values; and yet not like Whistler, but full of individual beauty.

WE have received a volume of excellent reproductions of the pictures of Johannes Bosboom and William Maris, issued by Messrs. Wallis and Son at the French Gallery, 120, Pall-mall. The art of Bosboom is not by any means familiar to Londoners, nor is Maris a very well-known name, but both painters are worth close study, and a more lengthy appreciation of their work will be found in THE ACADEMY for May 27th last. The prints are charming in their quality of line and clearness of tone; all Bosboom's lovely "interiors" come out well, and the landscapes of Maris are extraordinarily faithful to the originals.

By LANCELOT LAWTON

ABOVE ALL ISSUES

AT the present moment, when party feelings are passionately excited, it must be a source of deep pain to all serious-minded individuals who, looking beyond the narrow sphere of domestic strife, survey the world's affairs, that the country, in face of its enemies abroad, is split into petty, warring factions. The solemn and statesman-like words spoken by Mr. Lloyd George at the Mansion House as recently as last week have been drowned amid the vulgar din of political warfare. Lest in the columns of THE ACADEMY an opportunity should be lost of appreciating to the full their crucial significance, it would be as well here to reproduce the most striking passage:—

I can conceive of nothing (said Mr. Lloyd George) that could justify the disturbance of international goodwill except questions of the greatest national moment; but if a situation were to be forced upon us, in which peace could only be preserved by the surrender of the great and beneficent position which Britain has won by centuries of heroism and achievement, by allowing Britain to be treated, where her interests were vitally affected, as if she were of no account in the cabinet of nations, then I say emphatically that peace at that price would be a humiliation intolerable for a great country like ours to endure. National honour is no party question.

The weighty utterances of the Chancellor of the Exchequer reveal at once the gravity of the international situation. It is plain that they were addressed with a profound sense of responsibility to the statesmen of the Wilhelmstrasse; and that this fact is clearly recognised in Germany is evident from the laboured efforts of the semi-official Press in Berlin and Cologne to explain them away by declaring that they were merely in the nature of platitudinous expressions having no particular application to any single Power. In Paris, in St. Petersburg, and in Vienna the contrary view is held. For diplomatic reasons which are apparent, Germany is anxious to create the impression that under no circumstances would it be just to regard her in the light of a disturber of the world's peace. She wishes it to be accepted without question that her coup d'état in Morocco entitles her to some substantial compensation, and therefore professes to be at a complete loss to understand why Great Britain or any other Power should find in her conduct grounds for diplomatic warning.

No doubt can exist in the minds of astute observers of the international situation that Germany, with masterly deliberation, chose the moment for intruding herself into affairs with which she had no legitimate concern. Her motive was obviously to wreck irretrievably the Triple Entente. By the most perverted and dangerous of all processes of delusion, that of self-deception, she had led herself to believe that the memorable Potsdam tête-à-tête had actually resulted in the deflection of Russia. The French Ministry had just fallen, and the Berlin Government doubtless counted upon domestic chaos in France to assist its aims.

And finally the astute wire-pullers of the Wilhelmstrasse timed their coup to take place when the statesmen of Great Britain would also be preoccupied in a crisis at home. So far German machinations have been defeated all along the line. Instead of breaking up the Triple Entente, these machinations have produced an entirely opposite result. For at last an incident has occurred which has enabled the three Powers composing that eminently practical compact to declare in unequivocal terms that their interests throughout the world are common, and that, should occasion arise, they will be prepared in defence of those interests to draw the sword in common. In face of this bold and united front Germany has wisely paused to reflect. It is not sufficient, however, that the Powers of the Triple Entente should merely set forth in the language of diplomacy, no matter how strong its terms may be, that they are ready for eventualities even to the dread point of war. It is not sufficient that they should show that among themselves they are united. They must give unmistakable proof of determination. Viewed from this aspect all parties will be in agreement that the deeply significant words of Mr. Lloyd George are uttered at an opportune moment.

In the passage from his speech quoted above the concluding sentence has particular application to political conditions as they exist in Great Britain to-day. "National honour is no party question." If we continue to show to our foes abroad that we have lost that self-restraint which has ever been our pride, and with it much of that self-respect which is the real foundation of patriotism, then they will not be slow to take advantage of our declining greatness, and will seize upon the occasion to impose upon us a humiliation that will dim the history of our times, and will bring down upon our heads the curse of posterity. In a weekly article dealing with Foreign Affairs as they occur from week to week the writer is not concerned with the merits or otherwise of party issues. It is, however, clearly his conscientious obligation to point out—and here the warning may with equal benefit be addressed not to one but to all parties—that in view of the extreme gravity of the international situation a very serious responsibility rests upon those statesmen, and upon their followers, who are guilty of setting Britain against herself, instead of, as loyalty and duty should dictate, serving with disinterested motive and whole-hearted energy the cause of simple patriotism. Were it possible for the country to learn all that is known in the Chancellories of Europe with regard to the critical state of our diplomatic relations, then it would make its voice heard in no uncertain tones. It may without exaggeration be said that at no time in history were we nearer to a European conflagration than we are at present. Instead of showing in the face of our enemies, to use the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "that national honour is no party question," we are wilfully blinding ourselves to the realisation that our national honour is at stake.

From the bitter way in which we are rending ourselves a detached observer would imagine that we were an insular people of narrow limitations—in other words, islanders without Imperial responsibilities, without world-wide commerce, without the glorious heritage handed down from the founders of an Empire upon which it is our unceasing boast that the sun never sets. If ever there was a time when Great Britain should be true to herself, that time is now. Germany, as I have already said, has chosen a moment when the embarrassment of our own affairs has led her to believe that she could strike with success at the very foundations of our existence. She seeks to inflict upon us a humiliation that would kill our diplomatic prestige abroad; nay, more, she aims at a concrete gain in the form of territorial aggrandisement in a part of the world from which she will be able to cut the very threads of our strategic web. She will only be balked in her aggression when tangible evidences are forthcoming that the whole nation, irrespective of political differences, is determined that national honour shall be no party question. It is idle to say, it is in fact too late to say, that so soon as we are tested these evidences will not be lacking. The hour of the test is nigh. We have reached the crisis.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

At the time of writing the air race round Great Britain is still in progress, but sufficient has actually been accomplished to convince the most sceptical that aviation is destined to fulfil a part of vast importance in the future history of the world. That two men should cover a distance of nearly four hundred miles by air in seven hours, and accurately estimate almost to a minute the time of arrival at their destination, cannot fail to impress the least imaginative with a sense of the enormous potentialities of the newest form of locomotion. That the majority of the competing machines should have been disabled at an early stage of the contest is of little consequence. Nor is it of vital importance that many of the aviators have had to confess themselves beaten and unable to complete the course. The outstanding fact is that a distance of some hundreds of miles has been traversed with the precision, and with more than the speed, of an express train, and what has been done by one machine and one man can obviously be repeated. It is merely a question of getting the right type of machine and the right type of man, with the necessary experience on the part of the latter, and this is obviously a matter of time only. It is a little disappointing, of course, to find the British competitors so completely outclassed in the matter of skill by the French aviators; but it is to be remembered that the experience of the latter is much greater than that of the Englishmen, and evidently experience is of the first importance in the mastering of the science of aviation. And similarly with regard to the machines. One would have liked to see the British productions take a more prominent part in the contest; but this is also a matter which will be remedied at no distant date. It is only a few years since the efforts of the British motor manufacturers were regarded with amusement or contempt by the Continental makers; but to-day the British-made car is universally admitted to be second to none, and there is every reason to believe that history will repeat itself in the case of the aeroplane.

It is now definitely announced that motorists in France will not in future be restricted by any arbitrary speed-limit whatever, experience having "finally demonstrated that such restrictions cannot be enforced in practice, and only give rise to unjustifiable prosecutions and annoyance to motorists." Hitherto the general speed-limit in that country has been a fraction under nineteen miles an hour, but for a number of years there has been little attempt to enforce it, except in some of the remoter country districts, so that its removal from the statute-book does not possess anything like the importance that would attach to a similar step in this country. Broadly speaking, the only speed offence of which the motorist in France can now be convicted is that of driving at such a pace as to prevent him from keeping his car under perfect control—in other words, driving to the common danger. As might have been anticipated, this step on the part of the French authorities has led to an immediate revival of the agitation for the repeal of the speed-limit in this country, and there is little doubt that a determined and concerted effort will be made to secure the removal of what is unquestionably a source of perpetual irritation to the vast majority of motorists in this country. It cannot be denied that the fact of the French authorities, after a considerably longer experience of the motor-car and its problems than we possess, having finally and deliberately abandoned even the pretence of imposing an arbitrary speed-limit constitutes a powerful argument in support of the "no limit" advocates here. As a matter of fact it is not possible to enforce a speed-limit. In spite of the diversion of a considerable section of the police from their ordinary functions, and the infliction of multitudinous fines, there is probably not a single motorist who has not exceeded, and does not on occasion exceed, the limit; and so it will always be as long as the legal restriction exists. It is argued, and rightly, that speed in itself is not, or ought not to be, an offence, and that dangerous driving depends entirely upon the particular circumstances, whether the car be travelling at six miles or sixty miles an hour. In France, under the new regulations, any chauffeur convicted twice within a year for driving at an excessive speed will have his licence withdrawn or cancelled, and this course would no doubt be found efficacious if adopted over here.

A point of some interest and importance to the motoring community is dealt with in the R.A.C. official journal—namely, the question as to whether a motorist driving at the legal speed-limit of twenty miles an hour is justified in refusing to give way to a faster vehicle. Those who hold the affirmative view base their contention upon the argument that, by refusing to make way, they are preventing others from breaking the law. The pronouncement of the legal department of the R.A.C. is to the effect that, whilst a motorist might be within his rights in so doing, he would himself be committing the offence of wilful obstruction, the law taking no account of speed-limits in dealing with cases of obstruction of the free passage of the highway, whether committed by motorists or anybody else. This is a somewhat ambiguous decision, which may leave the motorist in some doubt as to what he can or cannot do if he wishes to keep strictly within his legal rights. It would seem a simpler thing to say that it is not the business of any private individual, motorist or otherwise, to prevent another from committing a technical infringement of the law if he chooses to do so. This is palpably the common-sense view of the matter, but, as many motorists have been in doubt as to whether they would have a right of action for obstruction in such circumstances, it is satisfactory to have an authoritative statement on the subject.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

As I write the whole City is suffering from an attack of nerves, and prices are tumbling in all directions. The scare began with what for Mr. Lloyd George must be considered an extremely moderate speech. Unfortunately, it caught the fancy of the French, and on Sunday the French Press began to scream with delight. This annoyed the German officials, who thought it necessary to counteract the Franco-British enthusiasm by the usual blustering articles. Thus a complete scare was created out of really nothing at all. Does any sane person imagine that the German bankers would

A NEW FACTOR IN MOTORING.

The best is generally good enough for most people; but generally most people are lamentably unsuccessful in getting the best. How, for example, may the motorist get the best tyre? It is the matter of moment to him; but only the costly experiment will answer the question satisfactorily.

If he could exhaustively test every tyre on the market until the best had been determined; if his years of experience and an expert knowledge of rubber and its preparation, had given him ideas for improvement which he could incorporate in that best tyre, and again exhaustively test until he was entirely satisfied with the results, he would be able to claim that he had the best. Is that not so?

Then we have the best tyre because that has been our method. With entire liberty of choice we made our selection, incorporated our ideas, entered into a binding contract with the manufacturers (a firm of the highest reputation and experience), and produced—the VICTOR TYRE. Indisputably the VICTOR TYRE is the best.

The VICTOR VEST continues its extraordinary successful career. The VICTOR VEST is a new foundation, and a new life, for any old cover. It prevents punctures and bursts, and enables the cover to be run to its last shred of tread. We give a written guarantee that it will save 50 per cent. on normal tyre cost—£5 on every £10 spent on tyres.

These two make a new factor in motoring. With the VICTOR RETREADS (sound covers for unsound free) they make the most effective trio available to the motorist to-day. We shall be glad to prove that.

have lent ten millions sterling to the Russian Government for the purpose of railway construction if there had been the remotest probability of a war breaking out between France and Germany? If any one is so foolish, he can have very little knowledge of the immense power exerted in Europe by the international financier. The great banks of Europe are informed each day with the most meticulous accuracy of everything that occurs in all the Foreign Offices. It would be impossible for any Government to carry on its business unless it kept in touch with the great bankers. There is not the smallest sign of uneasiness among the great credit houses of Paris, the big bankers of Germany, or the finance houses in London. Naturally they are not averse to a shake-out, for it is the big house with its unlimited credit that makes money in times like the present.

A very simple explanation of the fall in prices is this. In Berlin they have been gambling rather heavily in Canadian Pacifics. In Paris there is a fairly large bull account in Tintos, Perus, and De Beers; Paris has also been gambling very heavily in Russian industrial stocks. The bankers who finance these bulls thought that the political scare gave them a good opportunity of calling in loans; they therefore shook out all the weak people. Nevertheless, although selling was persistent on Monday and Tuesday, the actual amount of stock that changed hands was comparatively small.

The Birkbeck meeting showed everybody that the creditors here would not get more than 15s. in the pound, and that they would only get this by keeping very quiet and nursing the securities with great care. Certain newspapers pretended that it would be possible to distribute 17s. 6d. and probably 20s. But there is no hope of so much. This gave us a disagreeable taste in the mouth.

There has been very little doing among the promoters. The General Accident made an offer of 5 per cent. preference shares, and as these shares are really well secured they form an excellent investment, and would no doubt be readily subscribed. The Central Carpathian Oil Company, which is promoted by the Oil Trust, has been attempting to get itself underwritten for some time past, and it is said (we do not know with what truth) that the underwriters have been let in on varying terms. If this is the case, the Oil Trust is not managing its affairs with much tact, for underwriters, above all things, like to be in on the ground floor. The issue was not advertised in a very businesslike manner, for on Monday morning some copies of the Financial News contained a half-page prospectus, while other copies lacked this interesting document, which did not make its bow to the public until Tuesday morning. This shows considerable lack of intelligence on the advertising side. Everything to do with the promotion of a company, especially such a company as the Central Carpathian Oil, should be done in the most thoroughly businesslike manner. The prospectus states that the production from the properties is about 550 tons daily, and that the profits should be £177,800. But although the properties are producing, there is no proof that they are being run at a profit. As far as one can make out, the promotion profit is £145,000—a huge sum. The company starts with this burden, and also that of the underwriting. It will be lucky if it gets out with less than £175,000 tied round its neck as dead weight.

CONSOLS.—Consols appear weaker than ever, and on Wednesday were done at 77½. The story that there were still some large blocks to be disposed of in connection with the Birkbeck Bank liquidation has probably very little truth in it, but the Stock Exchange is so ardently political, and so extremely excited over the crisis at Westminster, that probably a good many rash people sold small lots of Consols as a sort of safety-valve for their over-wrought feelings. A very little selling has a very great effect on this market. Large numbers of gilt-edged securities have been created during the past few years, and it is so much more profitable for members of the House to job in securities out of which they can make some money than out of Consols. The market is quite incapable of standing any strain at all. The Government declines to support the Consol market; in this they are quite right. The Government broker has to buy for the Sinking Fund, but he has not a free hand, and no attempt is made to manipulate Consols on behalf of the Government. Russia and Japan and the consortium of bankers in Berlin handle their respective Government stocks with a view to market loans, but this is not done in either France or England. It is a pity, of course, that Mr. Lloyd George cannot see his way to promote a small Bill to facilitate the buying and selling of Consols, but, as no votes are to be obtained through such a Bill, and as the modern politician never does anything unless he can get something out of it, it is hopeless to expect such a simple thing as the issuing of Consols to bearer would be. The Conservatives used to sneer at Mr. Gladstone and his policies, but, at any rate, he was a great financial genius and was never influenced in his finance by political considerations. Neither, for that matter, was Lord Goschen. But of late years Chancellors of the Exchequer have never done anything without a political object, and the Treasury is now only a part of the wire-pulling machinery. It is a matter of the saddest regret to those who desire the welfare of the nation.

FOREIGNERS.—As might have been expected from the political situation, foreigners have been absurdly weak, and the bulls of Peru Prefs have been thoroughly shaken out. Tintos could not lift their heads, and there was even a certain amount of selling of Russians, but, curiously enough, some good orders came into the market for Egyptian Unifed. These could not, however, be filled; there was no stock about. Until the foreign policies of France and Germany have been settled to the satisfaction of the different Bourses we can hardly expect any rise in this market. London is not largely interested, and indeed only acts as a sort of clearing-house for foreigners.

HOME RAILS.—There must have been a very much larger bull account in Home Rails than any one expected, and it is probable that the banks decided to strengthen their positions and refuse to lend any longer to some of their weak clients. Owing to the excessive contangoes charged by the Stock Exchange most of the speculation in the Home Railway market is carried on through the banks. The clients buy the stock with the bank's money and hand it over to them as security. The banks do a very profitable business in this, but they are careful not to allow their clients to become too deeply involved, and they shake them out ruthlessly when they see the smallest sign of weakness. All the dividends declared up to the present have been better than was expected. Even if the dividend itself has not been higher the carry-forward has been larger. Lancashire and Yorkshire did splendidly, and the stock is remarkably cheap to-day. Great Central was good, and although the '94 preference got nothing they are certain to participate at the end of the year, when it is quite on the cards that they will be paid in full. The speculative element went for Great Central A and B and suffered severely in the slump, for these stocks were the first to feel the fall. They are now approaching a reasonable figure and should be bought. South Western deferred fell heavily, but the figures are good and there is nothing to alarm holders. Great Easterns are moving along the right lines, and the yield here is tempting, but there is a bull account open and I am afraid to advise a purchase. Really the worst figures of the week have been the Metropolitan, who increased their dividend at the expense of the renewals fund. This was not good policy. I write for those who have money to invest and desire a sound security yielding a reasonable rate of interest. I do not write for the gambler or the greedy person who thinks that he can get 6 or 7 per cent. without risk. I repeat that London and North Westerns, Great Westerns, North Easterns, Lancashire and Yorkshire, the '89, '91, and '94 preference of the Great Central are admirable securities for those who can afford to pay for the stocks and take them up. Now is the moment to buy.

YANKERS.—All through the gloom, all through the rumours of Continental wars and the horror of seeing the British Constitution smashed by the backwoodsman peers or Mr.

Lloyd George—I forget which—the Yankee market has preserved its air of optimism. It is, indeed, the only market in which any real business has been done. The fact that the United States will have a very fine crop is in itself sufficient to justify almost any optimism. The States live upon their harvest. It is impossible for an inhabitant of that huge territory to be anything but an optimist. He sees growing round him huge towns where a few years ago was nothing but prairie. He sees railways, like the B. and O., which were once railways to laugh at, becoming magnificent, well-organised systems. He sees a man like Harriman drag the Union Pacific out of bankruptcy and turn it into one of the most magnificent roads in the world. He reads in his paper that Erie, which was once a byword, means to double-track the whole of its system. How can he help being an optimist? Nothing can stop the United States. Its financiers are even becoming honest, at least honest from their point of view. The big bankers of America now realise that if they are to secure the financial support of London and Paris they must play the game according to the rules of those cities. We may therefore expect a good market in all Americans for some months. It will probably culminate in an autumn boom and the usual collapse.

CANADIAN PACIFICS.—Canadian Pacifics continue to fluctuate violently. There is a very big bull account here, and New York and Berlin are manipulating the stock between them. The six months' figures for the C.P.R. show an increase in net revenue of over $3\frac{1}{2}$ million dollars, and a surplus for dividends of over 3 million dollars. The C.P.R. is earning over 15 per cent. on its common stock, exclusive of its land sales. The company pays 3 per cent. of its dividend out of the interest on its land sales, therefore the road itself is earning double the dividend it distributes. This year there are thirty millions of new stock on which to receive a dividend, and there is talk of a still further issue of stock. It must be understood that the C.P.R. makes these stock distributions not because it needs the money so much as because it dare not show the Dominion how rich it is. The figures are astounding. Nevertheless I expect to see a fall in Canadian Pacifics as soon as the new issue of stock is made and the premium rights obtained. We always find this happen in every market.

RUBBER.—Notwithstanding the determination of the rubber bulls to keep up the price, they were not strong enough to manipulate the sales at the last auctions, and prices sagged away in consequence. The public resolutely declines to buy rubber shares, and candidly there is nothing to induce them to change their minds. Vallombrosa report shows a falling off of no less than 75 per cent. in dividend, and this huge drop is merely what every one expected. All the other companies will follow suit, for it is impossible that the price of rubber can rise. Every month adds to the amount of rubber on the market, and every month shows the manufacturer how to economise his consumption.

OIL.—The Continent has been selling Shells. There are evidently more bulls of Shell Transport in Amsterdam than there are in London. The Spies Maikop report is satisfactory, but it tells the shareholders very plainly that the Maikop field is not yet proved. Those behind the scenes knew this quite well, but a great many of the public believed that Maikop was going to turn out a gigantic oil-field. I am afraid that nine-tenths of the companies floated will end in liquidation. Maikop Spies is quite one of the best.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir market has remained steady for the simple reason that all the dealers are short of shares, and that Paris now holds nothing. A sharp concerted movement on the part of the big houses might very easily bring about a big rise here. But the big houses have lost their leader, and they will do nothing; they are content to sit still and draw their dividends. As the position of the Rand gradually improves no doubt an attempt will be made to create a new boom, but at the present time there is not enough to go upon. The public has lost all interest in Kaffir shares.

RHODESIANS.—Rhodesians have jumped hither and thither without any definite rise. Shamvas have been bought, but the price of this share is far too high, and it is impossible to handle such a huge property with the present labour supply. Eldorados look cheap, for the report is excellent; but it is quite plain that the Rhodesian houses not only distrust one another, but I might almost say hate each other. Sir Abe Bailey is credited with having got out of most of his mining shares, and he is certainly not trusted by the other groups. However, he has more brains than all the rest of them put together. But the squabbles of these Rhodesian magnates amuse an outsider like myself. It is not the moment to buy Rhodesians and it is really almost waste of time to talk about them.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Marconi meeting went off very well, and the directors did wisely in paying no dividend on the past year, but declaring an interim dividend for the current year. Pekins have been heavily sold, presumably because Mr. Onrey intends making a deal in British Central Africas, which he hopes to plant on the unfortunate French people.

REFORM VERSUS REVOLUTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a member of the British Constitution Association, I should be glad if you will permit me to call the attention of young readers to the petition which the Committee has presented to the House of Commons on the Parliament Bill. The object of the Association is to resist Socialism and to uphold the fundamental principles of the British Constitution, personal liberty and personal responsibility. The petition appears to me completely to justify the Lords' amendments to the Parliament Bill. I append a quotation from the petition, copies of which may be obtained from the Association, 20, Tothill-street, London, S.W.—I am, Sir, yours truly, MARK H. JUDGE.

7, Pall-Mall, July 25th, 1911.

(QUOTATION.)

That a redistribution of seats is absolutely necessary before the House of Commons can be representative of the electors is evident if the following facts are kept in mind, viz:—

One-half of the 670 members of the House of Commons—viz., 335—now represent 5,414,357 electors; the other 335 represent only 2,489,418 electors. The average of the one-half is 16,162 per member; the average of the other half only 7,431 per member. One-half of the total electorate of 7,904,465 send 458 members into Parliament, the other half only 212.

As stated in the resolution quoted, Mr. Asquith has declared that our present electoral system is "an inadequate and untrustworthy exponent of the real opinion of the people," and that he regarded it as a duty and a binding obligation on the Government to submit a really effective scheme of reform.

Not long since Lord Haldane said: "The progress of democracy is simply the process of fashioning the instrument of government of the State to the more adequate power of giving expression to the general desire. No Government and no Minister has the right to speak for the larger interpretation of the will of the nation."

These weighty words of the Prime Minister and of the Minister for War appear to your petitioners to show conclusively that the present House of Commons is not sufficiently representative of the electors to justify the Government in advising the Crown to create Peers for the purpose of making this unrepresentative House of Commons independent of the other branch of the Legislature.

So fundamental an alteration of our Constitution as a vital change in the relationship of the two Houses of Parliament can only be made constitutionally in one of two ways, viz.: (1) by the consent of both Houses, or (2) by the clearly declared will of the electors.

Therefore your petitioners pray your honourable House to accept the amendments made by the House of Lords in the Parliament Bill (as a temporary measure)—which amendments provide with regard to Bills not adopted by both Houses—that

A Joint Committee, instead of the Speaker alone, shall decide whether a Bill is, or is not, a Money Bill; and that any Bill which (a) would affect the existence of the Crown or the Protestant Succession; or (b) would establish a National Parliament in any part of the United Kingdom; or (c) in the opinion of the Joint Committee, raises an issue of great gravity upon which the judgment of the country has not been sufficiently ascertained—shall not receive the Royal Assent until it has been approved by the electors.

Or failing the acceptance of these amendments, your petitioners pray that your honourable House will add to the Bill a Referendum Clause so that differences between the two Houses may be settled by the direct vote of the electors.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

WE regret that last week, by an error of the printer, under the heading of "THE ACADEMY Dinner," His Excellency Senhor Regis de Oliveira was erroneously described as the Uruguayan Minister instead of the Brazilian Minister.

With a monotonous and depressing regularity one labour trouble succeeds another, and at last London is involved. At the moment of writing ten thousand men in the eastern river-district, dockers, stevedores, lightermen, and others connected with the shipping industry, have ceased work, and all the large steamer lines which use Tilbury and the huge maze of docks adjacent to Poplar are seriously hampered, if not rendered entirely idle for a time as far as the vessels waiting to unload are concerned. The strikers, with their usual cool impudence, say that they will "bring the masters to their knees," and declare that their ranks shall be swelled from other sources—railwaymen and those engaged in trades which are not directly allied to the maritime. There is some hope that before many days have passed the dispute may be settled by arbitration, since the trade of London could be to a great extent paralysed were the mood of rebellion to spread up the river; but the principal thing to note is that this contretemps is simply a development which, as we recently pointed out in these columns, was bound to occur. Dissatisfaction, complaint, defiance spread precisely like an epidemic, and sooner or later react to the men's disadvantage. There is no sense of security, and employers are not to be blamed if in mere self-defence they omit the mercy and do plain justice when opportunity offers. Thus certain authorities at Cardiff have given notice to their men, dating from August 5th, in consequence of disobedience to the terms of the recent settlement, and the Great Central Railway has paid off its Hull lightermen who refused to return to work after an offer which was equivalent to an increase of 2s. per week.

In The Triad, a smartly-written and smartly-edited monthly which reaches us from New Zealand, we invariably find much to entertain and instruct; but in the issue dated June 10th is an article, entitled "Some Forgotten Things," which seems to call for comment. "Pan Optes," in the April number, inquired "Who remembers Ernest Dawson's 'Cyrana'?" Well, plenty of people remember Ernest Dawson's "Cynara"—probably the poem which is meant. On this, as a text, "D. H." mentions a good many things which are by no means forgotten in literary circles. "Arthur Machen's weird fantasy, 'The Great God Pan'—how many remember him?" Readers of THE ACADEMY know that Mr. Machen is far from comatose to-day—that he is in fact very much alive and doing valuable work. Hubert "Crakenhorpe"—should it not be "Crackenthorpe"?—is not forgotten; nor is Richard Le Gallienne's "Romance of Zion Chapel;" and certainly Henry Harland's "Grey Roses" must be rescued from the melancholy Lethean stream which "D. H." sets flowing. In the same issue is a truly delightful story of an acute old Scotsman who sent in some original verses to an Australian journal, which commented upon them in a vein of red-hot sarcasm, and of course rejected them. Nothing daunted, the old poet sent in some more, entitled "The Place of the Damned," which were again scarified. When asked if he "felt bad," he replied, "I feel real bonnie! 'Tis not me he's rejectin', but Dean Swift, the greatest satirist who ever wrote English." Hardly a fair trick to play upon an editor, perhaps—but certainly very funny. The April issue of The Triad, we note, reprints in full an article by Mr. Wilfrid L. Randell, entitled "The Critical Balance," which appeared in THE ACADEMY some months ago.

We learn with regret of the death of Mr. Edwin A. Abbey, R.A., on Tuesday last at his residence in Chelsea. Although he was an American by birth—Philadelphia being his native city—he had lived in this country so many years that it had become reasonable to characterise him as a British artist. He came to England in 1878, distinguishing himself for the beauty and strength of his decorative work, and exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1890 for the first time, being chosen an Associate six years later. Most people will remember him as the painter of the official picture of the Coronation of King Edward VII.—a work of enormous detail, containing a large number of faithful portraits, which occupied the artist for more than two years. As an illustrator of Shakespeare's comedies he proved that the poetic temperament was in him closely added to the artistic life which made him famous; indeed, in nearly all his work the spirit of poesy shines through the eyes of the sister art.

THE BANISHED LORD

A PICTURE BY SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS

Mute in immovable silence,
 Scorning the churlish gaze,
 Stark with unuttered plaining,
 Visage of chivalrous days.

Shorn of a peasant's one honour
 Mockingly nameless to men,
 Wherefore that ban to the far-way,
 Prithee, from deed, word, or pen?

Vowed to his God and his country,
 Liege to a creed or a king,
 Mayhap some test of Love's prowess
 Borne for the bell, book, and ring.

Flung to the world for its buffet,
 Fibred in soul as a child,
 Iron of heart when it's breaking,
 Passed as a moan from the wild.

Voiceless the tower and the hearthstone,
 Vantage of earth's high and low,
 Duty's behest through the ages,
 Vanished as white ashes blow.

Cycles of deeds to the noble,
 Tossed to the winds as of dross,
 Virtue's gold cresting the scutcheon,
 Lowered with the hatchments of loss.

Venom of kin or of foeman,
 Shade of ancestral blight,
 Sealed with that blood-brand signet,
 Toy of man's pitiless wite.

THE FALLACY OF FUNK

THE derivation of the word "funk" appears to be a little doubtful. Some think that it is derived from the Dutch. If that is so, it is certainly not a word which was constructed to describe any Dutch attribute, and it must therefore be supposed that it was coined to designate the physical attitude of opponents. There are of course degrees of funk, and these are usually portrayed in colours. Funk may indicate either a moral or physical deficiency. We are now dealing with moral deficiency.

The crisis at home, as we view it to-day, betrays the different shades we have referred to, relieved by a glorious splash of courage and true perception.

Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne may perhaps be described as partaking of the eau-de-nil variety of shade; those who crave submission because his Majesty has signified—in some way—his intention of acting on some advice which may be tendered by his responsible Ministers, can be described as the eau bénite du cour group, whilst Lord Camperdown and Mr. Strachey may be bluntly assigned to the blue funk school.

It is indeed to be regretted that Lord Camperdown should have been the means of drawing from Lord Lansdowne his letter of the 31st of July. Lord Camperdown has, over a long list of years, been a very painstaking, sensible, and patriotic member of the Upper House. His descent would naturally lead to the expectation that he would have wholeheartedly ranged himself under Lord Halsbury's banner, and like the famous Admiral of the Blue have harried his enemy day and night, until the opportunity of annihilating him had presented itself. It is clear that subserviency and submission, under intolerable wrong, can never produce the situation in which condign punishment can be meted out to the present occupants of the Government Bench.

The lash of Lord Lansdowne's rebuke to Lord Camperdown contained in the words "in no circumstances should I consider myself justified in voting with the Government when the [Parliament] Bill returns to our House" falls with cruel cuts on the already scarified back of Mr. Strachey. In the Times, on the telephone, in countless columns of the Spectator, this gentleman has declared the only policy. He has hinted not obscurely that he has posted the leaders of the party in their parts, that he is the spokesman of those leaders and that his policy of Unionist peers voting with the Government to secure the passage of the Parliament Bill, is the only policy which sane men would entertain for a moment. Suddenly the oracle is discarded and discredited, the pupil turns on the mentor, and frankly disavows him. Well may Lord Lansdowne lament

Alas! poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio: a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy: he hath borne me on his back a thousand times; and now, how abhorred in my imagination it is! my gorge rises at it. . . . Where be your gibes now? Your gambols? Your songs? Your flashes of merriment, that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one now to mock your grinning! quite chap-fallen!

It is charitable to draw a veil over a painful vision.

It must be confessed that Lord Lansdowne's refuge in the half-way house is not a very logical position, and that is the reason why the motive which induced him to inhabit it can only be attributed to temporary nerve-strain. In eloquent and convincing speeches he demonstrated whilst the Bill was in Committee in the House of Lords that without the amendments then inserted

There is literally nothing whatever which is safe. . . . The Crown is not safe. The Constitution is not safe. The Union is not safe. The Church is not safe, our political liberties are not safe. Literally no institution however much revered and respected in this country is beyond the reach of a [trivial] majority.

That, it must be allowed, was a lurid picture which would have suggested to the ordinary mind that no measure—however heroic—should be omitted in the hope of obviating a position so menacing to the fabric of the State. A few lines were however addressed by the Prime Minister to the Unionist leaders, and it was immediately agreed that no opposition should be offered to the measure for establishing the state of affairs which Lord Lansdowne had stigmatised and denounced. Lord Camperdown, Mr. Strachey, and a few others urged that the picture which Lord Lansdowne drew should be converted into reality by Unionist votes, a course which eventually caused Lord Lansdowne to turn at bay.

The fact is, so much has been lost by irresolute leading of the Conservative party in the past, that the stand which is now being made is one of the few remaining chances of rousing popular enthusiasm and organising victories at the polls.

Lord Robert Cecil, in a published letter, puts the position clearly:—

If a peer is convinced that the issue is one of supreme gravity, and that on its merits he ought to vote for insisting on the amendments, then no threats by the Government ought to deter him from doing so.

That is the attitude—a wholly worthy one—which it is to be devoutly hoped the Peers will adopt next week. Any violent measures which the Government may take will assuredly lead to a great Unionist majority in the constituencies in the near future. With a lease of many years of power before them, it is to be hoped that Unionist leaders will realise their responsibilities, and that the sorry spectacle of the pusillanimity and futility of the last years of the late Unionist Government will never again be repeated, to involve the party in ruin as the result of the condemnation by the constituencies of its leaders' omissions and nervelessness.

CECIL COWPER.

A SENSIBLE STEP

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

WHETHER one agrees with the policy of the "die-hards" or not, one must be entirely in favour of their being fairly treated by that portion of the Press which stands by the policy of Lord Lansdowne. The "die-hards" are a body of distinguished public men who are prepared to sacrifice their political prospects in order to support a policy which they believe to be right and the only one likely to save the Unionist Party in the future. But every effort has been made by a section of the Press to belittle their importance and to make out that they are few in number and insignificant in reputation. This is absurd and defeats its own ends, for the names of Lords Salisbury, Halsbury, and Selborne, together with Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Sir Edward Carson, and Mr. F. E. Smith are a sufficient guarantee of the bona fides of the party, and we tremble to think what the Unionist Party would be if it lost their support. There is great annoyance on the part of those who support Lord Lansdowne because the "die-hards" will not disclose the number and names of their supporters in the House of Lords. But why should they? They do not wish them to be subjected to coercion from the Lansdowne party, and above all they do not wish to disclose their position to Mr. Asquith, so that in the event of his being out-voted in the Lords he will know beforehand the exact number of "harlot Peers" he will have to create. But the Lansdowne press calls this a sign of weakness, and declares that they dare not disclose their numbers because they are too few.

Another good example of the methods of belittling which have been indulged in during the past few days is shown by a report in the Times of a meeting of a number of Conservatives in Birmingham who passed a resolution hostile to Mr. Chamberlain, and declaring their unswerving support of Mr. Balfour. Now this was hailed with immense satisfaction by the Lansdowne press, and the papers were full of such headings as "The End of the Birmingham Dictatorship," "Mr. Chamberlain Repudiated," and "Final Split in the Unionist Party." Leading articles were written dilating on the disaffection, and really an impartial observer might have thought that Birmingham had at length parted with its renowned and honoured chief. But what are the facts? Ever since Mr. Chamberlain threw over Mr. Gladstone and joined the ranks of the Unionists there has been a small, unimportant clique of Conservatives in Birmingham who have remained hostile to him. For many years their voice has hardly been heard, but now, taking advantage of the split over the Veto Bill, they have once more ventured to raise their diminished heads. At their first attempt to pass a resolution they failed because there was no quorum present, but after searching the slums and purlieus of Birmingham they raised a sufficient number to pass their epoch-making resolution. This feeble performance is thought of sufficient importance by the Times to be given a full report in double-leaded type. As a matter of fact, Birmingham is absolutely loyal to Mr. Austen Chamberlain's attitude, and if the Lansdowne party rely on the support of Birmingham they will find themselves sadly disillusioned.

We deplore the attitude of open hostility shown towards a group of men who are only acting according to their conscientious convictions. If anything can make a permanent split in the Unionist party possible, it will be this. Some of Lord Lansdowne's supporters, led apparently by Lord Camperdown, declare their intention of actually going into the Government lobby and voting their own comrades down if the "die-hards" find themselves in a majority. This would be a fatal step, and the "split" would then become permanent and embittered to a fatal extent. Therefore it is with profound relief that we read in Tuesday's papers of Lord Lansdowne's timely intervention. In a letter to Lord Camperdown he strongly declares against any Unionist Peer going into the Government lobby. He simply advises them to walk out. This statesmanlike attitude, which will remove all personal bitterness from the struggle, is the most sensible step Lord Lansdowne could have taken. Now there is no need whatever to fear a permanent split in the Unionist ranks.

If certain Conservative Peers are foolish enough to vote with the Government they do so on their own responsibility, and their leaders are in nowise responsible. But we do not for a moment believe that any will be found so foolish as to adopt such an insane step. Lord Lansdowne's letter has cleared the air, and we know exactly where we stand. Only one factor is wanting, and that is the exact number of votes the "die-hards" can muster in the division-lobby. The Government are supposed to be able to rely on seventy-five, which is the number who voted on the famous Budget division. Therefore, if the "die-hards" can command one hundred votes, and all Lord Lansdowne's supporters walk out without voting, it will mean that Mr. Asquith will have to create some thirty or forty "harlot Peers" to ensure the passage of the Veto Bill. This will be a happy solution all round as far as the Conservative party is concerned. They cannot be accused of running away and thus sacrificing a public duty from a desire to preserve the monopoly of their titled positions. On the other hand, the Conservative vote will not be swamped in the House of Lords, and the immediate passage of Home Rule thus secured by the creation of a permanent Liberal majority. The forty puppets will be duly created. Mr. Asquith will incur all the obloquy of his tyrannical and arbitrary action; the country will quickly grasp that only a strong second Chamber can save them from the measures they most detest, and the Conservative party can go to the polls unsullied by the charge of having quietly acquiesced in a revolution which they believe to be fatal to the liberties of Englishmen.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES AND NATIONAL INSURANCE

THE Friendly Societies of this country formed on the basis of mutual thrift stand as a monument to the working-men of what they in combination and by co-operation have been able to do almost unaided and alone to safeguard their own interests and preserve their independence.

It has been well said of the movement that it was "conceived in a spirit of brotherliness, born in the cradle of mutuality, and reared in an atmosphere of large-hearted charity." It is true that the conception of the early Friendly Society was crude and ill-conceived, that in many respects it was without form and void, and that in the beginning many and serious blunders were made. In their desire to help their fellows the hearts of the pioneers were larger than their heads. Men standing in the present full light of actuarial knowledge and experience are apt to criticise severely the movement and pass censure upon the fact that in all respects the Friendly Societies are not absolutely all that they ought to be. What they are to-day earnest, loyal, self-sacrificing working-men have made them, in face of almost insuperable difficulties and with but little assistance from the State. And although they did not possess the learning of the schools, they possessed the earnest desire of preserving themselves and thousands of their fellows from the cold charity and stigma of the Poor-law, and in compassing that desire they have been eminently successful.

In the present day it seems incredible that a movement which had for its object only the desire for that which was best in the lives of the people and the nation should have, till within the last half-century, practically had to stand outside the pale of the law. For at least the first fifty years of the Friendly Society as we now know it (such was the wisdom of our legislators) we were regarded as illegal Societies; and the Pulpit and Press of the land said unjust and unwarranted things regarding our objects; it is small wonder our branches fell easy prey to designing and dishonourable men. To the careful student of our social history the fact will present itself not so much that there are defects in our Orders, not so much that we fall short of that which we have so strenuously desired to be, but that we exist at all, having regard to the difficulties of the past.

And now, having taught the country the value and benefit of mutual thrift, having striven, and with much success, to teach our members that that which they obtained for themselves by their own prudence and self-denial would prove to be a choice thing in their lives, having educated men in obedience to authority and regard for law and order, and fitted them to occupy prominent positions, and having proved ourselves pathfinders over the hills of difficulty and through the valleys of humiliation that we have had to traverse, the country is presented with a comprehensive and complex scheme for insuring the industrial classes against sickness and invalidity, and the question that is occupying the attention and consideration of all earnest Friendly Society men is what is to be our position and place in this great national measure. Having played our part and served the generations of the past one hundred years, are we to be told that a more excellent way has now been found and therefore we must stand on one side, that at best our efforts had been but feeble and imperfect, and we must make way for a modern and up-to-date machine, the enlargement of our own amateur model; or will the Government, recognising the beneficent part we have played in the social welfare of the people, accord to us our undoubted right of place in the administration of the measure, and recognise the justice of making reasonable and just amendments in the Bill so as to preserve and develop the work of the great Friendly Societies in the future? Many and various are the answers that men are making to these questions, and gloomy and pessimistic are the forebodings of some as to the future. "This is but the beginning of the end," they cry; "Twenty years will see the end of the Friendly Society movement," cry others; whilst in the minds of some is the conviction that the Government intend if possible to lay unholy hands upon the accumulations in the funds and in the process of time absorb the Societies. Respect should be paid to the various opinions expressed, because, however mistaken they may be, they originate in most part from a sincere love and admiration for the movement which those who express them have served voluntarily, unselfishly, and with loving care, and from a sincere desire to preserve and continue their Societies in their full force and vigour, and with increasing prosperity.

For my part I confess I take a hopeful and optimistic view of the future, and cannot conceive that it could be in the mind of any reasonable and sensible Government so to act in this matter as to damage and destroy, and ultimately cause to pass away, that which has been of so much value in the life of the nation, and has contributed with so much success to the contentment and well-being of the industrial classes. In the work of the voluntary thrift movement we have had opportunities of inculcating the highest principles of virtue in the men with whom we have had to deal; they have been taught their duty to their God, allegiance to the Throne, their duty to their neighbour, to themselves, and to those dependent upon them; and we can point with satisfaction to the fact that association with the Friendly Society movement has made them better husbands, better fathers, and better members of society. In their various branches they have had great opportunities of giving expression to the highest principles of brotherhood and mutual help, and although the monetary benefit in sickness and funeral payment at death has been of great consideration, yet they have not been by any means the only benefits that have been conferred. In the associations formed in their Lodges, Courts, and branches men have had opportunities for mutual service and assistance that have been of incalculable value; they have been taught to regard each other as brethren, and to render to each other that service of sympathy, confidence, and counsel that should be shown by brother to brother; in short, by the expression of true fraternal interest they have been enabled to perform many and valuable services to their mutual benefit.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has expressed his admiration of the work performed for long years by the Friendly Societies and his anxiety not in any way to affect the fraternal work of the various Orders. The leaders of the movement are relying in confident anticipation of the realisation of his repeated promises that it is not his intention to do hurt or harm to the existing Societies, but that, on the contrary, they shall have the fullest opportunities for the extension and development of their beneficent work.

To that end it is necessary that reasonable amendments be made in the proposed enactment, and that to the opinions and desires of those who for many years have had the conduct of the voluntary thrift movements careful and due consideration be given. It is contemplated that some fifteen million persons will be brought into compulsory sickness insurance, of whom about six millions have already made voluntary provision, a large number of there being experts in the matter of sickness insurance. Their demands for alteration and amendment are only advanced with the one desire to assist the Government, so that in the inauguration of such vast and wide-reaching proposals as little damage as possible to existing institutions shall be done.

The amendments proposed by the various Societies have been before the National Conference of Friendly Societies—a body representing the Friendly Society movement—and received their approval, and upon those requisitions the Friendly Societies stand. They have been circulated amongst the members of the House of Commons, and every care taken to educate the members of that House as to the importance of the vital points therein advanced.

It is not my intention here to deal with these points. If they are agreed upon, as undoubtedly they should be, it will go far towards allaying anxiety in the minds of a number of earnest men, and cause many who now regard the scheme with an amount of disfavour to co-operate the more readily in assisting to make the measure a success. For the moment my concern is as to how this proposal for national insurance will affect the Friendly Societies when it has become the law of the land.

Undoubtedly they will be relieved of a certain measure of their liabilities by the fact of a considerable sum of their present reserves being released, and it may prove that, after a careful actuarial readjustment of their affairs, they may be in a position to offer slightly increased benefits. But this is an actuarial question, and not within the province of a layman.

One outstanding feature of their work will be seriously affected—viz., the voluntary service that has been rendered by thousands of their brethren. Men have delighted to serve their Orders, whilst they have regarded them as the creation of and under the absolute control of their members, and this they have done from love of the work and not for monetary reward. But under a State scheme the fraternal aspect may be seriously altered—the warm-hearted, sympathetic visit of the sick steward will be replaced by a cold officialism that will only perform so much service for so much monetary consideration, and everybody will expect to be paid. For these many years the cost of administration of the various Orders has been at the minimum of expense, and members in consequence have profited in their benefits. Under the new system this will be altered, and it is only reasonable to assume that the cost of management will be materially increased.

It is worthy of note that amongst a large number of the clergy and ministers of religion the Bill has been received with much eulogy and approval. It is also worthy of note that as a body these gentlemen know as little about the true Friendly Society movement as any section of the community. Generally they have failed to make themselves acquainted with its true meaning and aspiration, and in consequence have lost splendid opportunities of gathering round them and exciting the respect of thousands of the best of the working classes of this country.

It remains to be seen in how far their new-born zeal for sickness insurance will prompt them to place at the service of the various organisations any suitable accommodation they may have at their disposal for the meetings of lodges, courts, branches, &c. It should be remembered, when attention is called to the fact that many branches of Friendly Societies meet on licensed premises, that they have been the only places at their disposal wherein to meet, and if the religious bodies are now alive to the importance of co-operating in this great work, their assistance will be welcomed by the leaders of the movement, and in time will prove of the greatest benefit.

Under National Insurance the well-founded Friendly Societies should receive large additions to their ranks.

The compulsorily insured persons will be divided into two classes—those seeking insurance through an approved Society, and those entering the Post Office section. At the best the Post Office will offer but a precarious benefit in cases of even moderately prolonged sickness, and into it will have to go those who cannot obtain admission to the approved Societies. I hope I shall not be misunderstood if I say this section seems to my mind the section of undesirables. That being so, I cannot conceive of any man willingly associating himself with this section whilst the portals of an approved Society (worked in conjunction with one of the old-established Friendly Societies) is open to him. There will, undoubtedly, be a large influx of members. They will join mostly in the first instance the Government section for the benefit of 10s. per week for thirteen weeks and 5s. per week for thirteen weeks. But what is such a meagre provision as this in time of sickness for a man with a wife and children dependent upon him? It will then be the duty of the Friendly Societies to show how by a small extra payment an additional benefit may be provided which will be of the greatest advantage in time of adversity, and a benefit which the member voluntarily provides for himself without compulsion. Thus in time it may happen that all coming under the operation of the National Insurance measure will be not only members of the State scheme, but also brethren of the large affiliated Orders, entering into all the benefits and privileges which membership with those Orders is capable of conferring.

A NEW COLUMBUS AND A NEW WORLD—I.

BY FRANK HARRIS

Is there any pleasure after forty like finding a new book, meeting a new man! The gasp of excitement, the hope, the flutterings of delight, the growing conviction that the book has widened the mental horizon, is a classic therefore, a possession of the spirit for ever—all the joys soon merged in curiosity as to the writer: who is he? How did life treat him? To what qualities in him do we owe this deathless work?

There before me is the book "Insect Life," the author's name, before unknown, now radiant—J. H. Fabre. Where does Browning talk of the delight of seeing and naming a star? No shadow of doubt in the recognition, no hesitation possible. Fabre has revealed a new world to us; beneath our very feet indeed—the world of the infinitely little, with its innumerable tiny inhabitants, each living its own life and dying its own death. The comedies and tragedies of their existence are shown us with simple, scrupulous care, and we realise at once that this world, too, is all fashioned by a God with purposes we cannot fathom, to ends inconceivable—all mysterious, indeed, and wonderful to us; now innocently beautiful as a June morning, now grotesque and petty, now sublime, now horrible: self-abnegation and love working through blood and lust to some unknown goal or—to no goal at all; for the darkness is impenetrable: the doubt will not be laid.

The shallow, modern optimist is brought to shame at once. Fabre, it appears, is already a very old man—eighty-seven indeed; has worked as a naturalist in a village in Languedoc for three-quarters of a century; has written and published thirty volumes, and was only discovered by the wise men in Paris the other day, when, as he says himself a little sadly, "I'm past work."

Yet there can be no question about his value. Maeterlinck calls Fabre "one of the glories of the civilised world. . . . one of the most profound admirations of my life." Rostand talks of him as a savant who "thinks like a philosopher and writes like a poet," and Richepin joins in the chorus. For the first time in my memory Frenchmen of all schools are agreed that Fabre is one of the great naturalists of the world, and yet if he had died at eighty-five hardly one man in ten thousand of his own countrymen would have known his name. So much for popular appreciation of genius in a democracy.

Yet his life has been as noble as his work. The son of a poor peasant, he taught himself to read by the light of a pine-cone—a tallow candle being too dear. After hours of study on winter nights he used to lie with the sheep in order to get warm, and was often awakened by the howling around the fold of the savage wolves of the Rouergue. He paid his way through the College at Rodez by his services as a choirboy and then set himself to study Nature on an empty stomach, but with a new book of poetry in his pocket. Poverty has been his companion throughout his life: even now the house he lives in with his wife and children is a peasant's cottage distempered rose-red with jalousies painted pea-green, and his food and clothing are simple in the extreme. Yet he looks on life bravely, fairly, without affectation of triumph, and without bitterness: "it's wretched luck," he says, "that now I've got some good ideas I'm unable to carry them out. . . . I can only think when I'm walking about," and he adds with regret, "my legs have given out."

I don't know how to begin telling all that Fabre has done in his seventy-five years of labour; the result is colossal. Ten volumes on insects and their lives and instincts and ten or twelve other volumes with a practical lesson in each of them. One on the domestic animals, one on the animals useful to agriculture, another on insects which are hurtful to agriculture, another on botany, yet another on "The Earth" and a companion volume on "The Heavens." There are besides lectures on Zoology, lectures on history and agricultural chemistry, chapters on coins and poetry—five thousand pages, in which one finds everywhere the patient, loving observations of the naturalist arranged by a consummate artist and set to words by a poet. Fabre, it seems to me, has written the first book of the new Bible, the Bible of Nature.

Let us take him as our guide in this new world for a little while. He begins by talking about the sacred beetle of the Egyptians, the common beetle of the South of France, which every one has seen on the road pushing an enormous ball ten times as big as himself up hill and down dale with feverish energy and indefatigable perseverance. Scarcely one observer in a hundred cares to notice that the booty is made up of cow-dung or other excrement, that the beetle is one of the most assiduous of Nature's scavengers. Again and again the sturdy little creature in its gleaming black armour pushes the ball up some steep hill; half way up a blade of grass hinders it and suddenly ball and Sisyphus-workman roll to the bottom over and over again in hideous defeat. The beetle returns to his task undismayed, and after inconceivable efforts gets the ball where he wants it.

Often he has to fight as well as labour. Another beetle will come down and perch on top of the ball and annex it, and strike down the true proprietor as soon as he advances to the attack. His courage is beyond question; he attacks again and again until he drives away the robber or until he is convinced that the robber is the stronger, in which case he hurries back to the dung-heap and begins to form another ball, which he will again push to its destination.

Worse even than the robber is to be met with in the beetle's struggle for life. Sometimes another beetle quietly joins the proprietor and at first makes some show of aiding him by pulling the ball while the proprietor pushes it. After a little while, however, the parasite usually tires of the work, and calmly climbs on top of the ball, and allows the indefatigable proprietor to push him as well as his dinner to the common refectory.

When the beetle has got the ball where he wants it, in some sunny, quiet corner, he immediately begins to dig out a cave twenty times as large as himself, and ten times as deep. As soon as he is lost to view the parasite seizes the opportunity and begins pushing the ball away for himself. But the proprietor, down in his cave, returns every now and then to the surface, and as soon as he misses the ball hurries after it and the parasite. Sometimes the parasite will coolly pretend the ball is his, but, as a rule, he does not want to fight, and therefore becomes very officious indeed in pushing the ball back to the refectory. When the proprietor has carefully lowered the ball into the cave the two construct a roof, and thus shut themselves out from the world in a warm, half-dark cave. In solemn silence and shade they begin the most extraordinary banquet that has yet been recorded in the world. For twenty or thirty days they will sit opposite each other eating without intermission or pause day and night till the last atom has been consumed, leaving as proof of their powers a long thread of excrement which runs into yards each day, and each day weighs as much as the feasters. And this Gargantuan banquet is not only for private pleasure, but also subserves the public health, for the excrement of the sheep and cow is thus cleared away and prevented from infecting the upper air.

But feeding is only one small part of the activity of the beetle. Fabre looks not upon hunger, nor upon love, but on maternity as the sovereign inspirer of instinct. A male beetle will make a great booty and eat it, but when the female wishes to lay her eggs the two make a ball many times larger composed of finer nutriment for the benefit of the larva. They pick out a sunny bank and dig a large subterranean chamber in which the immense ball of food is gradually formed into the shape of a pear, and pressed and patted and beaten till the outside of it is as smooth as silk. This outside plays the part of a shell, and is soon hardened by the heat of the summer sun to the firmness of terra-cotta. This shell, so to speak, is intended to keep the inside soft and eatable in spite of the heat for several weeks.

The female lays her egg in the small end of the pear, and round it she puts the finer milky nourishment of her own body for the little worm to eat as soon as it is born. With infinite care she closes the aperture over the egg so that a certain amount of air can penetrate to the larva, and then she and her mate leave their work and go in search of food. If the beetle is a glutton when it eats, it labours magnificently, and when constructing the nest for its young often goes without food for weeks at a time. The beetle is an ebony jar of energy which it dispenses for its offspring.

And the little worm when it wakes to life and licks about it for nourishment shows just as wonderful instinct. If you pierce his birth-chamber with a needle and let the air in while trying to study him, he will at once close it up with excrement, and repeat the experiment as often as you please.

But how, it may be asked, does the little larva manage to get out of his terra-cotta prison? He has to reckon, it appears, on chance for salvation. The first rainy day will make his prison soft and spongy, and he can cut his way out into the light. If no rain falls he dies. The first day of his deliverance he takes a sun bath. He will crawl on to a blade of grass and sit sunning himself all day long without an attempt to find food, the next day his appetite awakens, and his normal life begins.

Fabre describes other nests as complicated as the nest of this beetle is simple; nests that are found 5ft. and 6ft. underground; nests with long corridors and galleries where not one pear is prepared for the offspring, but half a dozen; and where the heat of the sun is tempered for the little naked worm.

The maternal instinct, with its self-sacrifice and foresight and care, is often wise with the wisdom of a fiend, and cruel to a degree almost unknown among beings of a larger growth. The hardest problem for the mother is to ensure good food for her offspring—food that will remain soft and eatable and, if possible, fresh for weeks. Certain species have hit upon a remarkable way of solving the difficulty. Fabre found in their nests what seemed at first to him the carcasses of other beetles. Then he was struck by the fact that these carcasses had not gone bad. Studying the bodies, he discovered that the beetles were still alive, and they lived on under glass in his room for as much as a month or five weeks. Yet they could not move, and could do nothing to defend themselves—could indeed be eaten while alive by the tiny, soft larva. They had been paralysed, in fact—but how?

First of all he noticed that nearly all of them belonged to one species, and then he discovered that this species had the ganglia of motor-nerves concentrated just between the corselet over the chest and the corselet over the stomach. Here, then, was the vulnerable point. An experiment or two showed him that if he pricked them in this spot with a needle having a drop of ammonia on it he could paralyse the motive centres—in fact, he could make the beetle as helpless as he had found it in the nest. The next thing was to find out whether this was the way their enemies proceeded.

In a chapter called "A Clever Butcher" he tells us the story: he watched the insects at work. The insect he calls the Cerceris is the butcher. The Cerceris seizes the larger beetle by the head and pushes him backwards till the corselet protecting the chest and the corselet protecting the stomach are separated; he then darts his sting into the ganglia between the two armours. Immediately the beetle falls as if struck by lightning. Its legs may move spasmodically for a second or two, but that's all. Its assailant stands watching its victim in its agony. When the Cerceris sees that the beetle is quiet he drags it off by the leg to lay up in warm storage for weeks and weeks, to be eaten bit by bit, while still alive by the little larva. No more horrible cruelty can be imagined. Tennyson was right when he talked of Nature lending evil dreams. But what cleverness in the Cerceris! Who taught the little beast the vulnerable point? If chance discovered the weak spot it needed reasoning power to act on the discovery and turn hazard into instinct. But Fabre will provide us with instances of still more diabolical cleverness and still more fiendish cruelty.

TWO REVIEWS

A REMARKABLE article in the English Review for August is entitled "Androgynism" (androgyné—the woman-man), and is from an hitherto unpublished MS. by Charles Reade. It seems that about the year 1860 Reade tabulated in a folio of 250 leaves instances of women playing the part of men, and this extraordinary case—the history of which is not concluded in the current issue—occurred in the year 1853 and is well authenticated. A young wife, ten years the junior of her husband, unhappily wedded, took it into her head to dress as a man and assist the somewhat scanty earnings of the home. How she did it, and the results of the change, are told with all Charles Reade's vivacity and humour. The next instalment will be awaited with interest.

The most valuable article, from an academic literary point of view, is the following one on "Our Modern Vocabulary," in which Mr. Pearsall-Smith suggests the difficulty an Elizabethan would find himself in were he to attempt a conversation with a man of the present day, and from that as a text traces origins, and pleads for some needed reforms in our modern speech. There is much in what he says. We agree entirely when he notes the beauty of such words as "tarry," "abide," "raiment," "blithe," "cleanse," "quench;" but when he writes that "probably none of us have ever once used them in conversation" we must differ, with all good humour. A great many of his readers will use the last three, at any rate, fairly often.

Sir Alfred Mond's contribution—a reprint of an address delivered by him in May last—is valuable and important. The phases of the problem of unemployment are dealt with under various headings with all the knowledge which Sir Alfred as a great employer has been able to accumulate. There is not a vestige of playing to the gallery or Radical rant. The paper is thoroughly well reasoned, and will repay careful study by those who are interested in the problem. We confess we should have liked the paper in the form of an article, but in any form it is acceptable. After having probed the causes of unemployment, Sir Alfred Mond writes some seven pages of thoughtful suggestion as to remedies for the evil. These pages should be studied as emanating from a thoroughly well-informed and balanced source.

The Editor's article, "How Germany Went to Morocco," is interesting, and may prove controversial. So far as we are concerned, we observe in its trend an absolute confirmation of the line we adopted in an article a few weeks back called the "Cult of Paper." In these days the efficacy of paper barriers to national extension or vaulting ambition should not be too highly appraised.

Many other interesting articles appear in the number, which maintains the high standard the English Review has recently attained.

The current Edinburgh Review eschews politics, save in the short and moderately worded article at the end dealing with "The Coronation and the Constitutional Question," wherein the reviewer, averring that "the Liberal Ministries of the last half-dozen years will certainly earn a favourable judgment from history" on their management of Imperial affairs, evidently wishes it were possible for him to say as much of their proceedings in domestic matters. While the Government is taken sharply to task for refusing to consider any scheme for a reformed Second Chamber, one gathers that the threatened wholesale creation of Peers is welcomed as rendering the question of reform immediately urgent. Nevertheless, opponents of the Parliament Bill "are hardly reasonable in urging at this time of day that the House of Lords should virtually reject it." To many readers the article on "The English Church of To-day" will appeal with peculiar force. The great religious controversies of the nineteenth century are considered in the light of their influence traceable in the thought and action of to-day, and an attempt is made to forecast the policy of to-morrow and to estimate its effect on the Church according as the policy is one of Anglicanism pure and simple or one adapted to the religious life of the English people as a whole—at home and beyond the seas. Stress is laid on Froude's summing up of the position—"Externally the Ritualists have won the battle. But what a price has the victory cost! The nation has ceased to care what the clergy say or do. As the Church has become 'Catholic,' the honoured name of Protestant has passed to the Nonconformists. The laity stand aloof, indifferent and contemptuous." The tone of the article is however hopeful, and we are bidden to look forward with confidence, believing that "the latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former." Of the remaining articles—all excellent in their several ways—those on "The Battle of Fontenoy" (vividly describing the attack of the English Infantry under Cumberland), "The Mind of Pascal," "The Cockney Raphael" (B. R. Haydon), and "Lyof Nikolayevitch Tolstoy" are perhaps the most generally interesting. "The Animal Story" is a well-written, albeit somewhat laboured, review of notable books on animal life which have appeared since 1900; "Degeneration and Pessimism" is a striking essay on evolution, and not at all pessimistic in its conclusions; and the papers on "Madame Roland" and "English Public Life" are calculated to correct some current beliefs, and to suggest new trains of idea touching the French Revolution and the trend of political events in our own country in the succeeding century.

POETS: CHAPERONED AND OTHER-

Confessional. By WILFRID THORLEY. With a Preface by MAURICE HEWLETT. (Elkin Matthews. 1s. net.)

The Hills of Hell, and other Verses. By DESMOND MOUNTJOY. (The St. Catherine Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

Lyrics and Sonnets. By LOUIS HOW. (Sherman, French and Co., Boston, Mass. $1 net.)

Before Dawn. By HAROLD MONRO. (Constable. 5s. net.)

Through Dust to Light. By ROBERT VALENTINE HECKSCHER. (Sherman, French and Co., Boston, Mass. $1 net.)

It is a somewhat dangerous advantage to enjoy so enthusiastic an introduction as Mr. Hewlett, "proud to be Mr. Thorley's usher of the door," has provided for "Confessional." Critical expectation is whetted, and the armoury of critical adjectives, both positive and negative, is trained to an exalted standard. On the whole, however, the distinguished "usher of the door" is, in this case, justified. The little volume is divided into four sections, "Confessional," "Vagabondia," "Child Thoughts," and "Pagan Chants." Taking these sections as they stand, perhaps the "Child Thoughts" leave the most successful impression, which after all is no small thing to say. There is a real charm in the proem, "The Ruined Shrine," which avows Mr. Thorley to be one with all the true wistful lovers of childhood. Some of the poems that follow are not unworthy of comparison with the classic work of "R. L. S.," and one of the best is that entitled "Of the Moon:—"

As I lay down to sleep last night,
The moon looked in with all her light,
And O! it was a pretty sight.

As though an angel passing by
Had heard the little children cry,
And oped a lattice in the sky;

And leaned far out, and gently laid
Her arm along the balustrade;
And told them not to be afraid;

And whispered low that she would stay,
And guard them till the dawn of day
Should drive the horrid night away.

Her breath it was a silver mist
That turned a star whate'er she kist.
She touched my little bosom, wrist;

And then her light crept o'er my face,
And all my hair turned silver lace;
And then I slept and dreamed apace.

But in the "Pagan Chants" the true poet is revealed no less happily. "The Dead Dryad" is a poem of real beauty, through which breathes the essential love of Mother Earth. The section which gives its title to the book is marked by Mr. Thorley's undoubted gift of language, and is gemmed with beautiful lines, as for example:—

Young daisies clot the turf like spume
From some spent wave of ebbing green.

He is occasionally a trifle laboured, however, which may be partly owing to the somewhat stiff metre he has chosen to employ almost exclusively in this section; there are minor blemishes, too, such as an over-fondness for hyphenated adjectives. There are as many as seven in a short poem, and in one instance three occur in as many consecutive lines.

The prefix a-, as "a-limp," "a-throb," is another of his affectations, in which category, surely, such a rhyme as "anodyne"—"green" is to be placed. Other reprehensible uses are "thawn" as past-participle of the verb "to thaw," and the employment of "to dusk" as a verb. "Stiftled," on p. 44, is, we suppose, a printer's error for "stified." Misprints also occur on pp. 54 and 61, while "languorous" is repeatedly misspelt. Putting aside the minor faults indicated, this is a really remarkable little book.

Mr. Desmond Mountjoy's somewhat lurid title is scarcely a true index to his work. The opening poem, which lends the title, is indeed lurid enough, though there is a certain strength and true poetical passion in it. But in the short compass of his forty pages Mr. Mountjoy runs pretty well the whole gamut of moods. His work is rather unequal, but perhaps "One Twilight Hour" shows him at his best:—

The magic of your face, your eyes, the glory of your hair,
The rapture of your sweet surprise because I found you fair;

The gracious gratitude expressed when I knelt with you in prayer.

And then the dim and distant room where the things that are once died;

And we saw the chaste elusive face of Beauty sanctified,

And we knew the ways of Death are clear, and the gates of God are wide.

There is a pleasing tenderness, too, in the little poem "Rest." It remains to be said that the booklet is very daintily produced by the St. Catherine Press.

Mr. Louis How has also had his little holiday in Hell, which really seems to be getting a trifle blasé as a minor poetical resort. For the rest Mr. How is very sententious concerning things that are generally accepted:—

Above

All beauty, what we cling to most is love, and he avows a devotion to Browning in what is possibly the best of his efforts—"Browning in Venice."

Over a score of sonnets contribute nearly half the volume. One or two are fairly successful, but such a sestet as the following causes something of a shudder:—

To-day brings opportunity enough

For exercising energy and pluck.

My bungled doings extant furnish stuff

To work anew with better skill. And luck,

Who heretofore was only strange and gruff.

May now disclose a golden lead unstruck.

We can but hope it.

"Before Dawn" is dedicated "to those who, with me, are gazing in delight towards where on the horizon there shall be dawn," and Mr. Monro exhorts all such "to praise, worship, and obey the beautiful Future, which alone we may call God." That will be sufficient to reveal his standpoint, and, without venturing to discuss his rather restricted theology, we may admit that he sings his gospel well. It is not, at all events, the scream of a callow revolutionary voicing his first great theory. There is a mature note in these poems which arrests attention and calls for a serious hearing. They are informed with sincere passion for humanity and a very real idealism. Moreover, they have the essential poetical quality. We have been held by almost every page, and there are at least a few poems in the volume that deserve to live. "The Return of Arthur" describes how the hero awakes in Avalon and returns to the world of men to stir up again the spirit of chivalry, waiting—

Among the twilight regions of a soul
To listen for the muffled stir of plumes.

The blank verse is sonorous, but restrained, and abounds in striking passages, as where Arthur boards his cedar barge at Avalon :—

Swift he stepped
Upon its rich-emblazoned beams ; nor spake
The grey-eyed mariners, but wistfully
Gazed while they pushed it outward from the shingle,
Rapped the salt, stinging waters with their oars,
And swung in level beat along the sea.

In "The Last Abbot" the dying ecclesiastic, recanting his faith, sings the praise of beneficent change :—

Life is a huge and burning rose,
Which, through scented petals of fire.
Everlastingly overflows,
Brimming with fierce desire.
Spring on wonderful spring is wrought ;
Summer on summer blooms and fades :
One eternal creative thought,
Like a miraculous web, pervades.

At the end of the volume there are a number of short "Impressions," some of them very mordant, some of them very delicate. We should have liked space to quote the one commencing, "She of the soft brow and the delicate hands." Occasionally, though rarely, a bad line mars a poem, such as—

From the consecrated dignitaries of Rome,
And the anointed Kings of Europe there — very dubious iambics. Mr. Monro is unorthodox, but a poet. Mr. Robert Valentine Heckscher is quite orthodox, but, we fear, not a poet. Perhaps even Sir Lewis Morris, who is quoted as "usher" on an order-sheet inserted in the volume, in all the immortality of his place among the "World's Classics"—perhaps Sir Lewis himself had an uncomfortable doubt about it when he wrote, rather guardedly, "there is much that is good in them, and the sonnets seem to be far better than the rest." Perhaps, under the circumstances, the best course will be to give a sample sonnet and leave it at that :—

Far in the polar regions, where the dawn
Divides the years in darkness and in light,
Stands the White Mountain, in a robe so bright
His splendour is too fair to look upon :
In perfect peace, unfound by any one—
Mortality hath not so rare a might
As breathe such icy air, that breath would blight—
He stands to all eternity alone !

What monumental silence—not a sound,
Save when in striking stars his head is crowned,
Catching the icy fires of true tints !
With instant freezing tears and frosted breath
Dared Love, alone, to kiss his brow, till hints
Of moving snowdrifts woke the face of Death !

TWO DISSERTATIONS

David Garrick et ses Amis Français. By F. A. HEDGCOCK.
Illustrated. (Hachette and Co. 5f.)

Thomas Hardy, Penseur et Artiste, Étudié dans les Romans du Wessex. By F. A. HEDGCOCK. Illustrated. (Hachette and Co. 10f.)

DR. HEDGCOCK'S studies of two famous Englishmen, compiled originally as dissertations for the doctorate, are rather unequally yoked. The "Garrick" is little more than an ordinary thesis, a rather more than usually successful attempt at finding an unexplored corner in the domain of literary history. The author appears to establish his claim to have found a lacuna and to have filled it in. Garrick's French visitors and his own visits to France furnish an interesting and, taken collectively, a novel subject, whose elastic character is favourable to digressions and anecdotes. The selection of unpublished letters, to be found in the Appendix as well as in the body of the text, give some amusing traits of the great actor. The description of the riots at the Opera in 1755, on the occasion of a French ballet, is delightful, and suggests curious speculation as to what would happen to-day if theatrical enterprise in London or Paris or elsewhere were suddenly brought into conflict with irritated Chauvinism.

The study of Mr. Hardy's works is a much more serious and ambitious attempt. We are not sure that we like it better for that. Dr. Hedgcock has defined his work as dealing with the ideas and writings of his author at the expense of the purely biographical side. Now, in the case of such a writer as Mr. Hardy this method gives us an uneasy, if not perhaps wholly justifiable sensation of receiving a criticism of life by retail ; it is psychologising on psychologising, surely not quite a satisfactory business. It is true that, as we are told in the Preface, Mr. Hardy wrote his last novel fifteen years ago, and it may be that procrastination and prescription are the enemies of true literary criticism. In any case it is certain that, admitting his point of view, the critic has done his work well, and has produced a conscientious and very interesting book. It is the point of view that inspires us with misgiving. We will begin by asserting, rather rashly, that this point of view is not English, but French, and we will then hasten to qualify our assertion by the postulate that the kingdom of literary criticism belongs to the French. We guess Dr. Hedgcock, quite apart from the indication of his name, to be English, but his training and his attitude towards literature seem rather to belong to the other side of the water. And there is this quality about French criticism—it is too absolute. Admirable in diagnosis, where the data was sufficient, it is apt to be hasty and summary when dealing, for instance, with foreign authors. "Favete linguis" should be inscribed over the portals of every national literature for a warning to international critics. We feel that Taine's great work on our literature would have three times its value if he had thought fit to introduce it with some semblance of apology.

Of course this has little to do with Dr. Hedgcock, except in so far as he has absorbed French ideals of criticism. But the point is that he has learned in that school that international barriers are more or less obsolete, and that those that still subsist and hinder a ready understanding should be treated as stupid and outworn prejudices. It is curious, in this connection, to find him laying stress on the provincial side of Mr. Hardy's work, and here we cannot be too emphatic in our agreement with him. Dorset has done for Mr. Hardy what Schleswig has done for Herr Frenssen, and made him the greatest living novelist of a great nation. But it is strange that the critic cannot allow to England what he allows to Dorset—a soul, a conscience, and a historical tradition of her own. The Anarchists are not always right, and Swinburne's "Poems and Ballads," in spite of their delicious flavour of stolen fruit, were not merely an offence against the policeman ; while Robert Browning, though undoubtedly jaune to a handful of irresponsible strikers, and incidentally caviare to the great general, had more to give us than a "facile optimisme, fondé sur une foi aveugle." He retaught us perhaps an old lesson, that of "strive" and "fight on," but after all the great moral truths are not still to discover. After this we may be allowed to express an agreeable surprise at finding that Dr. Hedgcock has not been as bad as his word ; in spite of his riotous intentions he has not broken open the Newgate of ideas. "Tess" is a failure from the revolutionary standpoint, and Mr. Hardy is seen to stand in his high place by his great gifts of construction, imagination, and dramatic power.

A GLIMPSE OF THE BORDERLAND

An Adventure. The Extraordinary Experiences of Two Ladies who Visited Versailles in 1901 and 1902. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE simplicity of its title and the anonymity of its authorship give to this book just the right note from the start. Even without the formal guarantee of the publishers, themselves beyond the need of guarantee, "that the authors have put down what happened to them as faithfully and accurately as was in their power," we should feel no sort of temptation to question the bona fides of the narrators of this experience. Two English ladies, styling themselves for narrative purposes "Miss Morison and Miss Lamond"—"the only fictitious words in this book"—visit the Petit Trianon, and, though at the time unconscious (apart from a momentary "eerie" feeling) of any supernatural presences, subsequently make the discovery that what they have viewed is the Trianon of other days, together with some of its former inhabitants, and not the Trianon as it stands to-day. Once this conviction has dawned on them, Miss Morison and Miss Lamond set themselves to test their vision in every possible way.

The "adventure," or rather the first part of it, takes place on August 10th, 1901; the two ladies, at that time but newly acquainted, having the most elementary knowledge of the history and traditions of the Trianons, and being, further, unaware of the significance of the date in French history, pay an afternoon visit to the maison of Marie Antoinette; they meet with a variety of persons, with some of whom they even have speech; a few peculiarities of costume strike them, though at the time with no great force; and finally they find themselves merged in a body of ordinary sightseers. Three of the persons of the vision stand out specially—a man perceived sitting by a "kiosk," which becomes a very important point in the subsequent investigations (he himself proves to be the Comte de Vaudreuil, and is the evil genius of the experience)—a second man who arrives in haste, running, and who begs the ladies to take a different direction from that which they had chosen—and a female figure, whom researches reveal to have been the Queen. There has been nothing in the day to excite a definite sensation of the occult; the persons seen have presented no very extraordinary features; of the topography, whether ancient or modern, both ladies are ignorant. It is only after a week's reflection that they exchange their matured suspicions.

From the moment the affair took its mysterious turn the two ladies worked at elucidating it with the most admirable zeal. Miss Lamond made a second visit to Trianon alone, and they twice went there together. They made other less important visits, and their friends made independent investigations. Miss Lamond had further experiences, but on the other occasions they found things in their normal state—that is to say, they convinced themselves that on their first visit they had had to do with a world of spirits and a visionary topography. The Queen and Vaudreuil and other persons of the drama began to be identified. Kiosques and cottages and grottoes had disappeared, and no one knew that they had ever existed. From this moment begins the work of reconstitution, which is very solidly carried out. In this connection we will indicate the plan of the book. The first part consists of narratives of the facts, made at various times by each of the ladies independently. Then come the "Results of Researches," then "Answers to Questions," and finally a "Rêverie," suggesting the process by which Marie Antoinette's spirit, on that terrible August 10th, might have been projected into the happiest days and scenes of her life, realising the "Nessun maggior dolore" of the "Inferno." Part of the vision appears to relate to an urgent summons to the Queen to return to the Palace, and it is presumed that this refers to October 5th—the "March of the Women." The question that this raises, whether Marie Antoinette went to Trianon on that day, is not solved satisfactorily, and is, on the whole, secondary.

As an example of the scrupulousness of these ladies in checking their data, we may mention their reply to those critics who have suggested that they may have been present at a historical pageant or a cinematograph rehearsal. Not content with quoting the various topographical arguments—which should be final to those who admit, as we do, the complete good faith and mental balance of the authors—they have been at the trouble of examining the official list of fêtes and several volumes of photographs taken by the most likely photographers, while they have obtained the information from the proper authority that no leave to take cinematographs was given at the period in question. At the Bibliothèque Nationale and elsewhere much virgin soil has been turned. At every turn corroboration has been found for the truth of the vision; "some of the facts were so small that no historical knowledge, however dim, could have suggested them."

We must admit that we opened the book with misgiving. We feared to fall into the clutches of a fanatical and proselytising spirit-rapper; but we were soon reassured, first by the simple and straightforward narrative, free from all sort of pretension and not without charm, and later by the preliminary "Answers to Questions." One of the authors confesses to having "powers of second sight, &c., deliberately undeveloped." "We belong to no new schools of thought." A sanity like this—some may think it exaggerated, but none can say it flees from truth—is a safe guide among the will-o'-the-wisps of spiritualisms. And, en passant, we may say that the authors have suggested a historical method that may not be without fruit.

AFTER WATERLOO TO THE CRIMEA

The Life and Letters of Sir John Hall, M.D., K.C.B., F.R.C.S.
By S. M. MITRA. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 16s. net.)

THERE is no precedent, so far as we are aware, for the life of an Englishman being written by an Indian gentleman, but Mr. Mitra did right to avail himself of the opportunity when furnished with Sir John Hall's papers by his daughter for the purpose of a biography. A more distinguished personage would have provided a more engaging subject for Mr. Mitra's pen, but as a brief notice of Sir John Hall is included in the "Dictionary of National Biography," he was qualified for fuller treatment: subjects of the highest order are not likely to remain long in obscurity for want of a vates sacer. As Sir John Hall died forty-five years ago, this work has the appearance of being belated; but it has two merits which compensate for the delay—it points the moral, sound for all time, that the performance of duty is the best path to success, and it contains first-hand information on important episodes in English military affairs. To Mr. Mitra's execution of his task high praise may be awarded; he writes good English, not English disguised in Indian-ink or embellished with Orientalisms; and he has turned out a biography as interesting as it could be made from the materials at his disposal. The introduction, contributed by Admiral Sir Massie Blomfield, who served through the Crimean campaign, does no more than justice to Mr. Mitra's labours in his design "to rescue the memory of a Crimean veteran from oblivion after the lapse of half a century."

Sir John Hall's early life is very briefly treated before his appointment in the subordinate position of a hospital assistant in the Army Medical Service, when medical men of every rank were required in considerable numbers at Brussels to deal with the terrible carnage of Waterloo, which crowded the local hospitals. With the ordinary intervals of employment of varying length in the United Kingdom and Ireland, Hall saw service in different parts of the world—the West Indies, Gibraltar, South Africa, India, and the Crimea. He became an assistant-surgeon in 1822, at the age of twenty-seven; he had a spell of ten years of continuous foreign service from 1818 to 1827 in the West Indies, including two dreadful epidemic visitations of yellow-fever which occurred in Jamaica. Appointed surgeon of the 33rd Regiment (the Duke of Wellington's) in 1829, he retained the post until 1841, accompanying the regiment, of course, wherever it was stationed. From 1841 he was at Barbados, and Principal Medical Officer at St. Vincent; in 1844 he was made a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, the next year he took his M.D. degree at St. Andrews, and in the year following, when he was fifty-one, after thirty-one years' service in the Medical Department, he was promoted to the rank of Deputy-Inspector-General of Hospitals. Up till that time his service, though cast principally in foreign countries, can hardly be described as unusual or exciting. But during his two periods of employment as Principal Medical Officer, firstly in South Africa between 1846 and 1851, and secondly in the Crimea from 1854 to 1856, he had plenty of strenuous work, with exposure enough to test even his splendid constitution.

Mr. Mitra has adopted an excellent system, noticed in the introduction, of giving wherever required a brief résumé of the recent previous history of the countries to which Hall was deputed on service. These accounts are quite long enough without being exhaustive, are welcome as variations, and enable the reader to realise the situation in each case better; especially is this so with reference to the troubles with the Kafirs. It was the old story of "the expansive character of British power when surrounded by non-European races." The Kafirs resented, naturally, the extensions and advances of Colonial enterprise, invaded British settlements, and provoked punishment. Sir John Hall's papers give a good idea of the meaning of active service in the Kafir wars, and in the subsequent fighting with the Boers. With the great number of British troops engaged he had to be constantly accompanying headquarters at the front, both civil and military, to provide for and inspect all the hospital and sanitary arrangements, and to find his way across difficult country, liable to surprise from an active enemy. He was fortunate in serving partly with an old friend, Sir Harry Smith, the hero of Aliwal, as his chief. The native chiefs and their tactics are prominently noticed. In short, Sir John Hall's papers add valuable information to the history of those times in South Africa. His sojourn in the Bombay Presidency for three years added to his general experience, but was not signalled by any special circumstances.

Hall was suddenly summoned from Bombay, somewhat late in the day, to undertake the duties of Chief of the Medical Department in the expedition to the Crimea. When he reached Constantinople, in June, 1854, it was too late to repair immediately all the mistakes which had been made—in the encampment, for instance, of the troops in the pestilential swamps near Varna, in the deficiency of the medical preparations, and in the want of proper hospital accommodation. Mr. Mitra is fully justified in writing:—

The want of adequate foresight and preparation on the part of the nation for a contest, not only with powerful and determined foes, but with the relentless forces of Nature and climate, and the lightheartedness with which the combat was approached, are, in the retrospect, truly marvellous.

The history of the Crimean War has often been narrated; the sufferings of the troops from exposure, their gallantry in action, the breakdown of the military administration, the ultimate victory are too well known to require repetition. The object of Sir John Hall's descendants in having the story retold from his papers is evidently to vindicate his personal and professional reputation. As head of an incriminated department he was a point of attack, but the official inquiries found nothing to his personal discredit, and he duly received the K.C.B. for his services. He was all his life a conscientious, pains-taking officer, and was so excessively over-worked in the Crimea that he had a slight stroke of paralysis in 1859, which rendered him unfit for further mental exertion. There was no poetry or romance in his nature, as he well knew; he did his duty thoroughly and thereby rose, without adventitious aids, to the high position he attained. Mr. Mitra dwells on the inspiring example afforded to junior officers by such a career. Hall's avoidance of friction with other persons is also noticeable, though he had difficulties with Miss Nightingale and her nurses and her views generally. The lessons to be learnt from such a life are important. Sir John Hall's family and Mr. Mitra may be congratulated on their respective shares in exhuming the papers and in the outcome of a well-written volume of memoirs.

SIDELIGHTS ON BYRON AND SHELLEY

The Diary of Dr. John William Polidori. Edited by WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI. (Elkin Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.)

DR. JOHN WILLIAM POLIDORI was an uncle of the Rossettis; in this fact lies one of his claims on our interest. Another and even greater claim is found in his association for a short time with both Byron and Shelley. His life was short, as he died by suicide at the age of twenty-six, and seems to have been somewhat unhappy, owing largely to his own unfortunate temperament. His diary begins on April 24th, 1816, when he set out with Lord Byron as his travelling physician. He had a very successful scholastic career previous to this, as he had already obtained his degree of M.D., and at the time of his travels with Byron was only twenty years of age. The diary was begun largely because of an offer of £500 made by John Murray to young Polidori for an account of his travels with Byron.

Most readers will remember Polidori in connection with "Frankenstein," in the introduction of which book his name is mentioned. He was present at the reading of the French book of ghost stories which prompted the writing of Mrs. Shelley's terrible tale. It is well known that Shelley and Byron also began to write hideous stories under the same impulse; but it is not so well known that Polidori also joined in and brought his task to a successful conclusion. The book was afterwards published with the title of "The Vampyre."

The diary itself is written in the usual hasty style of such informal documents, but it displays here and there evidences of literary power. The sidelights on Byron, Shelley, and other notable people of that day are not of first-rate importance, and they owe very much to the careful annotations of Mr. W. M. Rossetti. They do not make any remarkable addition to our knowledge of the two great poets, though they cannot fail to be of interest to students of that period and of literature generally. The diary will also be useful to that increasing class which studies literary geography and makes literary pilgrimages, for it will help such to identify more exactly many of the places mentioned in "Childe Harold."

The Kent Coast. By ARTHUR D. LEWIS. Illustrated.

The South Wales Coast. By ERNEST RHYS. Illustrated.
County Coast Series. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s. net each.)

VERY far removed from the ordinary guide-book are these handsome volumes on the coastline of England; they are to a great extent literary, pleasantly discursive and reminiscent, and full of information, expressed in not too dry a manner. Mr. Lewis, for instance, treating of the Kentish coast, devotes a page to the beauty of the lower reaches of the Thames, and has eyes for the nondescript "men who are always to be found looking over a bridge, or where streets are being repaired or wedges driven in." He tells of Birchington, with its memories of Rossetti, Rochester and the Dickens country, Folkestone and the manner in which Mr. H. G. Wells has brought that district before the world in his novels. His style, however, suffers serious lapses. Here is an awkward sentence, for example: "Wells, so far as I know, is the novelist who invented the novel in which there are characters who have views on everything, and all put into the book." There are many similar slips from literary grace in this volume, and on page 70 begins a sentence of 224 words in length, burdened with suspensions and parentheses. Mr. Lewis is also much too fond of using the phrases "I feel," "I confess," "I admit," "I like," and so on. Still, despite these drawbacks, the general impression is good, and a chapter which we must mention on account of its special excellence is that which deals with "The Downs and Goodwin Sands." The story of the recent loss of the famous sailing-ship Preussen is well told.

It scarcely needs to be said that Mr. Ernest Rhys is certain to write attractively and well. His contribution to the "Coast" series is a model of what such books should be—informative without being "dry," and relieved here and there by twinkles of humour. The account of Cardiff Castle forms almost an essay in itself, and the amusing explorations of Swansea Castle—which appears to have been nearly swallowed up by the Post Office—are an earnest of the thoroughness with which he has fulfilled his task. The chapter on Lundy Island is written in the true spirit of adventure, and makes the reader long to explore its sea-caves and narrow creeks. "We reached Lundy," writes Mr. Rhys, "as I have told, in a hot sun; we left its pirate cove in a cold rain, to the first mutterings of a nasty wind in the Lametor crags. We had not sailed above three or four furlongs before Marisco's Isle had disappeared; and we got back home that evening, and saw the gas-lamps lit in the street, with a sense of having been in a place just a little over the world's rim."

Past Carmarthen, Tenby, Pembroke, and Milford, to Cardigan and Aberystwyth, the author takes us in a delightful wayfaring, and we should like to quote many a passage for the entertainment of our readers. In both of these volumes the illustrations assist the text—those of the Welsh coast being especially good; and the pleasures of a holiday in either district would be enhanced by the presence of so much "learning lightly told."

The Charm of Copenhagen. By ETHEL C. HARGROVE.
Illustrated. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

THERE are two kinds of travel-book that seem to us to serve a useful purpose. There are guide-books of the Baedeker order that help us to travel in the flesh, and there are books like "The Path to Rome" and "The Inland Voyage" that help us to travel in the spirit. Mr. E. V. Lucas, the anthology king, has succeeded in writing books of travel that happily combine the merits of both these classes. His "Wanderer in Holland" can be read with equal pleasure and advantage by a London fireside or in the moisty airs of Holland itself. It is at once practical and literary, compendious and agreeably discursive. We have always considered it the model of what a guide-book should be.

And now the same publishers have given us in a similar form what is, we are convinced, one of the very worst guide-books that has ever been printed. From the split infinitive with which the Preface begins to the last dreadful sentence—"Like Wordsworth's simile, I feel a flower can suggest thoughts too deep for words"—which brings the volume to a welcome conclusion, the book is written in slipshod English, wherein numerous faults of grammar, a system of punctuation that defies all laws, and a careless and incoherent style have conspired together to give platitudes an efficient disguise and have failed. Without being in any way a practical guide to Denmark or Copenhagen, the book is none the less quite worthless as a register of the author's impressions of her visit to that country. It is full of conventional art criticism, characterless literary appreciation, insignificant interviews with people of no importance, and unimaginative descriptions of scenery. It is as trivial as it is tedious, and it would be difficult to derive the materials for one tolerable article on Copenhagen from the whole volume.

We do not wish to be severe, but there is a literary standard beneath which even a guide-book should not fall, and the volume under notice professes to be more than that. It contains 314 pages of printed paper, it weighs something under a pound, and it has the shape and general appearance of a book. In a sterner age we should not have thought it necessary to make any other comment.

The Mystic Bride. By MRS. AUBREY RICHARDSON. (T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE is nothing new in this biography of St. Catherine of Siena, except the writer's treatment of the subject and her own comments, neither of which strike us as particularly happy. There is a sort of present-day craze for tearing open the very souls of famous people, their innermost life and thoughts, in order to discover some psychological germs, so to speak, which may account for their ordinary (or extraordinary) actions. But the conclusion may be tame. As when Mrs. Richardson informs us that—

Catherine was woman in essence and in expression because to do what she had to do, and what she elected to do, she had to contend against the special physical weaknesses of her sex and the peculiar complaints from which she as an individual suffered.

This is a sufficiently commonplace diagnosis. Mrs. Richardson has plenty to say, in fact too much, on the Psychopathia Sexualis of Catherine's life. But this rending of the veil is also popular in some quarters. The discussion as to whether St. Catherine was Catholic or Protestant in sentiment, or whether she would have been a Protestant in fact had she lived a century later, seems merely inept. It is certainly humorous to be told that, in natural apprehension of spiritual worship, she followed "that prototype of all Protestants the woman of Samaria." We must confess to a liking for the old-fashioned form of biography, where the simple tale of life in itself speaks for character, without psychological analysis, or irrelevant if not impertinent discussions.

FICTION

A NOTABLE STORY

Queed. By HENRY SYDNOR HARRISON. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

THE history of Dr. Queed, puny, immersed in self, careless of the comfort or discomfort of others, and of the gradual development of his muscles and his mind, is one which we are unfeignedly glad to have read. Mr. Harrison's name is new to us as that of a novelist, but he has found here an excellent variation upon the conventional plot, and, marvellous to relate, he has succeeded in interesting us to an annoying extent in the personality of a young man apart from his relations with women. To an annoying extent, we observe, since the book is too long to read at one sitting, and to relinquish it was distinctly difficult.

Dr. Queed, engaged perpetually with his great, epoch-making work on social evolution, living by schedule, parceling out his hours meticulously so that no minute should be lost, oblivious to everything and everybody else, is a pathetic figure. He is also ironic—for the student of sociology was the most unsocial person imaginable; he even displayed a card bearing the word "Silence," in order that irresponsible persons unaware of the important nature of his labours should not interrupt him with questions or frivolous chatter. It was little Fifi, the landlady's delicate daughter, in tears over her algebra, who plucked first with her weak fingers at the armour which so soon was to be rendered useless by other and stronger hands. "You are crying," said Mr. Queed. "What is the matter?"—

"Oh, nothing," she said, winking back the tears and trying to smile, apologetically—"just silly reasons. I—I've spent an hour and ten minutes on a problem here, and it won't come right. I'm—sorry I disturbed you."

There was a brief silence. Mr. Queed cleared his throat.

"You cannot solve your problem?"

"I haven't yet," she sniffed bravely, "but of course I will soon. Oh, I understand it very well. . . ."

She kept her eyes stoutly fixed upon her book, which indicated that not for worlds would she interrupt him further. Nevertheless she felt his large spectacles upon her. And presently he astonished her by saying, resignedly—doubtless he had decided that thus could the virginal calm be most surely and swiftly restored:—

"Bring me your book. I will solve your problem."

"Oh!" said Fifi, choking down a cough. . . .

"Indicate the problem," said Mr. Queed.

Whereupon we have the equation stated, and solved; and then Mr. Queed avoided Fifi's smile—"he obviously deliberated:—"

"If you have any more of these terrible difficulties," he said, slowly, "it isn't necessary for you to sit there all evening and cry over them. You may ask me to show you."

A truly delightful and delicately-painted little scene is this, and it gives the picture perfectly. Thenceforth the doors of human intercourse gradually swung open on the absorbed Queed, much to his discomfiture at first:—

With a leaden heart, and the hands of lamentation, he took the schedule to pieces, and laboriously fitted it together again with a fire-new item in its midst. The item was Human Intercourse, and to it he allotted the sum of thirty minutes per diem.

To follow his fortunes in the space at our disposal is quite impossible. Mr. Harrison has the style at times of Mr. William de Morgan; he rambles excellently, bringing into his net all sorts of quaint subsidiary characters, a host of them, every one interesting. We could tell of Charles Gardiner West, the serene egotist, and his manœuvres for position, power, and the love of "Sharlee" Weyland—the girl who "talks straight" to Mr. Queed, and tells him some home-truths which stick; we could trace the slow attraction she feels in the person of the quaint doctor, and its temporary eclipse by reason of West's misbehaviour. We could make a fascinating column out of Mr. Queed's adventures in the assistant-editorial chair of the Post. But the author has done all this in his book in a masterly fashion—masterly, yet not faultless. It would be possible to pin a grumble to every few pages, but since the story has given us such keen pleasure by its sincerity and "grip," we will not pick insignificant holes in a really fine work. Enough to say that "Queed" is a novel in a thousand, distinguished by clear thought, excellent characterisation, and a remarkably effective fund of humour, which never once drops into weak jokes or impertinent observations made for the sake of being "funny." Mr. Harrison is to be heartily congratulated—and so are his readers.

Ordeal by Marriage. By CONWAY VERE. (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

THE story related by Conway Vere is a striking one, written with great sincerity and strong religious feeling. In the person of young Dick Beaufort it revives in these ruthless days of the survival of the fittest the utopian chivalry of the legendary Arthur and his Knights. Most of the characters in the book are Roman Catholics, and of the girl of his heart Dick tells his Father Confessor:—

"I love her more than anything in the world; there is no doubt in my heart as to that; but, all the same, I shall not ask her to marry me. . . . I am too young, too ignorant, too utterly untried—in a word, I am unproved, and therefore quite unworthy of a woman. . . . I thought to give myself a ten years' probation," said Dick, seriously. "That will be none too long. Here I am now at the very beginning of life. . . . Ten years hence. . . . I shall even then, it seems to me, be only possibly fit to ask for a woman's love."

Nevertheless in a very short time this extravagantly chivalrous youth, "to right a woman's wrong," deliberately contracts a loveless marriage with another damsel—his elder brother's discarded "light o' love." This sinful union—for we cannot regard it in any other light—is the ordeal, and it appears quite natural to the author, who makes the parents and even the temporarily discarded Alys, who was only to be won after "a ten years' probation," view it with approval instead of the disgust which, we venture to think, most people would feel on being confronted with such a situation. Yet, as we have said, the story is a striking one, and in the end Dick the paragon meets with his reward for the ordeal he has gone through, when Alys tells him, "I think it is the most beautiful thing I have ever heard. . . ."

He opened his arms, and, as he gathered her to his breast, and she yielded herself in ecstasy, a golden cloud descended, and hid them from the world's sight. And the gates of the earthly paradise stood open wide before them, and they entered and were content.

And so Dick won his Rachel, to say the least in a very Quixotic manner which we do not recommend other young men to follow.

A String of Beads. By JITTIE HORLICK. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

THE incidents related under the title of "A String of Beads" represent the memories of one Patricia, who compares the various happenings in her life with beads placed on a string. Some of the beads are very small indeed—in fact, one wonders how they found a place on the string at all. The story deals mainly with a motor tour through France, during which Patricia meets her "fate" in the person of M. Serrano, an immaculate young man who "unconsciously made an art of existence" and "never sounded a wrong note or took a false step," although, according to his own showing, he was not leading a particularly blameless life up to the time the reader is introduced to him. Patricia is chaperoned by a very charming young matron whose husband—strange as it may appear in the pages of modern fiction—is still in love with his own wife. David, another estimable person, proves himself to be so staunch a friend to our heroine that she is certain that they must have known one another in a previous state of existence. Really these reincarnations appear to be getting rather too frequent. Surely our present life, with perhaps an occasional hope or qualm about the next, is enough for the majority of mankind to worry about, without having to think backwards, as it were, as to whether persons now living held communication with each other in previous ages. We should also like to inquire how Patricia's parents, who spent a great part of their time in India, managed, even when their daughter was a child, to take her "backwards and forwards with them when they went." But we must not be too critical with the lady who has tried to amuse and interest us by giving a glimpse into the history of her own life story, and at any rate the illustrations by Olive Snell are excellent.

Twenty-four Hours. By L. T. MEADE. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

"TWENTY-FOUR HOURS," described on the title-page as "a novel of to-day," is a somewhat tedious story related by the heroine in the first person, which does not tend to make it more attractive. It opens in May, 1899, and many periods of twenty-four hours are covered in the course of its 300 pages, but just how many it is difficult to tell. Judging by internal evidence, we should say that the lady who writes under the nom-de-plume of L. T. Meade produced this effusion some years ago. For Dunstan Rashleigh, the heroine's scoundrelly brother, whose "work on the Stock Exchange consisted in carrying great sums of money from one bank to another," and who helped himself "from one of the bags," talks of seeing "the inside of a gaol—Holloway Prison to begin with," which to-day, as we all know, is sacred to militant suffragettes and other obstreperous and erring females. Our authoress appears to have a curious notion as to what constitutes bigamy, if she really believes that a young unmarried lady can be guilty of that crime, as she makes one of her characters state on page 141. We think that L. T. Meade, who is certainly no novice at the game, might have turned out something better than this, though we hasten to add it is no worse than most of the present-day fiction, the quality of which is sadly deteriorating through over and too rapid production.

The Clatter of the Clogs. By ARTHUR APPLIN. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

As the title implies, the scene of this story is laid in Lancashire. It contains plenty of the excitement with which Mr. Applin has made his readers familiar, such as a strike, the closing down of several cotton mills, a fire, and a riotous election. The interest of the story is well sustained throughout, and there is not a dull page in the book. The characters, too, are all well drawn, and by no means of the usual stereotyped kind. Those who like good, wholesome fiction should hasten to make the acquaintance of Jack Cottrell, the hero; Mary Dauncey, the heroine; Mrs. Mumphy, the landlady; Pugilistic Peter, the little parson; Lady Melonie Manners, who marries him; Bill the Bully; and the rest of Mr. Applin's lively personages. They will not regret doing so.

THE THEATRE

"SALLY BISHOP" AT THE PRINCE OF WALES' THEATRE

MR. TEMPLE THURSTON has made a great mistake. Believing himself to be without the instinct for the theatre, he called in, it is obvious, some one who has had so much to do with the Stage as to be steeped hopelessly in all its falsities, artificiality, insincerity, sentimentality—some one (surely he must be an actor?) who believes that English playgoers are people who leave their intelligence in the cloakroom with their overcoats—a fashionable belief which is shared by all actors and nearly all managers, almost to the annihilation of the London stage. If Mr. Thurston, unversed as he may be in the tricks of the dramatist, had been true to himself, and had placed his story on the stage as fearlessly and truthfully as he wrote it in his novel, his play, although unwisely produced at the fag end of the season, would have been treated with respect and even admiration, and would have had a reasonable chance of developing into financial success. As it is, it has very little chance indeed, because it is one of the worst and most distressing examples of theatrical hedging that we have ever seen. As such it is a piece which not only annoys the critics, but which makes it very plain to playgoers that they have been regarded as West African niggers or citizens of the United States of America.

Consider the thing. It is deeply interesting as a damning proof of the complacent wrong-headedness and puppet-mindedness of theatre people. Here was an everyday story, very human, very natural, in which a man called Traill, a youngish man, a bachelor, is first of all attracted by a pretty face in the street, and finally so stirred to passion by the young, delicious girl whom he has followed, that he goes to her lodgings, schemes for weeks to discover what are her views as to conventional morality, and at last blurts out that he loves and needs her. She is a typist, and is therefore one of the great and increasing army of young women who are brought face to face at an early age with rough truths. Traill imagines and hopes that Sally Bishop has no illusions, but she knows, without his being obliged to be put to the inconvenience of plain speaking, precisely what he means by devoting valuable time to her entertainment. He is amazed and even shocked to find that when he takes her in his arms and kisses her willing lips, and speaks of love passionately she talks of marriage. Marriage! the thing was never in his mind. He has his way to make—he is what Mr. H. G. Wells calls a careerist, and although he spouts the futile stock phrases as to the conventions, is obliged, as a professional man and a county man, to be as conventional and as respectable as it is possible, by the mercy of Providence, for any such man to be. So he goes away from the girl, tears her out of his heart, or at any rate removes her from his thoughts. He does not pretend even to himself that he loves her. He knows well enough that he is merely in love with her, which is an altogether different state of mind. He goes on with his work. He is a normal person enough, bred in too conventional a school to indulge in heroics and theatricality; for all that, of course, her pretty face and young, round figure come into his imagination at odd moments to nurse his desire and awaken his passion. Then a day comes when the girl, lonely and lovesick, flutters, mothlike, into the flame which she knows will burn her. She loves and is human, and when these two meet again, they trifle with the position, skirt about it like children for a time, make no real fight, and succumb gladly. But this man Traill does more than spout the egregious shibboleths as to conventional living. He actually lives up to them. He plants the pretty, happy, clinging, rather too feminine Sally in his rooms in Savile-row, and calls her Miss Bishop with a sort of self-conscious bravado even to his manservant. No hedging for him. No "Mrs. Traill" for him. It is his life. He will do precisely what he likes with it.

But, of course, his sister, whose only god is convention, and who is willing and anxious to sacrifice all the joy of life on the altar of respectability, attacks this, to her, immoral home with all the strength and cunning and unsportsmanship of a genuinely good woman. This is human and right enough. It is only a matter of point of view. And the end of it is that Traill becomes restless, wonders, now that passion is dying, if he has not made a pretty considerable ass of himself. The girl is—who denies it?—awfully sweet, lovable, kissable, clinging, and all that. But, good heavens! she will play the piano in a hopelessly English way when he wants to work. Her clothes have just a suspicion of musical comedy; her stockings are a little too pink. She rattles with bangles and cheap stone things. The horrid word "suburban" hits him, angers him, shames him, makes him detest himself for a selfish, cynical brute—and kinder—what a word!—than ever. She does some perfectly natural, common thing—it does not matter what—and he seizes it, magnifies it, and uses it with a righteous indignation that he knows to be hypocrisy to break the chain that binds them. Ordinary things happen; he becomes engaged to be married to a "nice gal," he settles so much a year on Sally, does very well without her, and when the charm of the episode comes back to his mind, and Sally's problem refuses to be dismissed at once, he shrugs his shoulders, and hides behind "system" and "Nature," and those other things which the Censor does his best to blue-pencil, the London County Council to eradicate, and the cowardice of parents to encourage. Poor little stupid Sally has, in her wonder-year, her long and blissful holiday, stuffed her golden head with sentimental novels and plays, and so of course she now walks through a mimic life, not as a human being who must be brave and sensible, but as a character, a wounded heroine, a woman branded, and so forth. Marvellous! No longer having to earn her living, she goes away into the country, and a good enough person falls in love with her, and asks her to be his wife. Very likely she would have been mightily happy with him and useful in the village, and a good little mother; but, heroic at all costs, she tells him about Savile Row and all that, and returns to her room in Traill's house to pack up her things. With the cunning of the simple, she has sent a note to Traill asking him to see her. He conceives that she has a wonderful plan for bringing him back to her feet. Very foolishly, and very kindly and ordinarily, Traill turns up, and is profoundly shocked—how good that is—when she asks him to give her a child for her loneliness. He is the pink of convention now that passion is dead. His refusal, pedantically worded, hurts the girl horribly, and her vanity, her sentimentality, her false, romantic ideas leave nothing for her to do but commit suicide. This she does, by gas-fumes, and is found by her faithful little friend Janet and her faithless lover lying twistedly on her bed.

This, or something very like it, was Mr. Thurston's story as he told it. This is the story he, without doubt, put into his play. Then came the theatrical, very theatrical, expert, or experts, and then began the appalling process of making it "sympathetic," as it is ignorantly called. "You cannot expect an audience to like a hero who . . ." "You cannot expect the box-office to do any good with an ending which, . . ." and so on. Mr. Thurston listened to the dogmatic advice of his theatrical enemies until he began to think that there must be something in what they forced down his throat. Very likely he told himself that, after all, they knew and he did not. At any rate, he agreed with them finally in their assertion that playgoers will not stand the truth, will have falsity, and he set to work to cover his good, plain, honest building with a horrid stucco until eventually it looked like a specimen garden-city house at the White City. He made Traill's sister a most obnoxious, ill-bred, impossible fool. He dragged in much silly talk about a mortgage in order to give him a "sympathetic" reason for throwing over Sally. He put in a futile and egregious letter from his friend in the last Act in which he read that the girl to whom he was engaged was not as good as she ought to be, and worst of all, driven to it by his experts who know nothing except the wrong thing, he made Traill rush into Sally's room long before the gas-fumes could have had any effect, and carry her out, so that he might kneel by her side and say, "Oh, my dear!" when she opened her eyes. In fact, very weakly and foolishly, Mr. Thurston took advice when he should have turned his back resolutely upon every theatrical person who ventured near him. How dearly he has paid for it!

As a sentimental play "Sally Bishop" might have come out better if it had been cast well, produced efficiently, and put on with some semblance of West-end requirements. So far as the leading parts are concerned it could not have been cast worse. Mr. Dennis Eadie, who has made a corner in bloodless men, played Traill as though he was bored to death. He looked like a man who takes unpleasant medicine unwillingly. Miss Daisy Markham, who looked quite charming, had been made to play Sally as though she were the heroine of a musical comedy instead of a very human creature. Miss Doris Lytten or Miss Dorothy Minto would have shaken the play into a semblance of life if, of course, they had refused to be taught by the producer and Mr. Thurston's theatrical, very theatrical, friends. The characters which had not been tampered with, but were left as Mr. Thurston painted them, lived and breathed in the gifted hands of Miss Thomas and Mr. Baskcomb. It is very evident, however, that Mr. Thurston, when he has recovered his courage and discovered the danger of theatrical advice, will do big things for the stage. His dialogue is good, his characterisation excellent. All he has to learn is to be untheatrical. "Sally Bishop" may be, after all, a fine lesson.

SPELLING REFORM

THE main argument for reform in English spelling can scarcely be contested. A letter is a symbol representing a certain sound, and the first essential of a symbol is that it should have a determinate value; for if its signification is variable, it is not a symbol, but a mere arbitrary mark. The only function of a letter is to represent a certain sound, and its only merit consists in the accuracy and fidelity with which it fulfils this function. Judged by this standard, it can scarcely be maintained that our system is perfect or incapable of improvement. The greatest confusion prevails in our method of representing all the vowel sounds and many of the consonants. There are words in which the same sound is assigned to each of the five vowels in turn. More often than not single sounds are written as diphthongs and diphthongs as single sounds. The vowel sound which in most other languages is proper to the letter "i" is in English represented in no less than ten different ways. The consonants are rather less promiscuous in their habits; yet at least half of them are associated with two or more different letters. The result is that, as no word is composed entirely of consonants, it is impossible to predict the spelling of any word from its sound alone, or to arrive by any process of reasoning at the right method of representing it in writing. The spelling of each word must be learned independently and retained by an act of mechanical memory.

How is it that the majority of English people tolerate this chaos with perfect equanimity, and receive all proposals of reform with indifference or derision? How is it that we remain satisfied with a system which condemns our children to years of needless and unprofitable labour, and obstructs with unnecessary difficulties the path of knowledge, which, under the best of circumstances, is so long and arduous? Why is it that men of letters especially are almost unanimous in opposing the reforms which have been suggested?

To the man in the street the cause of spelling reform appeals with little force. The inconvenience of the present system is more a national than a personal one. Like an evenly distributed burden, it presses nowhere with sufficient force to cause real discomfort. The greatest sufferers are little children learning to read and foreigners studying the English language, and these, in the nature of things, are incapable of making known their grievances. To the ordinary adult the advantages of reform are remote, the disadvantages immediate. In this respect the cause of spelling reform resembles many other progressive ideas, slow to find favour with the majority of our countrymen. Bimetallism, the decimalisation of money, the unification of weights and measures, the adoption of a single standard of musical pitch—all such reforms appeal more to the reason than to the emotions, or to private or class interests, and towards these the attitude of a democracy is more conservative than any other form of government. The best hope of their realisation is under the reign of a powerful autocrat, anxious to add lustre to his dynasty. The despotism of a Cæsar or a Napoleon will effect more reforms of this nature in a decade than a republic will carry through in a century.

While, then, the attitude of the ordinary man towards reform is one of apathy or ridicule, that of the literary fraternity is one of active opposition, and with some appearance of reason. To the literary artist a word is not merely a symbol, like a numerical sign: it is a separate entity, claiming a history, a lineage, and a host of particular associations, which differentiate it from other words symbolising the same thing; and it is with the associations of a word, almost as much as with the thing signified, that the literary artist is concerned. Now the spelling of a word is one of the outward signs by which its lineage is shown and by which it is connected in our minds with words of kindred meaning in our own and other languages, and the proposal to sweep away all these links with the past is scouted by the artist as an act of vandalism, wholly unjustifiable by mere utilitarian considerations. The fault, if there be a fault, lies not in our spelling, but in our pronunciation, and to give our careless articulation the support and authority of the written word is a weak concession to our slovenly speech.

Such is the line of argument which is invariably used to defend the existing system, and it may be considered to constitute a serious objection to the wholesale adoption of a purely phonetic system. It is, however, quite inadequate to defend the existing system as it stands; in fact, it will be found to tell more forcibly against it than in its favour. Many of the queer and awkward spellings with which our language is encumbered have as little claim to preservation on archæological grounds as the famous stone inscription found by Mr. Pickwick at Cobham. Many are, indeed, worse, for they serve but to obscure the true lineage and affinity of the word they represent and suggest another and false relationship. For example, our spelling of the word scent obscures the connection of the word with sense, sentiment, etc., and suggests a connection with ascent and descent. In the same way our spelling of the word whole serves only to dissociate it in our minds from the cognate words heal and hale. Consider carefully the process by which we have arrived at our present method of spelling the word scent. We have taken the Latin descendo, mispronounced it dissend, then assimilated the spelling of another and wholly unrelated word to our sloppy mispronunciation of the former. There is something pleasing in the notion of calling the result "orthography." Surely if there is any standard of right and wrong, except custom, such spellings need to be righted. Strange and fantastic are the origins of some of our anomalous spellings. The ch in ache is derived from a supposed connection with the Greek word achos; the ue in tongue from some dim association with the Latin lingua.

No motive, however, can be suggested for the eccentric appearance of such words as sleigh, scythe, ghost, quest, campaign, sovereign, and so forth, except a sort of pedantic snobbery—an affectation of superior knowledge on the part of the better-educated portion of the community, similar to the motive which prompted Mr. Bumble to denounce the law as a "hass."

It is said that a lady once asked a famous schoolmaster, lately deceased, whether he could assure her that only the sons of gentlemen were admitted to his school. "Madam," he replied, "if your son comes to this school, no inquiries will be made into his antecedents." However it may have been in the case of this youth, it is certain that the origin of many of our spellings will not bear too close a scrutiny; and this being so, it surely cannot reasonably be held an act of vandalism to reject them altogether and adopt in their place the simple phonetic spelling—which, moreover, has every other argument to recommend it.

Yet, even when the main position of the defence is found to be untenable, the path of the reformer is by no means clear. On the one hand there are the advocates of a purely phonetic system; on the other are those who argue on the æsthetic and archæological grounds which we have considered above. Nor is it easy to place this scheme on a practical footing; for it means not only altering the spelling of almost every word in the language, but also the introduction of a new and more extensive alphabet. For as soon as we attempt to confine each letter to one sound we shall find the existing letters quite insufficient to represent the sounds in actual use. Even then it may be questioned whether any phonetic system could be invented to represent the living speech as efficiently as our present system; for, in spite of its inconsistencies, the present method is capable of expressing not only the sounds of standard English, but also the finest shades and subtleties of local dialect. And, lastly, the scheme is, at the present time, quite impracticable, because there exists no means of popularising a phonetic system except its adoption by living authors, and, among the few writers in favour of reform, hardly one could be found so quixotic as to endanger the success of his work by acting as pioneer to such a movement.

On the other hand, there are those who prefer to retain the existing system but to abolish its most glaring faults and inconsistencies. Here, however, the difficulty is to find a standard of right and wrong which does not appear wholly arbitrary. It is not a question of curing a few diseased members, but of treating a body in which corruption has spread so far that there is no whole part left—of unravelling a tangle which has been steadily growing worse for centuries, until it is impossible to decide where one thread ends and another begins. The English language has collected its vocabulary from such a multitude of sources that there are often half-a-dozen correct ways of representing the same sound. Even when it is clear, therefore, that the existing spelling of a word is bad, it is by no means a simple matter to decide what method would be better. The moderate reformer has, therefore, an even more complicated problem to solve than the extremist.

Nevertheless, it would seem that reform must come sooner or later. The spelling of a word has no more hope of remaining immutable for all time than other human institutions. They must change or pass away when they are no longer subservient to human needs. If, then, there is to be a reform, why leave to another generation the kudos of initiating it? Is there no plan at once feasible and desirable at the present time?

We venture to suggest that the only plan answering to both these conditions is to reject forthwith all anomalous spellings which have no archæological foundation and to adopt in their place the spellings dictated by true etymology. We might reasonably hope that such a proposition would find favour among men of letters, who in the end form the only tribunal of orthography. That this principle is generally recognised as a sound one is proved by the fact that the absurd popular spelling of the words sovereign and rhyme has already been discarded by poets and stylists in favour of the true archaic spelling sovrán and ríme. The adoption of this principle would place the whole question of reform upon a different footing, for it would disturb the notion that the spelling of our language is irrevocably fixed for all time, and diminish the veneration most people feel towards the so-called correct spelling of a word. This would pave the way for further instalments of reform, and so by slow degrees, a silent revolution might be effected which would give our language a sane and useful orthography in place of the grotesque and useless skoliography by which it is now disfigured and encumbered.

A COSMOPOLITAN FOLK-SONG

THE world is for ever retelling the legend of the Sibylline Leaves. The Goths and Vandals of all ages wreck and destroy, and the fragments of their loot are painfully gathered up by future generations of men to be stored in museums and wrangled over by professors to the end of time. On occasion the Vandals may carry out their appointed task by Act of Parliament. The Commonwealth Commissioners, whose duty it was to tear down ecclesiastical buildings or, in the truculent language of the day, "to ding down the nests," were duly armed by precise instructions, contained in statutes passed with enthusiasm and looked upon as proof of the highest political wisdom. Surely our descendants will regard in the same light the labours of modern Parliaments. The predatory lust prompting men to destroy, to seize the property of the weaker side, to ride roughshod over the minority has burst out afresh in the twentieth century. It is to be charitably assumed that our contemporaries upon whom the mania has fallen really believe themselves inspired by airs from heaven. In the perspective of history men will realise that our current political lunacy is the product of a very different inspiration. The extant records of Cromwell's cathedral-wreckers would be amusing had their depredations not robbed us of a large part of our national architectural heritage. The Commissioners wrote, as we know, exultant reports of their exploits as church-breakers. The man who had succeeded in ripping off more lead or razing more altars and spires than his rival in the same trade demanded and received the commendation of his superiors.

The Folk Song Society has set itself to check the inevitable wastage and loss of our national possession of songs of the countryside. These sagas are relics of ages of unrecorded literary achievement. A ballad sprang up, no man knew how, and passed from village to village; the wandering minstrel was a veritable troubadour. In Iceland to-day he is actually fulfilling the same destiny; the Homeric age of vagrant song is there in full operation. Probably in no literature is there a more touching and beautiful picture than that in the prelude of the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," in which a weary old man is limned as wandering amid the uncongenial and scoffing, his precious harp carried by an orphaned child. We have the companion picture of the noble charity, the peerless womanliness of the high-born lady, her eye, quick to sympathy, rekindling the fire of a poet's ecstasy. Scott's introduction to his poem is a national possession:—

The present scene, the future lot,
His toils, his wants were all forgot:
Cold diffidence, and age's frost,
In the full tide of song were lost.

We have now for the last forty years experienced the somewhat ambiguous boon of compulsory State education. Among the unavoidable losses which it has brought in its wake has been the dying down of the folk-song. Each generation of modern men looks back with an instinct half-pitying on that which went before it. Young England congratulates itself on its access of superior intelligence. After all, youth is rightly the season of enthusiasm and callow judgment. One modern accomplishment, however, is a growing impatience of that slow burden of fugitive culture which finds expression in the country ballad. The laugh of a fuddled boor in a village alehouse may kill for ever the record of a song which has haunted a country for generations. The folk-song is primitive and intimate; it does not stop to pick its phrases. It expresses in terse language some crude desire or elemental phase of thought. Doubtless many such songs borrowed their root-idea from the miracle-play. Ecclesiastical legend reappears from age to age, and as by walking through a geological museum the moulding of evolution in type becomes patent to the most obtuse, so is it with the changes in form of a folk-song. We may see its history in the making.

The song which is the subject of this article evidently sprang from a primitive religious stock. The effort to solve elemental problems has been twisted into the strand of liturgical expression. The song is found here and there up and down the country, like some wayside weed, and a Hebrew variant of it exists. Probably, in passing from lip to lip, the original form and language have been many times modified or garbled. Eton College sings the Dorsetshire edition, which closely agrees with that now to be quoted—i.e., the ballad as sung by Cornish fisher-folk. Although its roots penetrate the soil of the past, its blossom has been a thing of modern service, for Sir Arthur Sullivan, when writing the music of "The Yeomen of the Guard," is said to have borrowed the air, "I have a song to sing, O!" from a local rendering of this ballad. Be that as it may, the old ditty is rich in quaint reminders. It is sung in Cornwall alternately in solo and chorus, and runs thus:—

SOLO—Come, I will sing you.

CHORUS—What will you sing me?

I will sing you my one, oh!

What is your one, oh!

My one is all alone and ever must remain so.

Come I will sing you.

What will you sing me?

I will sing you my two, oh!

What is your two, oh?

My two for the lily-white babes, clothed all in green, oh!

(Introduction repeated with each number.)

My three is the three great rivals.

My four is the gospel makers.

My five is the ferrymen in the boat of them a stranger.

My six is for the tearful mater.

My seven are the seven stars in the sky.

My eight is for the eight reigners.

My nine is for the nine bright shiners.

My ten is for the ten commanders.

It is permissible to surmise that this song was a sort of catechism or rehearsal of the elementals, and that it was once upon a time chanted in village dame schools in the West Country. Its origin would quite likely take us into the regions of some form of miracle-play—i.e., that in which the priest chanted and the people made response, in the manner of a lesson to be rehearsed. The first response obviously indicates the One God. The second may be an allusion to the Infant Saviour and St. John the Baptist. "Lily-white maids" is a variant reading, this phrase being primitively applicable to either sex. The Scotch version—"the lily and the rose, that shine baith red and green"—was probably annexed from some other song and incorporated. The third stanza doubtless stands for the Trinity, and the fourth for the Evangelists. The fifth is more obscure, and ten different versions of the phrasing exist. It has been ingeniously construed by Mr. Andrew Lang as symbolising the wounds in Christ's body, four in the hands and feet and one in the side, though the connection between the words and the interpretation is difficult to see. The sixth seems to render more certain the impression that this fragment is of ecclesiastical origin, if Mr. Lang's guess as to its reference to Mater Dolorosa be correct. A number of versions in which the words "bowls," "pots," "jars," &c., occur have been taken as making it apply to the six water-pots in Cana of Galilee. The figure seven probably recalls the seven stars in the hand of the mystic figure of the Apocalypse, or perhaps stars in glory round the Virgin's head, or it may be the seven stars of Charles's Wain. The eighth may be taken with some certainty as a reference to the archangels, and the ninth indicates the interval of nine months intervening between the Annunciation and Christmas. The figure ten obviously refers to the Ten Commandments. Some of the versions add two other stanzas:—

Eleven for the eleven that went up to Heaven.

Twelve for the twelve Apostles.

The former is supposed to refer to the number of the Apostles without Judas Iscariot. "Eleven maidens in a dance" is the Scotch reading, and "Belsher's horses" that of Berkshire.

A considerable literature has sprung up about this quaint folk-song. In "English County Songs," by Miss Broadwood and Mr. Fuller-Maitland, references to published matter about it are given in some detail. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould publishes a version in his "Songs of the West," and another is given in Mr. Cecil Sharp's "Folk Songs from Somerset," Series IV.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE AMBIGU-COMIQUE—II.

By MARC LOGÉ

AFTER the Revolution Audinot retired, and thenceforth his theatre passed into the hands of many managers, none of whom had great success. In 1798 Corsse, a well-known actor of the Théâtre Montansier, resolved to undertake the direction of the Ambigu, and managed to interest a rich capitalist in the speculation. Together they made their venture, but success was long in coming. After several months, however, a melodrama by Aude which enjoyed considerable vogue contributed to the rehabilitation of the theatre. It was called "Madame Angot au Sérail de Constantinople." Such a triumph had never been witnessed on a Parisian stage, and at that epoch was altogether unprecedented: two hundred consecutive performances did not weary the delight and interest of the public. Corsse's success dated from that time, and he successively produced other melodramas, whose suggestive titles—"Le Jugement de Salomon," "La Forêt d'Hermannstadt"—drew all the theatre-going Parisians to the Ambigu-Comique, and brought into its coffers more than eleven hundred thousand francs in fifteen years! It would be natural to suppose that the authors of such successful plays would have made fine fortunes. Alas! the reverse was the case, and Brazier indignantly asks:—

What do you think the men who contributed so largely to the making of good receipts received as royalties? I will tell you. A comedy in one Act was bought at that time for two hundred francs, paid once for all. And the author of a play in three Acts received nine francs per representation.

Present-day dramatic authors would do well to ponder over these figures, and to compare them with the relatively important sums they actually receive for their plays!

Audinot's son assumed the management of the Ambigu-Comique on the death of Corsse, which occurred in 1816. And, amusing to note, a terrifying play, "L'Auberge des Adrets," which was expected to score a considerable success as a melodrama, did in truth achieve a triumph, though of another kind, for the celebrated actor Frédéric Lemaître, transformed—thanks to his inimitable talent—the fearsome "mélo" into a delightful comedy. For several years this great artist had been winning the unlimited admiration of the public, and it was of him that Théophile Gautier said:—

C'est toujours un beau et noble spectacle que de voir ce grand acteur, le seul qui chez nous rappelle Garrick, Kemble, Macready, et surtout Kean, faire trembler de son vaste souffle Shakespearien les frères portants des coulisses des scènes du Boulevard. Frédéric a ce privilège d'être terrible et comique, élégant et trivial, féroce et tendre, de pouvoir descendre jusqu'à la farce et monter jusqu'à la poésie la plus sublime, comme tous les acteurs complets.

The success the Ambigu-Comique now enjoyed was too great to continue without some serious mishap. After having existed for nearly three-quarters of a century, the old playhouse of the Boulevard du Temple was destroyed by a fire which occurred during the night of July 13th, 1827, after an evening performance, in the course of the rehearsal of a melodrama called "La Tabatière." The scenery caught alight, and in less than an hour the whole theatre was destroyed, whilst a fireman and the porter perished in the flames. This event caused a real consternation amongst the Parisian population, with whom the Ambigu was a favourite place of amusement. A few days after the accident the Ministre de l'Intérieur granted Audinot's widow the privilege, until 1840, of opening another playhouse, stipulating, however, that it should be isolated on both sides. There happened to be for sale at that time the hôtel of M. de Murinais, situated between the Rue de Bondy and the Boulevard St. Martin, at the corner of the Rue de Lancry—a few steps from where the grand old Porte St. Martin, erected in 1674 by Pierre Bullet, in commemoration of Louis XIV.'s triumphs over the Spanish, Dutch, and German armies, still towers grimly and majestically in the midst of that populous quarter of Paris. The new proprietors of the Ambigu-Comique acquired the plot of land, and two years after its destruction the Ambigu rose triumphantly on the site where it still stands, and opened on June 7th, 1829, under the patronage of the Duchesse de Berry. Its removal from the Boulevard du Temple, where most of the theatres of that time were situated, to the Boulevard St. Martin seems, however, to have brought ill-luck. Managers succeeded each other unceasingly, but tried in vain to restore the theatre's ancient brilliancy. Frédéric Lemaître was himself for a time stage-manager, and the celebrated Mme. Dorval was engaged. Referring to her, Théophile Gautier observes:—

Le talent de Mme. Dorval était tout passionné, non qu'elle négligeât l'art mais l'art lui venait de l'inspiration. Elle ne calculait pas son jeu geste par geste, et ne dessinait pas ses entrées et ses sorties avec de la craie sur le plancher. Elle se mettait dans la situation du personnage, elle l'épousait complètement, elle devenait lui, et agissait comme il aurait agi.

Though possessing those two great stars, the new Ambigu knew no success until 1845, when "Les Mousquetaires," by Alexandre Dumas, achieved a real triumph which had no rival until 1856, when Paul Meurice wrote specially for that theatre "Fanfan la Tulipe," in which the leading part was created by Mélingue—by the impetuous, ardent, and brilliant Mélingue, who was a real artist in more ways than one. It is said that in another of M. Paul Meurice's dramas, entitled "Benvenuto Cellini," Mélingue actually modelled each night on the stage a statuette of Hebe, a feat which provoked popular enthusiasm. It was also at the Ambigu-Comique that M. Jules Claretie—now the eminent administrator of the Comédie Française—made his début as a dramatist with the enthralling "Famille des Gueux," which he wrote in collaboration with an Italian author.

Like many of the theatres of the capital, the Ambigu-Comique kept its doors open during the Siege of Paris, and each night a play, well adapted to the circumstances of the moment, "Le Forgeron de Châteaudun," was presented; in one act a cuirassier came forward and related in eloquent accents, punctuated by forceful gestures, the famous charge of Reichshofen; and in the entr'actes a collection in aid of the wounded was made by cantinières, who passed in the midst of the audience holding Prussian helmets, into which the offerings were dropped. Until 1879 the Ambigu-Comique seems to have suffered from another slack time, but at that date its old walls re-echoed once more with the sounds of tempestuous applause and excited discussions. This was when Zola's "Assommoir" was first produced, in which the part of Coupeau the drunkard was created by Gil Naza; in later years Lucien Guitry was to make a sensational personification of that same rôle. In 1883 Réjane appeared at the Ambigu in Richepin's "La Glu," and the delightful actress obtained therein a very justified success. Between 1883 and 1896 the Ambigu had two great triumphs in totally different styles: one was "Les Gaietés de l'Escadron," by Courteline, one of the gayest and most amusing plays ever produced, the other was "Les Deux Gosses," by Pierre Decourcelle, a typical melodrama of the most thrilling type, which ran for 751 nights. Leading parts were taken by such remarkable actors as Gémier—now director of the Théâtre Antoine, where some of the most curious artistic efforts are made during the winter season—Arquillière, now engaged at the Vaudeville, and Marthe Mellot, whose exquisite voice was in Edmond Rostand's "Chantecler" the soul of the invisible nightingale.

Of late years the Ambigu-Comique has remained faithful to its old traditions; the house has in no way been modified since 1827, and the very audience seems to be the same—gay, childish, emotional, quickly irritated, prompt to hiss, ready to applaud, delighting in sinister plots, and weeping willingly at the tribulations of the pale, resigned heroine. Indeed it is perhaps on a popular night of a successful play at the Ambigu-Comique that one may best study the salient characteristics of the Parisian population. Listening to the ejaculations and the jokes which the occupants of the cheaper seats hurl at the actors one will form an idea of the nature of that exceedingly complex and amusing being the Parisian gavroche. As a specimen of the wit of the gavroche the following anecdote is characteristic:—At the fall of the curtain on the first night of a play in which the entr'actes had been particularly long, one of the actors, according to the usual custom, came forward and announced, "Ladies and gentlemen, the play you have just heard is by M. X——." Immediately from the gallery came the shrill interrogation: "Eh ben! Et par qui que sont les 'entraques'?" ("I say! And who are the interludes by?")

FOREIGN REVIEWS

"DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU"

THE July number celebrates the eightieth birthday of Herr Julius Rodenberg, the founder and editor of the review, which is itself in its thirty-seventh year. A reproduction of the medal presented to mark the occasion to the distinguished writer by his publisher, Dr. Paetel, and other admirers, serves as frontispiece to the number. The history of the review and its editor is to be found in the Literarisches Echo for June 15th.

Freiherr von Heyking contributes a very interesting article on Mexico and its history. The early days, the oppressions and bitternesses are well described. The period of the revolutions is attributed to the wealth of the Church; the two parties were the leeches and the robbers, and the writer satirically comments on the coincidence that the end of Church property and the end of internal troubles came at about the same time. The luckless attempt of Archduke Maximilian is narrated at some length. A very curious observation of Bismarck's is recorded on the danger of German colonists in Mexico, and the advisability of intervention. "After all," said the Chancellor, "Germans who for their business ends go and settle in such out-of-the-way wildernesses ought to see for themselves that they are courting a certain amount of risk." Freiherr von Heyking has legitimate comments to make. The rule of President Diaz, praised for some points, is pretty severely criticised as a whole. Fresh revolutions is the forecast for the future. Herr Körte has an excellent article on Callimachus of Cyrene, whom he calls a "Greek romantic," justifying the term ingeniously. An essay with the Goethesque title "Dichtung und Wahrheit" follows, in which a few new answers to Pilate's great question are suggested. One of the starting-points of the essay is a side-light thrown on Goethe's character by a contemporary, Soret. Goethe had fits of tyrannical bad humour, it seems, of which Eckermann breathes not a word, and the author of the article ("T") raises the question whether Eckermann has in this matter dealt fairly with the world. Herr Dickhuth continues his comparison of Napoleon and Frederick the Great, Dr. von der Leyden has an article on the inception of German railways, and there are some new documents on the relations of Goethe and Kotzebue. Altogether a very good number.

"LA GRANDE REVUE"

The number for June 25th contains an interesting analysis of an eleventh-century Mystery of St. Sebastian. The writer of the article, M. Gustave Cohen, takes the opportunity to judge M. d'Annunzio's recent work by the standard of a classical mystery, and he concludes, without unnecessary indignation, that the modern attempt entirely lacks the mediæval atmosphere; M. d'Annunzio "a trahi le genre . . . en l'embellissant." M. Francis Delaisi has a peculiarly illuminating summary of the conditions in Morocco. M. Marius Richard states in a concise and straightforward fashion the arguments against State ownership of the French mines. M. Roger Lévy uses new documents to give a more or less consecutive, if summary, Life of Talleyrand; the early years of the diplomatist abound in lacunæ, of which some are here filled up, others merely indicated. M. Yves Scantrel has a delightfully scathing article on Ingres, who is still to the fore in the French reviews. M. Charles Ferrand begins a series of attacks on the existing naval administration of France. He deplores some of the effects of the spirit of égalité on the fleet, and he considers the present over-centralisation of business the great bar to progress. He has a good axiom on the subject of false economy—"The more costly the material the more should we spend to assure its effective use."

The first July number is of more than ordinary interest. M. Ferrand continues his articles, as does M. Louis Laloy, whose subject is opium and morphine; he is almost an apologist of the former drug. A symposium on the influence of barrack-life leaves a most dreary impression; optimists on this subject are rare. M. Charles Chassé's article—"Les Styles Professionnels"—is full of delightful wit and observation; we particularly like the section on "Les Styles Pédagogiques," and the academical habit of "thinking in inverted commas." M. Robert d'Humières is good on twentieth-century Socialism, taking for his text a book of M. Edmond Kelly. The Socialism here expounded is new and refreshing, with suggestions of "Strength and Beauty met together." M. Scantrel is again amusing, with a battery of epigrams on culture versus civilisation. M. Charles Humbert deals with Indo-China, its history since M. Doumer's day, and its future. Two French books on England are criticised—"Silhouettes Anglaises," by M. Puaux and M. Bardoux' book on our last three Sovereigns.

"LE MERCURE DE FRANCE"

It is impossible to do more than indicate roughly the contents of the two voluminous July numbers of this excellent periodical, whose aim is to occupy a peculiar position among French reviews—by throwing open its doors to every opinion and by devoting special attention to foreign literature. Its opinions are generally expressed strongly; thus, M. Georges Batault is unsparing in his criticism of the Richepin manifesto (he distinguishes, by the way, between Latin and the Humanities), and M. Emile Henriot, in an admirable article on Gautier, says that his hero was the poet of the nineteenth century. Another good and sympathetic article in the July 1st number is on the ideas of William Morris, by M. Georges Vidalenc. For July 16th M. A.-M. Gossez has written an excellent study of Flaubert's methods—"Homais et Bovary, hommes politiques." M. Paterne Berrichon describes the relations of Verlaine and Arthur Rimbaud, and discusses the claims of the latter to a separate pinnacle of fame. Dr. Paul Voivenel's article on disease and literature is interesting in itself and contains some beautiful mad-house poetry.

"LA REVUE"

In the number for July 1st Madame Marguerite Prévost marshals, under the title "Punir ou Guérir," an array of respectable opinion on the proper method of dealing with criminals; for the most part she gleans little but pious wishes for the success of her educative campaign in the prisons. M. Vandervelde, Belgian Socialist Deputy, has a good contribution to that baffling problem—the accurate definition of Socialism; he wishes to see the distinction recognised between the State as governor and the State as administrator. M. Faguet, always readable, has an article on Eugène Bersot, schoolmaster and journalist under Louis Philippe and Napoleon III. Ly Chao Pée has a lurid picture of affairs in China, and Dr. Frances Hoggan an optimistic one of the American negress, whose domestic life and public spirit seem to be above praise; her thirst for knowledge is graphically illustrated, as also her extraordinary ability in certain professions: one negress doctor has performed 500 surgical operations in two years. We also find a eulogistic notice of Marc Logé's translation of "Chita," by Lafcadio Hearn. A woodcut in a review is prettily christened "Entrée du Collège d'Oxford."

The second July number contains a notice of the Auto biography of Mr. Alfred Austin; an amusing mis-print represents Lord Salisbury as "n'employant que des larmes loyales." Mr. Galsworthy's "Patrician" is reviewed, and a short survey of his whole work made. M. Paul-Louis Hervier in "les Sonnets de Shakespeare" shows himself an ardent Baconian, and, though some of his evidence is rather thin, he makes some good points. M. Auguste Rodin, in an interview, deplores the vandalism of modern Paris, justly identifying the ancient beauty with the ancient strength. The extraordinary diary of Marie Bashkirtseff at the age of twelve is one of the features of the number.

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

This weekly review keeps a very high level. It has a certain frondeur tendency, which is not without charm. Thus, take the article of M. Paul Flat on "The Academy and the Question of the Humanities." The Academy's point of view is strongly supported, while the learned Forty themselves are treated with almost too scant courtesy. M. Flat believes in the democracy, he believes in the classics, and he believes in an alliance between the two. To the same number (that of June 17th) M. Lucien Maury contributes a suggestive criticism of M. Hanotaux' "Jeanne d'Arc." In the number for June 24th M. Gustave de Coutouly begins a series of diplomatical souvenirs connected with the Balkans question after the Congress of Berlin; they are admirably told, and are continued in alternate numbers. M. Lémonon sums up the question of the House of Lords with apparently Conservative sympathies. For July 1st M. Louis Barthou has unpublished documents of Lamartine, and M. Labroue gives a grim account of Japanese Imperialism. For July 8th and 15th there is a story of Maxime Gorki's; in the former number M. Jacques Lux recapitulates a Viennese account of the relations between George Sand and Chopin; in the latter M. Pourcher advocates a return to the cavalry organisation of Napoleon. For July 22nd there is the beginning of the "Lettres de Vieillesse" of Littré, a good article on the cahiers of 1789 by Mme. Edmé Champiou, and a short reprint from the Hamburger Nachrichten on Oscar Wilde. There is something very poignant in his exegi monumentum, and his acknowledgment that "he had found his soul in prison." We must not forget the interesting excerpts from Wagner's letters, which are to be found in the numbers June 17th to July 15th, inclusive.

"LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE"

This sober and workmanlike little review makes a virtue of conciseness. Its particular interest in religious controversy is largely due to the presence of ex-Abbé Loisy on its staff. In the number for July 8th he has an ironical notice of "Les religions," by M. Chachoin. The following week he devotes himself largely to Father Tyrrell, two of whose books have lately been translated into French; on July 22nd he deals mostly with medical critiques of the Gospels. In the number for July 15th we may also notice M. Bastide's criticism of Professor Firth's "House of Lords during the Civil War"; he considers it an unconscious defence of the existing Peers.

"PARISIANA"

This is not strictly a foreign review. It is an entirely English view of the "Gay City," and is made up of articles, well written, by the way, but ready to be ashamed of themselves if they show too great a tendency to be literary, on such subjects as the History of Racing in France, a History of Gambling in the same country, and on a Night-out at Montmartre. The pictures are particularly clever.

A DEAD JESUIT TOWN

By W. H. KOEBEL

THERE are shells on the beach from which the life has passed, delicate structures choked with sand. Former haunts of the mussel and hermit crab, the translation of their dead owners—if so fragile a passing be considered worthy of any thought whatever—should evoke regret. Yet the ghost of a hermit crab who seized the work of another and squatted within an empty shell must expect less sympathy than that of a mussel who has borne the burden of his home throughout.

It is a perilous introductory route this to the dead Jesuit city of Apostoles, since in actuality far North-eastern Argentina is not to be reached by way of the seashore. There is no salt sand in Apostoles; softer masses of forest and flower choke the ruins here. Yet the analogy between the deserted human and marine shells carries sufficiently far. It has not yet been decided whether the living Apostoles should rank in history as a hermit crab or as a mussel. So little lack of fruitless dispute has already attended the question that this vagueness of judgment promises to remain eternal. Whatever may be said of ways, and motives, and tenets, one thing is certain. The degree of labour expended amongst the Indians is as unquestionable as the triumph of civilisation, as commonly understood.

A mere sketch of a wondrously beautiful spot holds no place for polemics. There are half-way houses even in the sky, and neutral tints between the azure and storm-black. Let us suppose that the character of the great Jesuit Republic lay at a point midway between the poles of blessings and curses. It is the most reasonable view. In this case, seeing that angel's wings and devil's horns cancel one another, we arrive at an arithmetical result. We obtain, in fact, ordinary men, labouring hard amidst the Indians, joining worldly shrewdness to sanctity. It was not a very high heaven that the dusky neophytes saw through the material spectacles of stomach and the senses that the Jesuit Fathers provided. It was the only practical appeal, and it lifted the natives from the deep slough of savagery that had been their lot.

In order to understand the tragedy of Apostoles it is necessary to compare the past with the present. A few extracts will suffice from some of the contemporary chroniclers who wrote when the streets, buildings, churches, and plazas were prosperous, intact, and populated. Here is a brief account of the ceremony observed on a special saint's day:—

The inhabitants attend in great numbers, the officers on horseback and in their uniforms. The solemnity begins by a very fine military procession in which the Alfarez, who carries the great standard, appears mounted on a proud courser richly caparisoned, and rides under a magnificent canopy. After perambulating the principal streets in very good order to the sound of the drums and other warlike instruments of music, they repair to the great door of the church . . . the first Vespers are then performed, after which the children are made to dance in the great square.

There was more than this, as is explained in many pages. There were tiltings at the ring, gatherings of chiefs and officers, prize-givings, illuminated streets and bonfires. A royal time for the Indians, this, when they hung on their uniforms and trappings, and strutted in peacock pride. Yet there were others that altogether outrivalled it in pomp:—

Nothing can compare with the procession of the Blessed Sacrament. It forms a sight which yields in nothing to the richest and most magnificent procession in any other part of the world. . . . All the beauties of simple nature are there so happily disposed as to represent her in all her glory. She even appears, if I may say so, all life and soul on the occasion; for over the greens and flowers that compose the triumphal arches under which the Blessed Sacrament passes there appear flocks of birds of every colour, tied by the legs to strings of such a length that a stranger would imagine they enjoyed their full liberty, and even come of their own accord to mix their warblings with the voices of the musicians and the rest of the people, and bless in their own way Him Whose providence carefully supplies all their wants.

All the streets are hung with carpets very well wrought and separated by garlands, festoons, and compartments of verdure, disposed with the most beautiful symmetry. From distance to distance there appear lions and tigers very well chained, that they may not disturb the solemnity instead of adorning it, and even very fine fishes sporting and playing in large basins of water. . . . The warbling of the birds, the roaring of the lions and tigers, the voices of the musicians, the plain chant of the choir, all intermix without confusion, and conspire to form a concert not to be equalled in any other part of the world.

There is no doubting the final statement. It is otherwise with the alleged blending of the voices of men, beasts, and birds. But this, after all, is a mere matter of opinion. Harmony is akin to morality in that its standards hinge on geography. It is easy to sneer at the writers of a past age whose enthusiasm led them, blindfold, into regions of unsuspected humour. Those were queer birds, for instance, who found it in their temperament to strain at a fettering-string and simultaneously to warble out blessings.

With the exception of such debatable points the picture is accurate. Apostoles was one of a number of centres in which work and play, prayer and pomp, chanting and feasting, were carried on in precisely similar fashion. Now the site of the town is a wooded expanse, the great walls and blocks of masonry looming here and there in furtive solidity amidst the tangle of branches and leaves.

It is worth while to enter one of the lanes that intersect this forest. At the first glimpse the way might be mistaken for an English woodland vista. But not for long. The sunshine that comes beating down upon the narrow winding path would blind a primrose or a bluebell, and send its petals shrivelling. The walls of foliage are closer set, more varied and mysterious than those of the oak, elm, or beech. The butterflies and blossoms flaunt their beauty like women, rivals in gorgeous hues, kissing all the while.

No virgin forest this; so much is evident from the character of the growths. Holding their own sturdily against the native trunks are great orange-trees, whose dark branches go soaring upwards to join the tops of the true forest trees themselves, hanging out their golden balls in the midst of the bignonia and of the gaudy wealth of other blossoms. This is the fruit of the dead Jesuits. If you wish to change the face of Nature with any degree of permanency employ Nature as an ally for the purpose! Else why should the intruding orange-trees stand erect and a small block of stone at their feet be all that remains of a building that once sat in such cumbrous solidity upon the ground?

There is not a doubt about it: this poor stone block is being airily and gracefully mocked. It is a fallen capital. The intricacy of its carving is flouted by the more delicate sprays of the living fern that rest against it; blossoms sprout from the earth in its deepest crevice, and all about it the fallen oranges are wasting the remnants of their sweetness.

Further on are the massive remnants of a wall. In the open the ruins would be imposing enough, since in parts they rise to a height of some twenty feet. Here the vegetation has claimed them for its own, and has swathed them about with its own growths until they seem to have become an integral part of the forest. Fern, flowers, and the giant arms of the cactus cover the dark stone; shrubs and liana tendrils press in towards its sides, while the leaves and blossoms of the trees spread a dense curtain above.

Some ruins are desolate things, but not these. Nothing, in fact, could be desolate amidst such surroundings. This may have been a church here, who knows? The walls may have formed part of one of those great buildings with their wonderful altars and decorations, that it was the priests' proud boast to compare with any in Europe. But I doubt if there are many who could tell now; certainly there is no one in the neighbourhood capable of more than a chance supposition.

The human element of the present day enters very little into the real significance of Apostles. It is these monuments of the past, broken and smothered as they are, that dwarf all else in the imagination. They could not be better placed. The spot, for all its exuberance, is a natural garden. It is difficult to conceive how the glades could be touched and yet fail to lose in beauty. Only one addition could possibly be introduced with success into their midst, and by a thrice fortunate chance it happens to be there. It is represented by the old, dark stone walls that have become an intrinsic part of the forest.

At one point in the masonry is a niche that holds the remnants of a worn and mutilated statue. Armless and headless, it is an object that retains very little contour or symmetry of any kind. It once stood for a figure of the Virgin, and was laden, so they say, with bracelets and rich ornaments of gold and silver. Hence the mutilation of the stone, for the treasure was to be wrenched away by no other means when the day of spoliation came.

Curiously enough, the broken statue is still surrounded by as great a wealth of blossom as it could ever have known in the days when it reposed in the hush of the walled and roofed interior, and when the garlands of cut blooms were brought in to encircle it. The flowers have banked their glowing masses of colour in a strangely ordered fashion to right and left, lighting up the sad tints of the battered figure. Were there more folk in the neighbourhood, the thing would doubtless give rise to some talk of a miracle. As it is, Nature is doing her kindly work quite unapplauded.

Ah, well! Let us come out of the forest and leave its beauty to the butterflies and to the birds. Reflections on mere scenic glamour and on the dead past are unprofitable work nowadays. In a cattle-country the ghosts of a thousand ancient Jesuits are not worth the material price of a single heifer. Nevertheless there is something here for which to be thankful. There are worse conditions than that of mere neglect. What if this perfect woodland, with its imprisoned ruins, were ever to grow popular! The world is shrinking at such a pace that almost all things are possible at any time. Imagine booths under the white trumpet blossoms of the datura, spirits and beer in the shade of the evergreens and palms, and soiled paper on the dark stone of the ruins! There would be no litter of oranges then to waste their sweetness upon the ground; the jetsam would be of another order. But why pursue the subject further? Such imaginings are impossible.

DEATH DUTIES AND UNEMPLOYMENT

THE corroboration of the accuracy of the deductive method of reasoning by the later evolution of actualities is never without its interest and charm. To the untutored it might even savour of witchcraft. This is especially the case in matters sociological and economic. In that sphere of knowledge, dealing as it does alone with the material world, it is so ludicrously easy and so absolutely safe to play the part of prophet. And perhaps in no period in the world's history has the legislator held out greater temptation to those capable of indulging their prognosticating proclivities than in these days. He is singularly naïve in this regard. He gets an idea, founded generally on the grievance of the few, sits on it, and in due time hatches it into a ponderous enactment. But it never seems to occur to him that the consequences of even the simplest human action are incalculable and eternal, and it certainly never seems to occur to him that the joint action of some hundreds of his fellow-men called a majority may produce effects so far-reaching that through generations upon generations they are beyond all repair. Did he realise this palpable truth, surely he and his colleagues at Westminster would never continue to turn out as if by machinery the mass of foolish, fallacious—one might even say criminal—enactments for which they must for all time stand responsible. It is all a natural and logical result of trying to govern without a knowledge of the science of government.

The self-stultifying process is simple. A Bill is framed for the suppression of an evil, or a supposed evil. Of course the Bill deals, in deference to the trend of popular delusion, which virtually always runs counter to scientific truth, with an effect rather than a cause. Great precautions are taken and extreme ingenuity is exercised to meet the case at all points, to provide in fact against all contingencies. The Bill may appear to be a model of State solicitude for the welfare and happiness of the citizen. It may be so elaborate and so complex as to seem perfect as a protector of some class interest. And yet, however perfect this precious Bill may seem to be, it will contain inevitably within itself, even as there be a worm in the bud, a colossal and what should be a palpable flaw. Even if it be admitted that this Bill has left no conditions unconsidered, yet will there be, so soon as it is passed, one condition that has not been considered. And why? Simply because, though it has dealt with all the factors, it has left, and perforce must leave, its own consequences untouched. The fact is always forgotten or ignored that this Act, like a tribe of others, is the cardinal cause of newborn circumstances, the parent of a whole progeny of unlooked-for conditions, and that these conditions, so soon as they come into play and intensify the troubles of the unfortunate citizen, have to be dealt with, and often more drastically, in their turn.

Surely this should be clear not merely to the responsible legislator at Westminster, but even to the irresponsible man in the street? For is it not written in the plainest terms in the multitude of Amendment Acts that crowd our Statute-books—each and all an open confession of a previous mistake? What wonder that there is trouble in the land, that there are the haunting spectres of the slum and the sweater's den, an ever-increasing proletariat, an augmented migration to the towns, a diminishing population, a constant strife of malcontents, and lugubrious forebodings passed from one to another among those in high places.

A striking example of this blindfold, blundering class of legislation has lately cropped up, and it is more or less a replica of hosts of others. The story is worth telling to those who care to hear. But, as the French buffoon said: "Let us commence with the commencement."

In doing this there is no need to go over the whole history of Succession Duties and their consequences from the vicissima hereditatum of the ancient Romans through centuries of legislative tamperings with capital. Nor is it necessary to allude at any length to the controversies that have clustered round this fallacious form of revenue collection. Even some of the most widely recognised authorities have pronounced these Duties sound and harmless, while others have condemned them on the ground that they tend to check production and thrift. But as to the details of the manner in which they prove to be beneficent or detrimental, this is more or less left to the imagination of the student. It is therefore the more imperative to point out why and how Death Duties not only inflict an injury upon the estate-holder upon whom they are levied, but also upon the working class in an even more serious degree; for they represent attacks on capital, and every blow inflicted on capital must inevitably be a blow dealt at labour.

Some twenty years ago Sir William Harcourt introduced his Death Duties Bill. It was opposed by the Unionists with greater vehemence than strength. It was passed; and when the Opposition once more became the Government, they accepted the Act with the pernicious principles it embodied with the docility so characteristic of the chameleon-like career of our modern Parliamentarians. In more recent years Mr. Lloyd George has in his turn handled the subject and gone further than his predecessor in the matter of this predatory class of legislation. Both enactments have been received by the public either with apathy or a mild outburst of shallow protest. Adverse criticisms, based upon the close reasoning out of the economic and sociological consequences of such onslaughts upon capital, were, to say the least, few and far between. One work there was, however, which set forth in detail exactly what would happen. It was published in 1890—that is, just at the time Sir William Harcourt's Act was passed. The predictions in this work were to this effect. It set forth that the burden of taxation will be found always to fall finally upon the working class. It showed how, immediately the Act came into operation, two things would happen. The estate-holder would either make a free gift of his estate during his lifetime to his heir, in order to evade the law; or he would at once start to save in order that at his death his heir would be in a position to meet the Duties without drawing upon capital. It was further pointed out that the estate-holder, by way of saving the required sum, would at once begin to cut down his retinue, and instruct his agent to be more exacting in the collection of rents as well as more sparing in expenditure. Thus hands, very often old and trusty, on the estate would be dismissed and expenses generally curtailed.

That this prophecy has been fulfilled over and over again, and is being further fulfilled as month by month slips by, is but another and glaring proof of how we English people are blundering headlong towards a morass which, if we only use our mental vision, we can see clearly ahead of us and avoid. We constantly see how landlords have been, and are being, forced to sell their estates, often to alien purchasers, or are compelled to abandon all idea of living in their ancestral home until such time as their house can be set in order. Yesterday it was the Duke of Rutland who was pushed to this act; to-day it is the Marquess of Ailesbury, who has been obliged to let Savernake, while the Duke of Bedford has sold five hundred thousand pounds worth of land at Tavistock and with the proceeds is purchasing land in Canada. And there are scores upon scores of other victims of this mischievous and maladroit aggression upon capital.

As to the evasion of the law, I well remember the late Lord Fortescue, when discussing with me the question of dairy-farming in Ireland, saying in reference to his estate, with that touch of gentle humour so characteristic of him, "When I speak of my estate, I should say my son's; for, in deference to Sir William Harcourt, I have made a gift of it to my heir." What a modern instance of the ancient saying, donationes inter vivos!

It has been reserved to Lord Ailesbury recently, in a most able speech at Savernake, thoroughly to confirm the above maleficent effect of these Duties. The striking diagnosis of the evil consequences of State tampering with capital is thus at last finding its relentless confirmation in the eyes of landlords, tenants, and labourers alike. It is interesting to follow and note Lord Ailesbury's conclusions culled from actualities. He states that his father "employed some forty men looking after the woods and the private roads and seeing that the forest was kept in order. It was absolutely impossible for him (the present Marquess) to do the same. It was not he who suffered so much as the men to whom employment meant a living." Again, "The money that should be spent in employment was diverted into the Exchequer, and it was done in a sudden and arbitrary manner, instead of being spread over a large number of years."

Here is a distinct case of pauperising the people by meddling legislation. And having brought about unemployment by reckless attacks on capital and upon the liberty of the labourer and the capitalist in scores of other cases, the supposed guardians of the public welfare come forth with proposals and plans to deal with the Unemployed Problem which they themselves have created!

There is no excuse for all this. The pretext of revenue-collecting will not hold. There are other and healthier means by which to maintain the official mechanism than by impeding the progress of agriculture, industry, and commerce. The acquiescence in such a policy is probably due to the lingering superstition that taxes enrich the State and therefore benefit the people. But the enrichment of the State is in no way profitable to the people; in fact, it could easily be shown to be one of the great causes of their impoverishment. Does any lowering of taxes and rates, any diminution of the increasing army of inspectors, take place under this system? Let working men take an unpublished story about Lord Beaconsfield to heart. It has its application. He was present at a Mission sermon for the clothing of some blacks, and it was noticed that as the plate was presented he placed one halfpenny in it, and that when it passed him again on its return journey along the pew he dropped a sovereign into it. When asked why he had done this, his reply was, "Well, you see, I put in the halfpenny for the poor blacks; the sovereign to ensure its reaching them."

By LANCELOT LAWTON

THE MOROCCAN QUESTION

THE patriotic utterances of Mr. Balfour in the House of Commons last week, following as they did upon the authoritative pronouncement of the Premier in regard to the Moroccan situation, had a calming effect upon the troubled waters of European diplomacy:—

If (declared the Leader of the Opposition) there be any observers or critics outside these walls who have counted upon our differences and our absorption in the bitter home disputes of the moment in the hope that they will make easy a policy which under other circumstances they thought this country might object to—if there are any who suppose that we are wiped out from the map of Europe because we have our own differences at home, it may be worth while saying, for the benefit of those whom it may concern, that they have utterly mistaken the temper of the British people and the patriotism of the Opposition, whether the Opposition be drawn from one side of the House or from the other side of House.

After the amazing exhibitions of passionate party strife earlier in the week, some such declaration as that made by Mr. Balfour became absolutely necessary in the interests of High Policy. As I pointed out in the last issue of THE ACADEMY, Germany, in making her daring coup d'état, counted not a little upon the advantage to be gained from the crisis in English affairs. She imagined—vainly imagined, as events have happily proved—that so pre-occupied should we be with domestic difficulties that we should stand aloof from our friends. While the proceedings in Parliament have perceptibly cleared the atmosphere, which was rapidly becoming charged with explosive currents, we are warned on all sides that there is no justification for the opinion entertained in several quarters that the crisis is virtually at an end. At present the situation, briefly described, is as follows: for the time being the diplomatic conversations in progress are confined to Germany and France. Germany has expressed her willingness to forego all claims to territorial acquisition or political influence of any kind in Morocco, provided that her commercial interests are safeguarded. In return for this concession she requires from France adequate territorial compensation in West Africa. For the moment everything depends upon the German conception of adequacy. In regard to this all-important point nothing definite is known, for the negotiations are being conducted amid circumstances of rigorously guarded secrecy. It is believed, however, that since the speeches of the Premier and the Chancellor of the Exchequer the German idea as to what constitutes adequate compensation has undergone some moderation, but whether or not in sufficient degree to satisfy France we cannot say.

Several important considerations immediately enter into the negotiations on their new basis. In the first place, it is possible that Germany may require compensation in West Africa for what she may feel disposed to term a return to the status quo as it was defined under the Act of Algeciras. But the French Government contends that it has never violated the provisions of this international compact. Then it is not inconceivable that Germany will suggest that France be given a free hand in Morocco, or, in other words, that she assume a protectorate over the region. For a concession of such magnitude they will seek in West Africa compensation of corresponding if not of greater proportion. It is for France to decide whether or not the exchange is fair. It would be foolish of her, at the price of peace and quietude in the Shereefian Empire, to deal with Germany elsewhere on so generous a scale as would satisfy, at the expense of French interests, the inordinate appetite of that Power for colonial expansion. In all probability France will declare that, as far as Morocco is concerned, she is content with the privileges assigned to her under the Algeciras Convention, in which event it will follow as an act of grace, not as a matter of right, that she will compensate Germany for the disappointment that must inevitably be occasioned when she withdraws her unpretentious little cruiser from Agadir. In other words, France merely wishes to ensure herself against German intrusion in the future. In these circumstances the price that she will be called upon to pay ought not to be excessively high; in strict justice it should be regarded merely as a price necessary for the re-affirmation of rights secured by international agreement. An arrangement of this kind is purely one of concern to Germany and France. Should, however, France regard the compensation required by Germany as exorbitant, then the situation will revert exclusively to Morocco. Here Great Britain, as one of the signatory Powers of the Act of Algeciras, and also as the loyal friend of France, will insist upon active intervention in any negotiations that threaten to change the status quo. In such case there would be no room for doubt as to the attitude we should adopt. A German coaling-station on the Atlantic coast of Morocco would be unthinkable. It is, therefore, a foregone conclusion that Germany must leave Agadir. If France arrives at the conclusion that the compensation required is out of all proportion to the advantages derived from German non-interference in the affairs of the Shereefian Empire, then a simple declaration to this effect will bring Great Britain to her side in the diplomatic arena. Thus early in the negotiations Germany has been sadly disillusioned. She realises that she cannot dispose of the Moroccan question without reckoning upon Great Britain. Moreover, now that the clamour which her precipitate action produced has to some extent subsided, we hear little concerning the peril in which her nationals and their interests were supposed to be placed—a peril, it will be recalled, advanced as justification for the sending of a warship to Agadir. Nor, indeed, do we see in the calculated policy of Germany any desire manifested to maintain the rôle which she imposed upon herself at one time of protecting the hapless peoples of Morocco against the wicked tyranny of the French. In short, the tactics of Germany at present closely resemble those favoured by an impecunious company promoter. She is seeking to sell something which she does not possess for something else which does not belong to her.

THE WORLD'S RAILWAYS

Within the last fifteen years the extraordinary development of communications has to all practical intents and purposes wiped out time and space, and if only the projects at present planned for completion within the next few years are carried to a successful conclusion, the world will literally be webbed by steel rails bearing trains de luxe to its uttermost ends. It is no longer an achievement of any considerable note to have travelled round the globe. The great Trans-Siberian Railway has effectually linked together the Continents of Europe and Asia; and the seasoned traveller, who counts his journeys in days rather than in miles, has ceased to regard the Far East as being far, in the strict sense of the term. As a matter of fact, in point of time Pekin is to-day nearer to England than Pretoria, and Tokio is hardly more remote than Table Bay. So much has the trans-Siberian service been accelerated during the last few months that within fifteen days and twelve hours of leaving Charing-cross the tourist arrives in Tokio. He travels the six thousand miles that separate the Extreme West from the Extreme East, spending only forty-five hours on the sea. Moreover, his journey is made amid circumstances of elegant luxury; for in no country in the world has comfort in railway travelling been brought to such a high state of perfection as in Russia. To begin with, the gauge of the line is broader than elsewhere; each compartment, therefore, is as spacious as the smaller rooms of a first-class hotel, and in the furnishing nothing that makes for comfort is omitted. Even the corridors are wide enough to permit of promenading. The restaurant-cars are decorated with rare taste, and the cooking arrangements could not be excelled. In short, the trans-Siberian train is a Carlton on wheels. Should the traveller, having arrived in Tokio within fifteen and a half days of leaving Charing-cross, wish to circle the globe in the quickest possible time, he may reach England again twenty-one days later by journeying, in one of the famous Empress liners, over the Pacific mail route from Yokohama to Vancouver, and from thence across the "Rockies" to the Atlantic coast, where the Empress boats are once more in waiting to carry him to the shores of his homeland. Altogether his voyage round the world will have occupied barely thirty-seven days, and he will have covered a distance, roughly speaking, of nearly fourteen thousand miles. Nor must it be imagined that this achievement represents the maximum that is to be reached in the immediate future. Within the next few months the time occupied over the Siberian Railway is to be reduced by a further twenty-four hours. Consequently a tour round the world will shortly occupy something under thirty-six days. In 1912 a further saving of twenty-four hours in the journey to Japan is to be effected. The traveller from London will then be able to reach Tokio, viâ the trans-Siberian route, in thirteen and a half days, and should he wish to complete the circuit of the world, availing himself of the Pacific mail route for the remainder of the journey, he will arrive home again well within thirty-five days. But such a remarkable feat in East to West travelling, due to the improvement of transit facilities over the Siberian Railway, does not by any means exhaust the possibilities of the immediate future.

There are in progress other important developments in communications, which, as it were, will tend to contract the world into smaller space. Four years hence at the latest many schemes already far advanced will be completed. For example, the track of the Siberian Railway will be doubled and many additional sidings constructed at important centres. Moreover, fifteen hundred miles of steel rails will be laid along the wild banks of the great Amur River, giving Russia, together with her existing communications, an all-Russian route from Moscow to Vladivostok, 5,500 miles long. When these gigantic undertakings are in operation it will be possible to run fast expresses to the East, and it is not inconceivable that the journey between London and Tokio may then be accomplished within ten days. Meanwhile the Japanese are already developing on an extensive scale their network of communications over the Asiatic Continent. The military railway through the mountain fastness of Southern Manchuria, from Mukden to Antung, the river-town on the borders of Korea, is being converted into standard gauge, and the great Yalu River will shortly be spanned by a noble bridge. Assuming that the traveller is an indifferent sailor, he will very soon be able to proceed from London to Tokio with a brief voyage of only eleven hours on the sea—an hour between Dover and Calais and ten hours crossing the Tsushima Straits, which separate Fusan, on the southern coast of Korea, from Shimonoseki, on the south-western coast of Japan. In other words, he will travel by trains de luxe from the European port of Calais to the Korean port of Fusan.

Then the Japanese are connecting their Manchurian railways with a line which is to run to a favourably situated and ice-free port on the north-eastern coast of Korea. In this way they hope to "cut out" Vladivostok, the entrance to which can be kept open in winter only by means of ice-breakers, and which, in competition with the new Japanese outlet to Far Eastern waters, would be placed at geographical disadvantage, being somewhat farther north, and therefore at greater distance from the markets of Japan and South China. Russia, however, is making a determined effort to gain direct access to Pekin, and consequently to the great commercial centres of North China. She is representing to China the desirability of connecting the circum-Baikal section of the Trans-Siberian Railway with the Chinese Pekin-Kalgan Railway. This project will involve the construction of one thousand miles of railway, over the great caravan highway which crosses the deserts of Eastern Mongolia. Should it be realised—and there is no reason to doubt that it will—the distance between Paris and Pekin will be reduced from 6,300 miles to 5,600 miles, and the whole journey might well be accomplished within eight days, or in less time that it takes to travel from England to the western shores of the American Continent.

Then China, by the aid of international finance, is herself developing railways on an extensive scale within the Empire. It is now possible to travel from Pekin to Hankow, a distance of 750 miles, in one and a half days, not counting stoppages, and before long the remaining 800 miles between Hankow and Kowloon, the mainland opposite Hong Kong, will be traversed by railway. The project for extending communications westward in the direction of the Burmese frontier have also advanced beyond the "paper" stage, and the day may not be far distant when it will be possible to travel by railway from India east to Pekin. Meanwhile on the Western side of India many railway schemes are projected. A powerful group of Russian magnates are seeking to promote a line from Baku, through Persia, to link up with the Indian system at Quetta. Were their hopes to be fulfilled India would be brought within the reach of a trans-Continental journey, and, should ever the Chinese system be linked up with the Burmese system, it is possible to conceive a great southern route, competitive with the Siberian Railway, which would lie viâ Baku, Persia, India, and the Yangtze Valley to Pekin. The Baghdad Railway is destined to link the Mediterranean and the Bosphorus with the Persian Gulf, and, when finally connected with the Russian lines projected in Northern Persia and Caucasia, will render feasible a trans-Continental system from Calais to the head of the Persian Gulf. Similarly an alternative route to the Gulf will be provided whenever Russian and British railway schemes in Persia mature. At the same time Russia is adding to her line from Orenburg to Tashkend a branch as far as Kuldja in Turkestan. Consequently one will soon be able to proceed by railway from Europe to the heart of Turkestan. In discussing these many projects it should not be forgotten that it is the ambition of the French to control a line from Indo-China northwards to connect with the Siberian Railway. The realisation of a scheme of this kind will also bring Indo-China within the network of trans-Continental railways stretching from Europe. It must be confessed that, apart from the desire of Russia and Japan in the Far East, motives which I have outlined represent the hopes of the Powers interested rather than the plans actively in progress. It is clear that by the gradual process of extending existing communications, the only links remain to be added between Europe and Asia are bound to ways stretching in all directions, crossing the frontiers, and passing through the territories of many peoples, and bringing countries hitherto remote, like Persia, India, Burmah, China, Korea, and Japan, as near to England as were the lands of Western Europe in the days of Napoleon, when roads and tracks alone provided the means of communication for armies and for merchandise.

MOTORING

It is not always that the unprejudiced person can find himself in agreement with the views expressed by the technical journals on questions affecting the rights and privileges of private motorists, but there can hardly be two opinions as to the soundness of the position taken up by the Motor with regard to the unauthorised use of motor cars by chauffeurs. As our contemporary remarks, this practice, which is far too common, is simply dishonest, and one is at a loss to understand the mental attitude of judges and juries who think otherwise. The chauffeur who uses his master's car for private purposes without sanction is stealing petrol and lubricating oil, besides causing unjustifiable wear and tear of tyres, and should be treated the same as any other dishonest person. In the case referred to by the Motor the prosecutor was Mr. C. Belleville West, a member of both the R.A.C. and the A.A. and M.U., and although it was clearly proved that the chauffeur had used the car for his own purposes and consumed Mr. West's petrol for his own use, the Grand Jury threw out the bill. As Mr. West points out, it appears from this that any chauffeur is at liberty to use his master's car and consume his master's petrol, tyres, lubricants, and electricity for the amusement of himself and his friends—which is absurd in equity, whatever it may be in law. It is to be hoped that a few more car-owners will display the courage to prosecute in such cases, and that different results will be obtained. The matter is an important one which concerns very many motorists, and it can hardly be that a special Act of Parliament is necessary to put a stop to what is simply theft or larceny.

At the first annual general meeting of the Amalgamated Automobile Association and Motor Union, which took place at the Hotel Cecil the other day, the chairman, Mr. W. Joynson-Hicks, M.P., was very optimistic as to the future of motoring generally and of the Association in particular. The wisdom of the amalgamation, he said, had been amply demonstrated by the fact that during the last twelve months over six thousand motorists who had previously not been members of either the A.A. or the M.U. had become members of the amalgamated body, the total membership of which is now over thirty-two thousand. The patrol system had been maintained in a high state of efficiency, and the legal department, which provides free defence for members in all cases brought against them under the Motor Car Act, had been very successful during the year. The touring department was very appreciated by members, no less a sum having been deposited on cars going abroad. The proposed National Council of Motoring, which was to make the satisfactory announcement, had been arranged between representatives of the Association and the promoters of the project, and it was to be expected that the project would be the promotion of motoring interests.

A puncture-repairing patch which is already semi-vulcanised, and which completes the process of self-vulcanisation to the tube while the tyre is actually running, is a novelty of distinct interest to the motorist. Such are the properties claimed for the "Marvel Security Patch," recently introduced by the London Motor Garage Company, Ltd., of Wardour-street, W., the well-known motor hiring firm, and representatives of the Charron Car for Great Britain. Neither solution nor vulcanising appliance is necessary when repairing with the "Marvel," all that is required being to clean the damaged part of the tube with waste and petrol and then apply the patch. It is stated that the greater the heat and running the more firmly the patch adheres to the tube, and that the repair is absolutely permanent. A sample-patch for trial will be sent free to any motorist on application to the company at the address mentioned above.

One of the considerations which should have a very important bearing upon the choice of a car is the facility or otherwise of the manufacturer for the prompt supply of spare parts and replacements. Even in these days of practical perfection in automobile construction the best of cars requires such on occasion, and every motorist whose experience is at all a lengthy one knows how largely the pleasures of the pastime have been discounted in the past by the delays and difficulties attending the getting of spare parts when required. This drawback to the joys of motoring was more accentuated in the days when the prospective buyer had to take his choice of a Continental car or nothing; but even now, when the British maker has taken his proper place in the motor industry of the world, the possibilities of trouble are not by any means eliminated. It still behoves the motorist, when selecting a car, to satisfy himself that the makers are in a position to supply replacements with promptitude, whether the car be a British or a foreign production. The foregoing remarks are prompted by a perusal of a report, recently issued by Mr. S. F. Edge, concerning the spare part section of the Napier business—admittedly one of the very best organised motor concerns in the world. The figures given in the report are decidedly interesting. It appears that there are no fewer than 18,371 separate bins for carrying the different spare parts, and that replacements for Napiers made as far back as 1900 are always available. In one week orders were received by Messrs. Edge for 391 different parts. The daily average of telegrams for spares was nineteen, and every article was available for dispatch within twenty-four hours, although some of the replacements were required for cars made ten years ago.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE foreign scare seems to be dying down. It is now quite decided not to call out the Boy Scouts or to mobilise the Thames steamboats or do anything else equally ridiculous. The German Emperor has come home from his holiday, and this is stated to be a sign of peace. To the ordinary outsider who does not understand the scare headlines or grasp the mind of the modern journalist it appears supremely ridiculous that the newspapers should have declared England to be on the verge of war with Germany whilst the German Emperor was at Swinemunde. I plead for sanity in finance and foreign politics. Both England and Germany are trading nations. They have nothing to gain by war and everything to gain by peace. The two nations together do a business amounting to 117 millions a year. Their total trade with Morocco is only $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions a year, of which Germany does but a fifth. Is it likely, therefore, that we shall fight over such a paltry matter? I wish to repeat with the strongest emphasis possible that the great finance houses laugh at the scare headlines and the hysteria of the ha'penny Press. The Morocco question is over. That is the plain truth. But what is not over, and what has made our markets weak, is liquidation. We must not forget that during the past six months companies have been coming out weekly with very large capitals, that these companies have been underwritten, and that the public has in almost every instance left the underwriters saddled with the burden. Underwriters as a rule hope to get out and make a profit. They expect that in any event they will not have to take more than half their underwriting. But in most cases they have had to take the lot. This has seriously crippled their finances, and as a result they have had to sell good things in order to pay for the bad ones. A great deal of the forced selling of the past month has been due to this. Again, we must not forget that four millions of money was found for the Birkbeck depositors. During the past month the securities that had been pledged to find this money have been in process of absorption. This, again, has made the markets weak, and in London there has been considerable speculation in Home Rails, which speculation made their market very tender. In Paris there was a great deal of gambling, and here, also, there has been steady liquidation. It is to these causes much more than to the fear of a Continental war that we may trace the weakness in prices.

The proprietors of the Birkbeck Bank, otherwise the B shareholders, are likely to get themselves considerably disliked if they persist in their opposition to the scheme of the Official Receiver. It will be remembered that this scheme left the liability of these B shareholders an open question. They met and passed a resolution which released them from all liability in consideration of their agreeing to the scheme. Mr. Justice Neville very properly declined to agree to this unless the depositors, creditors, and A shareholders consented. We confess that we are entirely at a loss to understand why the B shareholders should have done this. Whatever profits may have been made in the past have certainly gone to these B shareholders. The whole management of the Bank was in their hands, and it is only fair that as they took the profits so they should bear the losses, especially as those losses were incurred under their management. Nothing can now be done until after the Long Vacation.

An oil company, the Tampico-Panuco by name, asked us to find money to drill wells in the oil-fields of Mexico. But many people have been drilling for oil in Mexico, and very few have made it pay. That there is oil was proved by the Dos Bocas spouter, which burnt for so many months, and also by the oil-well on the Mexican Eagle property. But oil is a very tricky thing to touch, and Mexican oil perhaps more dangerous than any other, for even the Pearson group have been unable to make it pay in face of the competition in the Standard Oil. The Langen Java offered us second debentures, an extremely unappetising dish. I cannot imagine anything less attractive than a second debenture on a rubber plantation. A Canadian railway also asked for money and, it is said, obtained it. But of this I should require very considerable proof before I believed it, and I hope for the sake of the City that the issue met with a cool reception, for the prospectus was a very unbusinesslike document, and hardly deserved the attention of the financial world.

CONSOLS.—The Consol Market has firmed up, and there are now more bears than bulls. As soon as the Banks have liquidated some of their holdings I expect to see a rise here. But there is still a certain amount of stock to be sold, and the price fluctuates. No one wants to put Consols on their books, but I must confess that it seems bad business for any company to get rid of its Consols at the present low price, for if we get cheap money for any lengthy period the price ought to stiffen considerably.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign Market has been idle, and this is one proof that there is no scare amongst the big houses who control this market. If there had been any danger of a European war the foreign market would have been the first to feel it, whereas the only weakness that has occurred has been in such things as Tintos and Peruvian preference, in which there was a bull account.

HOME RAILS.—It is clear that the banks have made up their minds not to encourage any speculation for the rise in Home Railways. The dividends that have been announced during the past week have been admirable. That of the Midland Railway was especially good, for the deferred got no less than $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., with a carry forward of £41,879 and an increase of £30,000 in the special reserves and renewals account. The yield on Midland deferred is well over 5 per cent. I have continually advised a purchase of North Easterns, but I did not expect that this railway company would have made £125,000 profit out of a published increase of £200,000 gross. An additional $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was declared. £50,000 was put to reserve and £106,000 carried forward. North Eastern ordinary stock is one of the soundest investments in the railway market, and yields to-day nearly 5 per cent. The Great Northern also showed up well, but there is a bull account open in this stock, and I am doubtful about advising a purchase, especially as I look upon Great Northern deferred as more or less of a gamble. The South Western did not increase its dividend, but the figures in the accounts are fairly good. Nevertheless I see no reason why any one should buy South Western deferred, for the company has a great deal of money yet to spend. The District Railway did better than any other line, for it paid in full on its first preference stock, and this after placing £10,000 to the renewals account and increasing its carry forward £5,700. I do not believe that the present depression in the Home Railway market will continue. I think that the liquidation will end shortly, and that we shall see another rise which will carry stocks to a still higher level. Therefore I have no hesitation in advising a purchase of the best lines.

YANKIES.—Yankee Rails have been the best market in the Stock Exchange throughout the week. As a gambling counter these stocks are unsurpassed. But they can only be gambled in by people who can afford to lose money, for the risk is very definite. Little Southernns appear to me as good a speculation as any one can wish for. By the Statist supplement devoted to American Rails we see that the net receipts of this line have risen six million dollars in three years, and that last year they earned enough to pay in full on the preference stock and 3 per cent. on the common stock. That they will do this is most unlikely, for the line is financed with great caution. Nevertheless, the huge cotton crop of 14 million bales will give Little Southernns a magnificent return. I strongly advise everybody to buy this week's Statist and read the figures. The British public does not realise the enormous business done by these American railways. Cautious people who do not like gambling cannot do better than buy convertible bonds, which give them the option to convert into common stock and an interest on their money whilst they are making up their minds.

CANADIAN PACIFICS AND GRAND TRUNKS.—Canadian Pacifics still keep good, and it is now definitely certain that a further issue of stock will be made that will give holders a considerable bonus. Grand Trunks are being talked up on the bumper crop. Canada declares that her crop is a record one. This will tremendously increase the earnings of this line. It is now well managed, and the common stock is an excellent lock-up. When the Grand Trunk Pacific is opened this line will begin to earn money immediately. Trunks are a good speculation.

RUBBER.—The bulls of Rubber must be possessed of great courage to withstand the depressing reports that appear each week of their Trust companies. These Trust companies, which were formed at the top of the boom, spent money with both hands, and now all their foolish finance is producing the result that every one expected. The Colonial Rubber Trust appears to have been doing some extraordinary finance, and Mr. Lintner, who protested against it, was compelled to resign. We are afraid that if the books of the other trusts were examined they would also have been found to have done equally foolish things. This is not the time to buy Rubber shares, and cautious people are getting out. But the market is so meagre that getting out is easier talked about than done.

OIL.—There is some talk of the oil war ending, and it is said that Shells are to be put up in consequence. The liquidation at Amsterdam is at an end, and at present prices Shells are not expensive. A deal is on in the shares of the Tcharken-Cheleken, which Mr. Albert Reitlinger is interested in to the extent of half the profits that the United Investment Corporation make. This United Investment appears to be taking £343,400 as their share of the profit. The public should therefore be rather careful how they gamble in Tcharken-Cheleken.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—These markets are completely deserted. No business is done, but the big houses occasionally come in and support their specialities. It is said that an attempt will be made to squeeze the bears during August, but I am rather doubtful whether anybody will have any energy left, or indeed any money either. I cannot advise a purchase of any mining shares at the moment.

EGYPT.—There is a great deal of scare talk going on about the failure of the Egyptian cotton crop. But it is too early yet to definitely say what this crop will be. The worm has attacked some of the cotton in Upper Egypt, but the damage is greatly exaggerated, and good judges consider that the crop will be very little less than last year. The worm is being used by the Nationalists as a political move, and the Government officials that have been sent to superintend the destruction of the pernicious creature have been badly treated by the natives. Lord Kitchener was sorely needed. The big financiers interested in Egypt have been buying Agricultural Banks all the week.

MISCELLANEOUS.—It seems to me that the best thing to buy to-day as an investment would be Anglo A's, for the meeting was very reassuring. Marconis have also jumped up. This company is undoubtedly doing well. Pekins should also recover now that the liquidation of Wildy's account is over.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THE CITY LIFE ASSURANCE

THIS company, which originally ran a Bond Investment branch, has now taken up a business upon purely life assurance lines, both ordinary and industrial, and to do this it increased its share capital to £94,742. The last balance-sheet showed life assurance funds £95,570 for the ordinary branch, and £17,484 for the industrial branch; whilst the company was debited with £321,933 for the Bond Investment and Endowment Certificate Fund. On the other side, its mortgages and loans amounted to £575,970. It also had £21,615 invested mostly in Consols. Its total assets are set down at £660,982, and its total income for the year ending December 31st last was £189,481. The face value of its new business for last year exceeded one million pounds. The directors consider that the Ideal policy has been a great success, and during last year 3,472 proposals were received, producing a new premium income of £10,086. The industrial branch is considered to be firmly established, and its premium income last year was £29,317. The directors have strengthened the reserves by the creation of a general reserve fund of £10,000. The main features of the Ideal policy are that no medical examination is necessary unless the sum assured exceeds £300 or the age at entry is over forty-five. The policy is non-forfeitable after the third annual payment. All surrender, loan and paid-up policy values are endorsed on every policy. Policies may be transferred. All the policies share in profits. The City Life also issues an Ideal Pure Endowment policy which provides for the return of all premiums paid together with a liberal rate of interest at the end of a certain definite fixed period. No medical examination is required, and in the event of death before the endowment matures the whole of the premiums paid, together with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, will be returned. Surrender values vest when the endowment has been in force not less than two years, after which the policy is absolutely non-forfeitable. The company also issues a policy called the Dot policy for the purpose of providing girls with a dot. For instance, a Dot policy taken out at the age of five upon which £3 yearly is paid will provide £60 in cash at the age of twenty-one, or may be exchanged for a whole life policy assuring the sum of £300 and a share in profits. City Life has many ingenious plans of life assurance, and we cannot do better than advise intending assurers to write to the offices of the company for such proposal forms and literature as explain their numerous systems of saving money.

THE HEAT-WAVE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While the daily newspapers are full of reports of deaths caused by the excessive heat, I thought to myself that the death of a sparrow (doubtless seeking cool) by drowning in the tank outside my window, ought not to go unmentioned. I could not hope to find pity and place in the columns of a daily, so I seek them in a weekly that is a friend of birds and bards.

Here, then, are the commemorating lines I wrote to-night for the bird I was too late to save alive:—

Unhappy, water-weary wight of song,
Thou hast combated the dreary flood too long;
Thy winged companions fled
(Even as from Christ who bled),
And all thy fluttering and thy agonies
Availed not to win back
Thy heaven-wandering track,
Nor to redeem thy wind-throbbled melodies.
Even so we men have flown all unawares
Into this viscous pool of black despair;
Even thus our pinions sank,
Even thus our weak mouths drank
Long, drowning gulps of the huge lake of blight.
But never comes too late
The saving hand of fate,
That strong and tender lifts us into light.

Unpublished, the sparrow's fame will suffer. Mine will not, for I have none.—Yours sincerely,

RONALD M. RICE.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE centenary of Tennyson's birth has been commemorated at Somersby, Lincolnshire, by restoring the tower of the church and placing within the edifice a bronze bust of the poet. On Monday a gathering was held in a field opposite the birthplace, and Professor T. Herbert Warren, of Magdalen College, Oxford (whose delightful inaugural lecture was noticed in THE ACADEMY for June 17th), delivered an address on "Tennyson, the Poet, in the Poet's Land." He emphasised, among other points, the necessity for understanding the Victorian Age, which Tennyson so exactly represented, if we would thoroughly comprehend the poet himself and his work, and noted how inseparable from that work were the Lincolnshire lowlands. Canon Rawnsley, whose mind runs naturally and periodically into the sonnet's "scanty plot of ground," spoke on memories of Tennyson, and the whole celebration was fitting and dignified, worthy of the Laureate's fame. We have small patience with anecdote-hunters who recollect that "as a boy" various famous men were fond of apples or sweets, or had a predilection for climbing trees; most boys like apples, and not many healthy youngsters can resist the appeal of a conveniently low-branched tree. The "hero as baby" is liable to become a bore, and Tennyson has suffered in this respect more than once. His fame, however, is securely set upon true foundations, and, in spite of the undeniable "prettiness" of some of his poems, he expressed with fine technique and often flawless melody the spirit of a definite period in the development of modern thought.

For an illustration of how very far wrong a superficial observer can go we have rarely seen anything to equal the statements of Miss Tanguay, a leading American actress, who has been among us taking notes. London is the "dingiest, dirtiest, most poverty-stricken place" she ever saw, and, as she failed to obtain any iced drinks, and complains that in spite of her generous offer of untold gold her liquid refreshment was invariably of the temperature of hot water, the only possible conclusion is that she patronised the restaurants of Whitechapel or the New Cut. London policemen "wear great long chin-whiskers that hang down on either side"—so the innocent interviewer was informed. They do affect such hirsute decorations, it is true, on the music-hall stage. "All Englishmen are stupid and don't know how to talk. They just look at you," wails the lady who is so desirous of intellectual conversation, "and say 'Ah, ye-as,' and 'Ah, no,' and 'Fawncy.'" She must have bored them pretty badly. As for the English women, they are "frights—positive frights; they wear the shabbiest, frumpiest clothes, particularly in the street." Whitechapel again, clearly. Bond Street and Regent Street—Miss Tanguay may not have heard of them—can show the visitor some of the smartest and best-dressed men and women in the world on any summer day. It is a pity no kind friend could have guided the brilliant one from overseas away from the East-end into the fragrant West. And as for her naïve assertion that "you can travel all over London for a shilling in a taxi-cab, which is nice"—well, it would be nice if it could be done.

Paris, being "more like New York," is not quite so bad, although even there the lady of eclectic tastes, confessedly on the alert for novelties, did not see an object worth getting, and groans in spirit because the "parks" are "such messy things." Here, again, she seems to have visited the wrong quarter of the city, for she told her scribe that "the Frenchmen have a silly way of walking along the streets with their arms around the women's waists," which in her opinion is "conspicuous and ill-bred." We are fairly familiar with Paris, but do not recollect the affectionate attitude alluded to as a national characteristic; the unsophisticated lady, however, seems not to realise that at the date of her visit—mid-July—Paris permits itself a little extra hilarity. The whole series of comments proves that ten days in Europe is hardly long enough a stay to gather material for a really accurate or comprehensive appreciation of national habits and character. Perhaps at some future time Miss Tanguay will give London a whole fortnight's study, in which case she may discover that iced refreshments figure on the menu of any good restaurant during the summer months, and that most of her other statements need considerable revision.

Major North, who has contributed to the columns of THE ACADEMY, was presented on August 2nd with a silver cigar-box at the Royal Colonial Institute in acknowledgment of his services to certain of our visitors from over the seas during the recent festivities. We reproduce the inscription, and congratulate the recipient:—"Presented to Major Piers William North by the Representatives of the General Community of the Colonies possessing Responsible Government and the Crown Colonies, as a token of their esteem and in recognition of his courteous attention to them during their visit to the United Kingdom on the occasion of the King's Coronation, July, 1911."

A DREAM OF BEAUTY

I dreamed that every beauteous sound and hue
 And form that Nature hath—the ocean's roar,
 Its emerald, and the foam along its shore,
 The winds, the grass and flowers, the sparkling dew,
 The heavens' azure, dawn and sunset-shine,
 Twilight, the beams of moon and stars, and flame
 Of Autumn-coloured leaves—before me came,
 And meeting, merged unto a form divine.

Incarnate Beauty 'twas, whose spirit thrills
 Through sapphire seas, and verdant plains and hills,
 And in the cloud-lost snowy peaks is pent.
 Enrobed in splendid light she hovered o'er,
 But as I gazed, in doubt and wonderment,
 Mine eyes were dazzled, and I saw no more.

THE FRUITS OF CODDLE

TWENTY miles of London's river-frontage, usually the scene of liveliest labour, lie idle and almost deserted. The thousands of men who are generally engaged in earning their living by unloading and transporting merchandise are now busily occupied in striking and in persuading others to strike, and, incidentally, in providing a remarkably vivid object-lesson to all with any pretensions to intelligent judgment of the danger inseparable from ill-considered action.

Some time ago a comparatively small number of men made demands on the Port of London Authorities, which were immediately conceded; the way was thus opened, the ground prepared, for the inflammatory words of that exclusively modern product—the "agitator." Insidiously, at street-corners, in the public parks, in all places where workers congregate at the dinner-hour, he has (for a consideration) emitted turgid streams of Socialist oratory and ultra-Radical rant, until the man earning a comfortable wage, hitherto content, becomes uneasy. Then, upon some fancied grievance, or even upon some real grievance which might easily have been arranged by a little common-sense, the man—poor fellow!—is "ordered" to strike, and dare not refuse. Perhaps he gains his point; but in a few weeks or months, at the bidding of others, he is compulsorily idle again. Thus the process goes on until a climax of fatuity such as the present state of affairs is reached.

Surely never before, even in these days when so much defiance is bawled in the face of authority, have such deplorable words been used in public places as those which Mr. Ben Tillett spoke in Trafalgar Square on Saturday last? "We have prepared a campaign for next week"—thus the voice of Tillett—"which I hope will bring every man-jack out of the docks, so as to show the employers that we mean business. If we cannot win, I will move heaven and earth to get all ports of the United Kingdom blocked, and, if possible, to declare an international transport strike." Again, speaking on Monday, this mischievous adviser gave it as his opinion that in the circumstances "no man ought to work, and the Port of London should be brought to a dead stop till the dispute ended." He counsels the men "to insist that they should not be called on to work ten minutes, five minutes, or even five seconds after or before their proper time," and, "with regard to the 'recommended' man, whose character was made by the parson—well, parsons, so far as making characters were (sic) concerned, were the biggest liars in the world." And after this gibberish came a piece of colossal impudence; referring to the efforts of the Army Service Corps, which stepped in and did some necessary work—"If they do that," said Tillett, "we shall have to consider the whole supply of food throughout the country." In other words, England is to be at the mercy of a creature—we hardly venture to say a man—of this stamp. Such utterances, we say emphatically, should be made an offence against the law—as, in spirit, they are.

What success has attended his efforts? As we write, in mid-week, the capital of the Empire is harassed by what can without exaggeration be termed an industrial war. Many thousands of dockers are idle; ten thousand carmen have joined the strike, and, if ordered by their Union, from twenty to thirty thousand more will come out shortly. Valuable loads of perishable goods have been wantonly upset and wasted in the streets; the railway companies serving the miles of wharves are unable to fulfil their contracts; London itself, if the chaos remains unruléd, is threatened with famine-prices and shortage of life's necessities. In addition to this, England is fairly ringed with labour troubles. Liverpool, Manchester, Grangemouth, Hull, are in confusion, and the revolt of the transport workers in the north is becoming serious—so serious, in fact, that there is talk of its spreading to London.

Whether it does so or not—whether in the course of the next few days a peaceful settlement is arrived at or not, is not the main point. The outstanding feature to note is that all through the country the old pleasant and mutually profitable relationship between employers and employed is practically at an end. Scarcely any firm is so self-contained, or so independent of outside help in the conduct of its business, as to stand alone, however happy its internal arrangements may be. This is the day of "allied" trades and "associated" workers; also, alas! of "conciliatory boards," whose well-meant efforts too frequently prove futile. And in the face of this fact—the death of harmony between capital and labour—in the face of this incessant turmoil, so detrimental to the interests of the community at large, those in political authority have pandered to that irresponsible portion of the population which needs guidance rather than power, ruling rather than liberty. Tony pandy saw the beginning of the mischief—the lack of a firm hand then was obvious; and in various instances since then Mr. Winston Churchill has interfered with the usual course of law and justice, creating dangerous precedents and encouraging rebels to hope for undue lenience or even the cancellation of their penalty.

Curiously enough, men in revolt against the conditions of their employment are generally selfish egotists with an eye to the main chance, and invariably call themselves Socialists. In theory, a Socialist aims at the good of his fellows; in practice, he is generally after a little more luxury for himself. The striker does not see that in the end his agitations must recoil on his own head—since such things cannot go on indefinitely, and his last state is bound to be worse than his first. The only hope lies in the fact that if this present lamentable struggle is carried on to extremes, it will prove in its results to be a salutary lesson, both to those who legislate in an absurd and grandmotherly fashion, and to those who bind themselves by agreements in such ridiculous wise that if five men are given notice for a fault, five thousand must immediately support them by violent and audacious protest.

SOME CRITICISMS FROM A TRADE UNION POINT OF VIEW.—I.

THE very extent and complexity of the Bill providing for insurance against ill-health, disablement, and unemployment has made effective criticism difficult, especially on the part of workmen continuously following their occupations; these have little time for the consideration of abstruse problems presented in the terminology affected by draftsmen of Parliamentary measures. Throughout the country, however, these workmen were more or less prepared for the main provisions of the Bill, though the promise of these, in some respects, went beyond their anticipations. Many of them had already considered the possibility of the State supplementing their own efforts, for it was becoming impossible for them to ignore the effect of industrial and economic changes upon the stability of the financial provision which they had endeavoured to make. The gradual lengthening of the average of life and the steadily increasing probabilities of periodical unemployment had endangered the solvency of many existing funds for dealing with sickness and unemployment, and had made it very difficult to start new funds. Many discussions had prepared the way for the acceptance of a scheme of State-help and had reconciled them to a modified supervision of those funds the State would help to strengthen, always providing that any measure having this object in view was so drafted as to avoid inflicting injury upon institutions which had attempted the provision of these benefits before the State showed signs of recognising its responsibilities.

There are some provisions of the present Bill which provoke differences of opinion amongst Trade Unionists without exactly creating general antagonism. A minority is in favour of a non-contributory scheme, but a non-contributory scheme for able-bodied workers was opposed as being contrary to the teaching and practice of the older Unions, whose leaders have encouraged their members to believe that whatever was worth having was worth paying for; who have insisted upon contributions in connection with the ordinary activities of the Union, and that such contributions should be sufficient to provide not only immediate benefits, but also respectable reserves. A contributory scheme was considered necessary not only to obviate the charge of inconsistency but to justify the demand for adequate representation upon administrative and advisory bodies; it was mainly because the Unions expected such representation that they voted in favour of a contributory scheme. Those who take this view argue at the same time that where wages are insufficient to justify the exaction of a compulsory contribution it is the business and the duty of the Unions themselves to use all their resources to secure higher rates of pay.

Considerable difference exists amongst Unionists as to the effect of Clause 18, Section 3, which provides that an approved society shall consist of not less than 10,000 members. On the one hand, it is contended that such a number is necessary, not only to equalise insurable risks, and spread them over a sufficient area, but to minimise administrative expenses, and to justify a demand for the application of the clause to employers' clubs, which are nowhere democratically managed. It is argued, too, that the opportunities offered to the small societies to federate for the purposes of the Bill will accentuate the present-day tendency towards amalgamation and consolidation of Trade Union forces. On the other hand, many of the smaller Unions claim the right to continue the attempt to work out their own salvation in their own way, and to enjoy under the Bill a right of distribution equal to that of the larger Unions.

¶ Much, of course, depends upon the point of view. The members of big Unions and the men with big ideas concerning the future of the Trade Union movement are in favour of the clause, while the man whose Union caters for occupations employing limited numbers, or whose horizon is bounded by the desire to retain his Union's individuality, is in favour of abolishing numerical restrictions altogether.

While there are some provisions of the Bill about which Trade Unionists only differ, there are others which they generally agree to condemn as being either unfair to the individual or dangerous to the Union. Amongst the unfair provisions is the one in Clause 9, Section 2, which limits the rate of sickness benefits to two-thirds of the usual wages. This limitation is an extraordinary departure from the practice of all organisations paying friendly benefits. Neither precedence nor policy justifies the proposal, nor could any voluntary society continue to exist which declared that, while the well-to-do and the poor should pay the same actual contribution, the poor must receive an inferior benefit. Surely the need of the 12s. per week man, who pays nearly 3 per cent. of his wages as premium, is at least as great in sickness as is the need of the 36s. per week man, whose premiums are less than 1 per cent. of his wages. As a matter of fact the need of the poor man is greater, for he has smaller opportunities of making independent provision. No one has attempted to argue that this limitation is a just one; the most that has been adduced in its favour is that it may reduce malingering and increase the actuarial soundness of the Friendly Societies, the latter of course at the expense of the ill-paid. Those who assert that this limitation may reduce malingering assume that the worst-paid members of the community are the greatest malingerers—an assumption entirely unsupported by experience. It was clearly evident from the tone of the debate in Committee of the House that it was the Friendly Societies who were behind the Government's insistence upon this clause, and not the Trade Unions.

Attempts have been made to secure some modification of the clauses dealing with arrears, but the Government has hitherto declined to relieve the workman of the liability to pay the employer's share of arrears accruing during periods of unemployment. There is some justification for demanding the payment by the workman of his own share of arrears, but to ask him to pay the employer's share also is placing a very serious burden upon his shoulders. During periods of unemployment other arrears also accumulate—rent must be paid and food must be bought; clothes, boots, and household requisites wear out, and one of the most miserable periods in a workman's life is that period immediately following upon a long spell of unemployment; every creditor expects to take first share of wages, which are seldom much above subsistence rate. Some attempt should be made to deal with this question, either by ignoring the employer's share of arrears altogether, or by the State undertaking the responsibility for them; otherwise a very large proportion of the population will be intermittently contributing to the fund without having the slightest chance of receiving benefit.

The right of commutation which is conceded to the employers in Clause 70 is opposed by Trade Unionists, who fear that it may lead to unnecessary short time, and who claim, in the event of commutation being permitted, that the workman shall have equal rights with the employer to commute on the same terms and at the same ratio.

Clause 63,* Section 1, is at present very ambiguous, and unless the term "directly affected" is properly defined many misunderstandings will arise and much irritation follow. During the dispute in the cotton trade the lock-out notices caused the stoppage of carters employed by various firms, but the General Federation of Trades Unions held that these men, though involved in the effects of the dispute, were only unemployed and not directly affected; that is, they had no claim concerning wages, hours, or conditions, to prefer or defend, nor would they be consulted when the actual combatants entered into negotiations for settlement; consequently they would not be entitled to lock-out benefit. During the recent lock-out of boilermakers fifteen thousand who were in the yards when notices were posted were held to be directly affected and entitled to lock-out pay, while seven thousand members of the same society who were prevented by the dispute from obtaining or even applying for situations were held to be not directly affected, as were 9,600 members of other Unions whose industrial relationships compelled them to cease work at the same time, or shortly after, the notices of the boilermakers became operative. These were all held to be unemployed and entitled only to unemployed benefit.

During the second reading stage of the Bill the President of the Board of Trade made a statement which has been held to be an admission of the right of workmen in such circumstances to unemployed benefit under the scheme. The Trade Unions desire not only that this clause shall be made quite clear, but that it shall be extended so as to ensure benefit for workmen who, having no quarrel themselves, are involved in what may be termed disciplinary lockouts; that is, lockouts undertaken by employers' federations in one district for the purpose of coercing locked-out workers or strikers in another part of the country. Workmen have no control over such lockouts, which often involve unnecessary dislocations of industry and inflict gratuitous hardship; they are often undertaken in an arbitrary spirit, and it does not appear unreasonable to ask that involuntary participants in such lockouts should be entitled to unemployed benefits under the national scheme.

Clause 11,* which deals with sums obtained under the

*11.—(1) Where an insured person has received or recovered or is entitled to receive or recover, whether from his employer or any other person, any compensation of damages under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, or any scheme certified thereunder, or under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, or at common law, in respect of any injury or disease, the following provisions shall apply:—

(a) No sickness benefit or disablement benefit shall be paid to such person in any case where any weekly sum or the weekly value of any lump sum paid or payable in respect of any such compensation or damages is equal to or greater than the benefit otherwise payable to such person, and where any such weekly sum or the weekly value of any such lump sum is less than the benefit in question, such part only of the benefit shall be paid as, together with the weekly sum or the weekly value of the lump sum, will be equal to the benefit:

(b) The weekly value of any such lump sum as aforesaid may be determined by the society or committee by which the sickness and disablement benefits payable to such person are administered:

(c) No person entitled to any such compensation as aforesaid from his employer shall, except with the consent of the society or committee by which the sickness and disablement benefits payable to such person are administered, enter into any agreement to accept any lump sum in respect thereof, and any agreement entered into without such consent shall be null and void:

(d) Nothing in this section shall affect the right of an employer to redeem a weekly payment by payment of a lump sum in any case where he is entitled to do so under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, but where he exercises such right he shall, within three days thereafter, send to the Insurance Commissioners, or to the society or committee concerned, notice in writing of such redemption, giving particulars as to the amount of the lump sum and of the application thereof.

Workmen's Compensation Act and the Employers' Liability Act so adversely affects trade unions that they have scarcely regarded the clause seriously; they never dreamed it could pass the House of Commons without drastic amendment. Had they imagined that it could go through the Committee stage without the deletion of its most objectionable features a very different attitude would have characterised the National Conference on the Bill which was held in June. The clause as it stands injures the Unions in two ways: it takes out of their hands what has become a most important part of their work, and it leaves their members in an infinitely worse position than they were without the Government's interference. The Workmen's Compensation Act gave the Trade Union officials certain rights in connection with the conduct of compensation cases; they were empowered to act, in the interests of their members, without the intervention of a solicitor. Many of them took advantage of the opportunities offered, and their successes were often followed by accessions of membership. Clause 11 will sweep all this work out of their hands, and in two or three years effectively kill the Workmen's Compensation Act. What will be the use of fighting these cases if the financial results go to some other organisation? What will be the use of fighting such cases if a victory means no material improvement of the injured workman's financial situation?

A NEW COLUMBUS AND A NEW WORLD—II.

By FRANK HARRIS

I HAVE never heard or read of any fights so desperate, so diabolically clever and cruel, as those Fabre describes between insects. Dozens of different species paralyse their victims by stinging them in the nerve-centres and then store them in their nests as living food for their larvæ. Not one bungles the operation or stings at random; knowledge directs the weapon—one might almost say scientific knowledge. As Fabre says, chance has no rule.

But, after all, many of these combats are like a fight between a pirate and a merchant-ship—the difference in size is more than made up by the difference in armament. The pirate is sure to win. But Fabre tells also of death-struggles where every conceivable advantage is with the big fellow, and yet the daring little assailant brings off the victory. For example, every one knows the terrible spider of the South—the spider with the black belly, the Tarantula—whose poisonous bite kills a mole or a small bird, and often makes even a man seriously ill. Well, there is a waspish creature called the Calicurgue Annelé, or Pompile, not half the size of the Tarantula, and with a sting not a tithe as venomous, who does not hesitate to attack the great spider. On dissecting the Tarantula, Fabre found that the thorax was the place in which a sting would paralyse its motor-nerves. He then brought the two enemies face to face. The disproportion in size, strength, and armour seemed enormous; yet the Pompile was not frightened. He walked round the spider and halted, as if to seize it by a limb. At once the great Tarantula rose on its hind legs and opened its mouth: Fabre saw the poison glistening on its poignards. The Pompile walked away, but was not frightened. It was the Tarantula that showed fear and hate; he hurried after the Pompile and seized him; put poison-fangs on him, but did not bite; why not? Fabre could not imagine. But the fact remains. One day, however, the Pompile assaulted the Tarantula face to face and stung him—in the thorax? No, he knew a trick worth two of that, a trick which the human anatomist had overlooked.

If he paralysed the motor nerves the Tarantula might still bite him. With the utmost precision and care the Pompile stabbed the great spider in the mouth, thus rendering him incapable of using his fangs, and then, after examining his head to make sure it was powerless, he darted his sting into the thorax again and again, so that his young might not be incommoded by the spider's movements. The little insect is as clever as a surgeon practised in dissection.

There is still another insect that attacks and conquers in the same way; but as soon as it has brought off the stab in the mouth it executes a triumphal, ferocious war-dance round its victim. "Look at the great brute," it seems to say. "I've pricked him and made him harmless; I am a swell at the game." Then having made sure that its victim is indeed powerless to strike, it proceeds scientifically to paralyse one motor-centre after the other, and sometimes there are a dozen that must be operated upon before the victim is entirely helpless.

The love-making of many insects is just as interesting as their mortal combats. Fabre has a chapter on the pairing of the Scorpions of Languedoc, which is more fascinating than any of our novels.

He begins by describing the creature. It is some three inches long, and straw-coloured. Its tail, which it generally carries arched over its back, is in reality the stomach, and the last joint of it contains the poisonous sting. The poison itself looks like a drop of water, and no chemical analysis of it has yet been successful, for when the ingredients revealed in the analysis are again combined, the poison has lost its power. The sting itself is very strong and sharp, curved like the striking tooth of a snake, and, like the snake's poison-fang, the hole from which the poison issues is a little away from the end. The animal uses its front claws or pincers as a weapon or as a means of getting information.

Fabre keeps his scorpions in a glass cage, and studies them at leisure. For the most part of the year they are quiet and solitary; two are never seen together. But in April they begin to move about and get lively. He suddenly becomes aware that they are eating one another; here is a pair, and half of one is already consumed. Is it the result of a combat? A little later he finds another, and yet another instance of cannibalism. As the summer advances the fact becomes common. He begins to study it. He notices at once that the one eaten is always middle-sized and a little paler in colour than the cannibal. In other words, it is the large brown female which eats the male. It is always the male which is eaten. Fabre begins to study the business by night with a lantern. To his astonishment he finds a sort of ball going on. These creatures, which used to be so solitary and so shy now come out of the shade and hurry together in crowds under the light as to a dance. Their agility makes the onlooker smile. Clearly they are sorting themselves out in pairs. Here the male touches a female with the end of his claw, but immediately springs back again as if he had been burnt. Another pair join hands, but as soon as their tails meet and touch they move away from each other as if in disgust. At times there is a regular tumult; a whole crowd of claws and pincers and tails rubbing and touching and pinching, one scarcely knows whether in anger or in love. The play is madder than a romp of kittens. They all fly apart; then they begin to come back again. Suddenly Fabre notices a pair who take hands in a friendly way, and rub tails together evidently content. Side by side, claw in claw, they walk away together. They are evidently courting like a village boy and girl. Every now and then the male caresses the back of his companion with his tail. The female accepts his caress.

To his amazement, they stop and kiss. There can be no doubt about it. Fabre has watched it again and again. The two faces—or what should be faces—come together and the two mouths meet. The two hands are clasped, too, the male sometimes lets loose one pair of pincers in order to pass his claw tenderly over the horny head of his companion. Clearly the pair are kissing; yet there is no face there, nothing but two eyes and a great cavity and a jaw, and yet the two horrible masks evidently enjoy the embrace. Now and then the male pretends to bite her, and his mouth mumbles her mouth, while his front claws are caressing the horrible mask that is no doubt lovely in his sight. There is a French proverb which says the dove invented the kiss, but the scorpion, Fabre declares, was before the dove.

There is every trick of coquetry in this female. Suddenly she has had enough, and strikes the male's wrists away, and pretends to go off by herself. The male follows her, takes her claws in one of his, and caresses her back with his tail. Again they resume their walk together. A piece of tile is in their way. At once the male works with his tail and one claw in order to make a cave underneath the tile. He tries to draw the female in; but she resists; she will not enter the newly-made bridal-chamber. With sulky determination she draws the male from underneath the tile, and they continue their walk. For hours the courtship goes on. Again the male finds a sheltered nook; this time under a slate. Again the female resists; but this time the male is more determined, and draws her resolutely towards the cave in spite of her resistance. But when she comes to the edge of the slate she finds support. Not only does she root her paws in the ground, but curls her tail over so that it stems itself against the slate; she then stiffens into rigidity. The struggle continues minute after minute, but at length the male has to give in; the pressure is relaxed and the walk is resumed, with its caressings and hideous kissings.

This courtship has all sorts of incidents. Every now and then the pair meet some other females, who always stop and watch the couple, perhaps out of jealousy, for now and then one throws herself on the female and holds her claws and does her best to stop the walk. The male protests against the interference. He pulls and drags at his companion in vain; he cannot budge the two females; again and again he strains to the task, but without success. Suddenly he gives up the courtship and turns away. Another female is close by; he seizes her by the claws and invites her to continue the promenade, but she will not; she resists, struggles with him and then scuttles away. Nothing daunted, he goes to a third in the crowd of female onlookers, and this time is more fortunate, the female accepts his claw and they go off together. With this lady the courtship is not so long. At the first piece of tile the male drops one claw of his companion and uses his free claw and his tail to hollow out a cave. Little by little he enters, drawing the complacent female with him. Soon they have both disappeared. A movement or two of the tail on the inside and a little mound of sand is pushed up behind them; the door is shut, the couple are at home.

Again and again Fabre lifts the tile, but discovers nothing: the claws are intertwined, the mouths touching, but as soon as the light falls on them the lovers separate; yet in the morning, if he leaves them undisturbed, he always finds the tragedy completed, the male has fulfilled the purpose of his brief life and is already partially devoured by the female. She goes to work quite calmly to eat him, and returns again and again to the hideous feast until her lover is all consumed except the hardest parts of his claws and tail. All the coquetry, all the love-making, all the caressing and kissing ends in the murder of the lover and the disgusting feast on his remains.

Fabre does not forget to tell us what splendid mothers these cannibal, cruel female scorpions make. They take infinite care of their little ones, spending weeks on their nurture and training, weeks in which the mother does not even eat, so devoted is she to her young.

Scorpions are supposed to be viviparous, but Fabre proves that their young come into the world in a sort of soft egg like a snake's egg, and have to be freed and cleansed by the mother.

He tells, too, how the scorpion family is brought into the world in July, and how nearly he missed the experience because some great naturalist had said the time was September. For years, he declares, he has read very little. He prefers the book of Nature which is open before him and which does not lie. Most of the printed books, he says, even those of the masters, are so full of errors that he prefers to see and record facts for himself.

I should like to tell of Fabre's other activities and wider views. There is an interview with Pasteur as a young man which is a masterpiece of kindly observation and sunny humour. Fabre's poetry, too, should be described; for he has a genuine poetic gift, extraordinarily simple yet profoundly touching, with a rare feeling both for the colour of words and their rhythm.

I like to picture him as he sits before his cottage; the spare, bent figure; the wide, soft hat, the soft, white, turned-down collar setting off the clean-shaven face—a finely-balanced face which should have been drawn by Holbein, with its broad forehead, strong nose, and large, firm chin, for Holbein alone could give us the effect of the crow's-feet and the intent, piercing eyes, made small as if to shutter out the too strong light, the sharp eyes which are yet patient and at bottom very very sad.

For this is the soul of the great searcher after truth: he will see all there is to be seen and bring to the task infinite courage and patience; but "vanity of vanities, all is vanity" is to him the conclusion of the whole matter:—

"I should like to believe in progress," he says, "in the gradual growth of intelligence from plane to plane, the progress upwards and development; I should like to believe in it if I could; but I can't. . . ."

"I find God in my own heart more clearly than in the outside world. . . ."

"The world I have studied is a tiny world, and yet this little patch of life is an infinite ocean, unfathomable and full of undiscovered secrets. The light penetrates a little way below the surface; but lower down all is darkness and silence, abyss on abyss. . . ."

"Success in this world is to the noisy and combative, to those who talk about themselves in and out of season like cheap jacks at a fair: they become known because they make a noise."

"But have you reached no conclusion, M. Fabre?" one asks; "Does no hypothesis lead towards the heart of the mystery?"

He shakes his head. "I have found none. To science nature is an enigma without a solution. Every generation has its own pet hypothesis. We climb over the crumbling ruins of forgotten theories, but truth always escapes us. We have no net with which to capture truth. . . ."

Are we not even a mystery to each other? Nay, is not each man a mystery to himself? a creature of infinite possibilities, of miserable imperfect achievement?

So talks perhaps the wisest man and certainly the best-read in the book of Nature of whom the centuries have left us any record.

REVIEWS

THE "CLOUDS" OF ARISTOPHANES

The Clouds of Aristophanes. With Introduction, English Prose Translation, &c., by W. J. M. STARKIE, Hon. Litt.D., Hon. LL.D. (Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.)

ALTHOUGH compulsory Greek has been to some extent abolished at Oxford, the language holds too strong a position and its merits are too well recognised on various grounds for it ever to disappear from the University. And although again in this utilitarian age the claims of Modern Languages and Science appear to many to require recognition at the expense of Greek, it can still be rightly held that no literary education can be complete without a knowledge of the language of ancient Greece and all that that nation achieved for art and culture in the past ages. The relics of the Greek Drama that have been recovered are a priceless possession of the world. Though so much has perished, we know fully the stages by which the Tragic Drama was developed from the dithyrambic song chanted in favour of Dionysus, the wine-god, at public festivals, and how after half a century it was supplemented by Comedy, the spontaneous mirth-making at rustic festivals of vintage and harvest, when the forces of Nature were boisterously worshipped.

The great masters of Tragedy differed in their natures. Æschylus, magniloquent and grandiose, earnest and religious, felt profoundly the seeming war of principles in the moral government of the world. He saw the constraining force of Necessity. He had fought against Persia, his heroes were above the human standard, but even they had to fulfil the doom appointed for them by awful supernatural powers. His successor, Sophocles, with the perfection of his art, excelled, as the dramatist of human character, in delineating the great natural emotions. He believed in the goodness of the gods, and the eternal law of purity identical with their true will. He belonged to the great age of Pericles and Athens, and his personal qualities made him popular. Euripides, with his romance and novelty, struck a lower note; "his homeliness and unrestrained pathos bring him nearer to every-day life;" the ideal beauty of Tragedy was lost in him. A rationalist and sceptic, he was versed in the new studies of rhetoric and logic, which the old school hated. His picturesqueness and tenderness have endeared him to the modern world. Comedy, though springing from the same worship of Dionysus as Tragedy, reached maturity later. Its great representative to us is Aristophanes (448-385 B.C.), who, both as poet and satirist, was in his prime during the Peloponnesian War (431-404 B.C.), the chief light of the old, or political, Comedy (470-390 B.C.) of democratic Athens, when the spirit of satire was unscrupulously personal. "For nearly forty years he was the great burlesque critic of Athenian life—political, intellectual, moral, and social." Before an appreciative audience he lashed an enemy or a policy with unrestricted licence. In the "Knights" he assailed the demagogue Cleon, partly in revenge; in the "Clouds" he attacked the new spirit of inquiry and culture as personified in the Sophists and Socrates as the type of the new movement. Aristophanes, in fact, was a Conservative, clinging like a modern Tory to the good old traditions of Athens, with the conquerors at Marathon (in 490 B.C.) as his national ideals.

In his animosity to demagogues, philosophers, rhetoricians, Aristophanes is charged with having exceeded the bounds of legitimate caricature, with having exaggerated the case against them, and having been unfair to Socrates and Euripides.

The "Clouds" was first produced at the great Dionysia festival in 423 B.C., in the year of the armistice between Athens and Sparta, soon after the loss of Amphipolis and the defeat at Delium. The play took only the third place. The revised edition, which we possess, was brought out, but never acted. The existence of the two editions is held to be proved by internal evidence in the text. Possibly the revision was never quite carried out. The argument of the play is fairly simple. The "Clouds" are the chorus, dressed as women. The principal character, Strepsiades, a peasant, desires by means of rhetorical skill to repudiate his debts. For this purpose, therefore, he consults his neighbour Socrates, at his Thinking-shop or Reflectory, and his two disciples. Failing signally to derive any benefit from his instruction, he deposes his spendthrift son Pheidippides (sparer of horses) for the same object and to be cured of his extravagant habits. Socrates hands the son over to the Two Reasons. The wrangle between the Just and Unjust Reason, won by the latter, is a hit at the Sophists. Socrates announces the complete success of the instruction conveyed by the Unjust Reason to Pheidippides, who beats his father and justifies his conduct. Eventually Strepsiades proceeds to burn down Socrates' abode and Reflectory from the roof. The scenes obviously afford opportunities for the expression of much badinage, and for open attack on the Sophists, including all teachers of physical philosophies and rhetoric, and on Socrates, who in his dialectic methods resembled them, while he waged a lifelong warfare against them.

The name Sophist, a wise man, originally honourable, became a term of reproach—to which Plato lent his influence—through the charges made by the uncompromising Conservatives against their assertion of free discussion, their utilitarianism, and their practice of taking money for instruction. The Sophists have found defenders in Grote and others, who have claimed for them a useful function in the education of the Athenians, not as a sect or school, but as a distinct class or profession with strong individual peculiarities. The alleged unfairness of Aristophanes against Socrates is based on his exhibiting the latter in a picture of pure fancy, not as he was, but as he was not. For Socrates did not teach Astronomy and Natural Philosophy, nor did he teach for money, nor was he the pale student. Socrates felt the sting of the attacks, for in his Apology at his trial in 399 B.C., twenty-four years later, he referred to the inveterate prejudice which the calumnies in the "Clouds" had raised against him. But at this distance of time the charge of unfairness appears itself to be overwrought. Caricature and burlesque cannot be limited to matters of fact; to be successful they must be exaggerated, and aim at the type as well as the individual. To Aristophanes conscientiously the Sophists and Socrates were the enemy who had to be routed. Socrates was the heresiarch who had provoked a large number of enemies, but the capital sentence on him might easily have been commuted to exile if, after conviction, he had not welcomed death.

Dr. Starkie has spared no pains with this edition of the Comedy, which is said to have been the favourite of its author. He has studied the manuscripts and the scholia, and appends various readings. In several chapters questions connected with the play are examined, a metrical analysis is prefixed, the critical notes, commentary and appendix are copious and exhaustive. The prose translation is perhaps the special feature, as it has been the fashion with previous editors of Aristophanes—for instance, Mitchell, Frere, B. B. Rogers and others—to render the Greek poetry into so-called English poetry. Whether blank verse or rhyme be adopted, any metre must hamper the translator in his aim at accuracy. The manner of translating has gone through five various stages since the days of Dryden. Little remains to be said since Dr. Warren's scholarly essay on "The Art of Translation" in his "Essays of Poets and Poetry." Judged by the canons therein summarised, which are generally accepted nowadays, Dr. Starkie's version is successful, as it satisfies the fundamental condition of producing an impression similar, or as nearly as may be similar, to that produced by the original. It is vigorous, and in the compound words, coined phrases, and strange language seeks to reproduce the Aristophanic style. To our taste Dr. Starkie has somewhat overdone this form of imitation. We have noted a number of expressions—such as semblable, tirrits, knowing file, in querpo, in reguerdon, miching, scant the sizes, renege, harlotry wise saws, sowl by the ears, carbonado—some of which are hardly intelligible, and all might be improved by the substitution of simple words. With this exception, the work can be entirely commended. Its scholarship is undeniable, and the volume may well be placed alongside Jebb's monumental edition of Sophocles, Jowett's Plato and Thucydides, the Odyssey rendered by Butcher, Lang, and Leaf, and Munro's Lucretius, all of which have prose translations by real scholars. It is by such high-class works that the study of Greek will be facilitated and maintained, and the value of its literature demonstrated. Though manners have changed, much of the spirit of Aristophanic Comedy still abides in the caricature and burlesque of modern life.

JAPANESE LOVE-LETTERS

Love-Letters of a Japanese. Edited by G. N. MORTLAKE.
(Stanley Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

THE prefatory remarks in "An Englishwoman's Love-letters" and those in the volume now before us bear a very similar heading. Mr. Laurence Housman in his "Explanation," and Mr. Mortlake in his "In Explanation," set out to assure the guileless reader that he has been presented with genuine love-letters. Mr. Housman managed the business so well, and so effectually muffled his laughter that it was a long time before the considerably agitated public awoke to the fact that Mr. Housman's "Explanation" was no explanation at all, and that the clever letters were the result of his own subtle work. We do not definitely assert that Mr. Mortlake has followed suit in the present volume, but we have reasons for believing that these letters were never carried many miles over the sea, delivered by postmen, or faithfully packed away in double-locked boxes. Mr. Mortlake assures us, like the conjuror, that there is no deception, and that both Mertyl Meredith and Kenrio Watanabe, after having left behind them a dramatic and pathetic love-story, departed this life. This is probably true, but we doubt very much if they ever lived, except in the author's vivid imagination. Whether these letters are genuine or not, the fact remains that they are vastly entertaining, and sufficiently intimate to tickle the palate of the reader who can swallow an enormous amount of sentimentality without being positively ill. If the present volume were reduced to pulp, we should expect to find a considerable amount of something akin to sugar. Lovers, fictitious or otherwise, seem to use the word "sweet" more frequently than any other. "Sweet" appears in this volume so persistently that the worthy printer must have been sorely tried to find the necessary letters!

There is a story running through these wild and often indiscreet effusions. Kenrio Watanabe, a Japanese artist, while studying in Vienna meets a young English girl by the name of Mertyl Meredith, who follows a similar vocation, and reminds us not a little of one of Mr. H. G. Wells' heroines. A friendship springs up between them. Watanabe is a married man, but just as his friendship for Mertyl overlaps the bounds of platonic affection he learns that his Japanese wife has been unfaithful to him, and that she herself pleads for a divorce—a most unusual proceeding under the circumstances recorded in these letters. This places Watanabe on a totally different footing. He sees himself, rather prematurely, as an unmarried man. He drops writing about the higher Buddhism and the teaching of Confucius in his letters to Mertyl, and becomes instead decidedly neurotic, a fit subject for the investigation of Mr. Havelock Ellis. Mertyl, too, refrains from quoting Emerson, and becomes almost equally neurotic. She writes:—"Sweet, I kiss my arms, and try to think they are holding yours." Mr. Wells' Ann Veronica on one occasion stroked the hair on her arms; but she did not go so far as to kiss them. Again Mertyl writes:—"Sweet, I long so for the physical touch of your hands on mine, and to look into your eyes. To be kissed. I sometimes long so much that I take a girdle and bind it tightly, so tightly that I can hardly breathe, round my waist, and then close my eyes a little and dream that it is your arms around me." We should have thought that this process was extremely painful. After all Watanabe was an artist and not a wrestler.

If we have failed to take seriously such quotations as the above, we have done so with no cynical or unkindly feeling. The love-letters of the Brownings and those of Abélard and Héloïse are not famous on account of their sentimentality, but because of their deep human sentiment. Abélard wrote in one of his letters, "Love is capable of being concealed; a word, a look—nay, silence—speaks it." There is none of this feeling in the present volume. Passionate love is set dancing before us, and such a love dances in flame, and is quickly destroyed. These letters breathe no inward peace, suggest no strong grip upon life. They reveal red-hot experiments with the senses, and there is no hint of a love as eternal as the soul itself.

The lovers remain in London for some time. Then Watanabe returns to Japan in order to carry on his work and for the purpose of arranging the much-discussed divorce. Mr. Mortlake promises us in his opening remarks an intimate revelation of the Japanese character, as well as an intimate sketch of divorce proceedings in that country. We get neither, for Watanabe is far from being typically Japanese, and as for the divorce proceedings, we have failed to gather any fresh information on the subject.

Watanabe, none too proficient in his use of English, writes from his home in Tokyo:—"I must say that I was once married and have a child, although the marriage was an error and the child a misprint, having been never accompanied with love." This father of a misprint seems to have been more angry with his wife's stupidity and the fact that she spent too much money during his absence than with her misconduct in another direction. However, divorce is an easy matter in Japan, and Watanabe had no difficulty in concluding the affair to his entire satisfaction. Although Watanabe, according to his own elastic conscience, is a free man—free to marry the girl he had met in Vienna—he displays at this juncture no eagerness to meet Mertyl. His zest for his work seems to lessen gradually the once intense ardour of his letters. He climbs back to higher Buddhism again, and seems in no hurry for Mertyl to join him and to arrange for another marriage.

Mertyl reaches Tokyo and meets the wayward Watanabe. She realises at once that his love for her is dead, that he has taken all that is best in her, and then at the end thrown cruel, dull argument in her face. She returns the gifts he had given her with the following words:—"Each single one of these things is more precious than all that other people have given me. Each bears my kisses through the years I had it, and each has become a part of myself."

About a week later Watanabe has the audacity to write the following:—

Dear Miss Meredith—I hope you will have happy time in future, and marry some nice Englishman. You must not think what you said the other day that I made experiment with you, or that my words were not truth to you all the time in Europe, and in my letters. . . . I think I told you in earlier times that love is thought immoral with us. And now I know that it is really so. . . . I hope it is not true what you say, that you cannot love any second time, and that your life is finished.

In spite of the sentimentality in these letters, they contain considerable charm. They reflect the ardent love of a young English girl on the one hand, and on the other the cumbersome and objectionable posturing of a Japanese man. They are sufficiently true to life to awaken our sympathy for Mertyl Meredith and our anger towards Kenrio Watanabe. We sincerely hope that these letters are fictitious. If they are genuine, Mertyl deserves our pity, while Kenrio Watanabe would be let off far too lightly with a severe horsewhipping. Love in Japan is certainly not regarded as immoral. It is only immoral when such a weak, shifty type as that of Watanabe drags down the greatest thing in the world and smothers it in the gross mire of selfishness. For ourselves we prefer Japan's own way of love-making, untouched by European influence; her true love stories that are never boomed in preliminary advertisements, and never appear in print.

MONTAIGNE

Michel de Montaigne. By EDITH SICHEL. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

L'Influence de Montaigne sur les Idées pédagogiques de Locke et de Rousseau. By PIERRE VILLEY, Maître de Conférences à l'Université de Caen. (Hachette and Co.)

A CERTAIN critic aroused the fierce indignation of Sainte-Beuve by dubbing himself a "Montaignologue." The offence was double; it was a pedantry—"savouring of scholastic cackle," says Sainte-Beuve—savouring too of modern vulgarity and specialisation, we are disposed to add; and it was a denial of one of the foremost articles in the Essayist's code. Montaigne has expressed himself strongly on the futility of "glosses" and "books on books," and we may fancy that, if he ever foresaw the "Montaignologues," he had the same lugubrious shiver as Horace when he contemplated the day when he should become a school-classic. Literary criticism is a parasitical development at best, and unless controlled and checked may some day choke the tree of literature. A good book of criticism has, however, a real function to perform. We do not refer to the "placing" of a work, for it is in this direction that criticism most clearly shows its tendency to become an abuse of the human intelligence. The undoubted service that a good biography or appreciation, such as Miss Sichel's, does to the reader is that it reminds him of neglected shelves in his library, kindles his desire to re-explore them, and suggests new ways of profiting by his enterprise.

We have said that Miss Sichel's book is a good one; we will venture further and say that it is a model for biographies of this kind. For one thing, it is distinguished by knowledge and sympathy, of such a quality as to command our attention, and to forbid the suspicion that is apt to haunt us in the case of a good many biographies, that the choice of the subject was a matter of comparative indifference to the writer. Further, and this is a very important point, Miss Sichel takes every opportunity of letting her hero speak, of making the biography as far as possible an autobiography. It is true that Montaigne lends himself rather readily to this treatment; his writings are far more depositories of raw material than finished works of art; his style is a series of packing-cases. On the other hand, his wares are so priceless that the task of putting them into a right setting demands a clear judgment and a large measure of self-restraint. But the biographer has done her work well—she has given a complete, concise, and connected account of Montaigne and an insight into some of his opinions.

Miss Sichel's book is divided, somewhat arbitrarily, as we began by thinking, into two parts—Montaigne the Man and Montaigne the Philosopher. The first part is the fuller, the second is the more brilliant; some pages show genuine intuition. This distinction is, however, a real one, though it becomes at times rather obscured. Montaigne was in theory the most uncompromising of individualists, aiming, like M. Bergeret after him, at Atarascia, at the dulling of all the sensitive places in his moral anatomy. "My one aim is to turn myself into a cow and a don't care." In practice he let the troubles of others upset his own peace of mind; he became Mayor of Bordeaux, and performed his duties with conscientious ability. But he always had a line marked beyond which the demands of his fellow-men were not to advance. Symbolically it was his private tower at home; politically the limit was reached when the plague broke out at Bordeaux; Montaigne retired at once and without any shame from his dangerous post of honour. Sometimes the man is more selfish than the philosopher. Recognised as the true founder of modern education, he neglected most of his children, and was even unable to reply to a question as to their number. He was a spiritual anarchist, going his own way, and refusing to be in any one's debt. "He might lend himself to the public, but give himself he would not, and could not." And there is nothing inconsistent in his deference for authorities—political and ecclesiastical; most anarchists or individualists have it in some measure. Flaubert has illustrated it in a well-known scene at the end of the "Éducation Sentimentale." He believes in pleasure, however obtained, so long as it does not cost him too much; he believes in the Lucretian happiness from the contemplation of other people's misfortunes. Most characteristically he used to give a positive value to the negative pleasure of sleep by having himself roused in the middle of the night. Miss Sichel is most thorough on Montaigne the man; Étienne de la Boétie and Marie de Gournay receive a very large share of attention, the former as being indispensable to an understanding of Montaigne (being, indeed, the peg on which he hung all his higher aspirations), the latter as the first "Montaignologue."

M. Villey is a great authority on various aspects of Montaigne. We understand that he has volumes in preparation on the influence of his author in France and in England. We approached the present work with some misgivings. Pedagogy is a grim word to put over the portals of a house in the city of knowledge; the history of ideas has generally been considered less alluring in these islands than on the other side of the Channel. M. Villey has reassured us on both counts; he displays a rare modesty in refusing to draw all sorts of conclusions from his data; he criticises the verbal and obviously superficial parallels that had been drawn before his time between Rousseau and Montaigne, and that had been too readily accepted. He is almost as ready as the essayist to say "Je ne sais." He gives what we think must often be the true explanation of mental filiation; the reading of a predecessor's book may bring suggestions to a thinker for developing his own ideas, and many a reminiscence is unconscious. M. Villey admits a very close relationship between Montaigne and the earlier works of Rousseau, but there are moments when it is startling to think there is anything in common between the practical, experimental wisdom of the former and the vacuum sociology of the latter. Rousseau would allow a child to drink when hot, because some animals do so without taking harm. On the other hand we should like to end by a quotation from Rousseau, because, though Montaigne first enunciated the principle, it was the former who put it into forme lapidaire, and it is the truest thing ever said about "Pedagogy":—"Mon objet n'est pas de lui (the child) donner la science, mais de lui apprendre à l'acquiescer au besoin."

WITH SWORD AND PEN

The Letters and Journal (1848-49) of Count Charles Leiningen-Westerburg. Edited, with an Introduction, by HENRY MARCZALI. Illustrated. (Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE pen is mightier than the sword" is a saying we can regard with approbation after reading this fascinating book, for it shows that Count Leiningen's pen shone at least as brightly as did his valiant sword. Those who know the indomitable courage of the man will realise how much that means. If Professor Marczali's principal object in editing the Letters and Journal of Count Leiningen is to establish the remarkable literary ability of his hero, his labour of love will surely not be in vain. Every page is charged with a forceful, lovable personality. His style is lucid and fresh in the extreme. If he sums up his military companions in terms of soldiery, he does so on a broad human basis. He gives us clear-cut portraits as well as a sympathetic insight into the character behind the facial lines. His God, the cause he so strenuously fought for, and his wife and children all seem lifted to the same high plane of thought. If he was big and burly on the battlefield, a great disciplinarian and the enemy of all meanness and cowardliness in the ranks, in all his communications to his wife there was a gentleness and simplicity of expression peculiarly his own. His Letters, Journal, and Notes were all written, with one or two exceptions, to his beloved wife Lizzie. Under the circumstances it is natural to find that he figured largely in his vivid account of the Hungarian War of Independence. He was not above recording his own deeds of bravery and the recognition he received for his services. He does so, however, not in the dull way of an egoist, but with such naïveté that these personal touches are particularly pleasing.

We need not go into detail as to why Leiningen decided to support Hungary in her War of Independence. Professor Marczali writes:—

His sense of justice, the innate chivalry that impelled him to defend the victim of an unjust attack, drew him towards Hungary at a time when his brothers and his cousins continued to fight for the Emperor.

The fact that a Leiningen, hitherto on the side of the Court party, should espouse Hungary's fight for liberty was an action that was first looked upon with considerable suspicion by the Hungarians themselves. It was only Leiningen's conspicuous bravery that utterly dispelled the hostile attitude originally adopted towards him. Even when he knew he would have to fight against the Imperial troops, he wrote: "I cannot desert a cause when it is in danger." He thought he saw liberty for Hungary, and in that thought he steadfastly set his face against any sort of compromise. It was this manful determination that awakened the admiration and friendship of Görgey. He wrote in one of his letters:—

Some people have a very convenient plan: they hoist German, Austrian, and Imperial flags all together. As required they can easily remove the superfluous ones and join in the triumph of the victorious idea.

Leiningen was too great a soldier to study his own convenience. He eagerly looked forward to receiving his wife's letters, and still more so to living the old happy life with her again. Such thoughts, however, were subordinate to his stern regard for duty, and though we may regret that so human a man was destined never to meet his wife again, it tends to make his sacrifice all the more noble, tends to raise him not only to a high place in the memory of Hungarians, but has given him a sure position among the great men and the great soldiers of the world.

Perhaps the most notable passages in the Journal refer to Leiningen's ardent description of Görgey. It was a worthy tribute to a remarkable man, and destined to be a strong defence of one who was regarded by some as a traitor to his country. To Leiningen Görgey ever remained a hero, a man who delighted to "to bathe in the hail of bullets." Leiningen wrote:—

However listless I may have been before, my military life had aroused all the good latent in me, and, had you (Lizzie) been able to see me then, you would not have known me for the same stout Charles who was all day buried in his books.

That latent good in Leiningen was fanned into a bright blaze by Görgey's influence.

There is something unspeakably sad in Leiningen's letters written in prison. He had stood for a cause that did not culminate in victory. He was compelled to write to his wife knowing that every word would be read by others. He realised then that his days were numbered, and that at any moment he might receive his death sentence. Even in such a crisis as this he thought not of his own troubles but of those of his wife. He wrote:—

Your fate is more cruel than mine; for years you will have to suppress the sorrow gnawing at your heart. Yet be assured that even from the other world I shall think of you with gratitude for having lived to comfort my children.

Those weary days in prison seem to have added the finishing touch to the greatness of the man. He had put his house in order, and, without cant or humbug, had prepared to meet his God. What strength, what fortitude we find in his words: "The nearer we approach to the grave, the smoother and easier does our downward path become"! His last ringing words to Lizzie were:—

God bless and protect you, my darling, noble wife, and give you strength, and to me may He grant a share in His eternal peace! Darling, beloved Lizzie! my children! farewell! Before long I shall have passed away. Once more my thanks for your faithful love and for all you have done for me! Oh, God! I can stand it no longer, it is too much for me! Good-bye, my life, my all!

The next day the brave soldier and good man died a martyr for the cause he had taken so devoutly to his heart. We are told that "He bore himself with noble dignity when the sentence of death was read to him. . . . He died the most dignified, the finest death of them all." Leiningen wrote in one of his Journal notes:—

October 1 (Monday). How great the effect of a single moment! For years! A moment—virtue, crime, glory, shame, sorrow, delight, all depends upon moments. Death, too, is but a moment, yet it leads to eternity!

Leiningen knew the value of moments. After the toil of the battlefield, when most men would have taken their ease, he only laid aside the sword to take forth his pen, to drive it across the paper with the same zest and inspiration he displayed in the stress of battle. The result is a human record of a great soldier expressed in terse and haunting prose.

AN AMUSING EGOIST

The Herkomers. By SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER. Vol. II. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN the first volume of this autobiography (see Supplement to THE ACADEMY, Dec. 10th, 1910) we described the author's writing as "thin." In the volume now before us the style is still lacking in robustness. Sir Hubert von Herkomer in his Introduction writes:—"There is necessarily a note of egotism in the pages that follow which has been called 'un-English.' But 'it is idle to criticise the egotism of autobiographies, however pervading and intense,' and I have given my reader fair warning." The very nature of an autobiography is in itself a plea for egotism; but the egotism we find in these pages is at times laid on so heavily that it strikes a farcical note. "Do it" may well have been Sir Hubert's motto; but he did everything with such a fanfare of trumpets and with an air of the showman that, if we took him quite seriously, it would give us cause to regret that Carlyle had not added Sir Hubert von Herkomer to his portrait-gallery in "Heroes and Hero-Worship." That D. G. Rossetti was a poet as well as an artist—or shall we write an artist as well as a poet?—pales into insignificance when compared with this German's versatile accomplishments. Sir Hubert, besides being an artist, was a musical composer, architect, playwright, and lecturer, and in telling us about these attainments we can only marvel that there is such a thing as competition in these particular vocations. It is a pity that this all-round man has not given his reader credit for a little imagination and a sense of humour. Our impression of Sir Hubert is that he was an indefatigable worker, but a still more indefatigable talker. Somehow or other we are compelled to associate his residence, "Lululaund," with that of Mr. Hall Caine's "Greeba Castle," for both suggest a subtle combination of home and advertisement.

Brilliant ideas were an everyday occurrence with Sir Hubert. Suddenly remembering his musical and literary ability, he resolved to write a music-play, to be called "An Idyl." He was advised to write his tunes, and "get some musician to score them for the instruments." Our author writes:—

Pride, belief in self, would have none of it. Did I not, as stated in the first volume, spend my pocket-money of half-a-crown a week at the Crystal Palace "Saturday Pops" in the summer of 1866-7, and soak myself with the orchestral colouring given by the various masters to their music? Had I not followed in one piece the wood-wind alone, in another the brass, and in yet another the strings? I saw how it was done; of course I did! Therefore, why not do it myself with my own tunes?

And so it came about that this clever patron of Saturday Pop's rushed off to a music-shop and purchased Lafleur's "Atlas of Instrumentation":

Then [writes the budding composer] I went ahead, for my tunes and incidental music were already written. For balance of the instruments, for grouping, I trusted to instinct, and to the suggestions I could find in the scores I had. Anyway I did the thing!

In Sir Hubert's particularly naïve way he goes on to describe the discussion he and his family had as to who should conduct the orchestra. Eventually the composer's little daughter exclaimed, "Why don't you have Dr. Richter?" To this her parent replied, "Good heavens, child! do you know what you are talking about?" But it appeared that the child did know, for Dr. Hans Richter conducted the thirteen performances of "An Idyl" given in a theatre erected in the artist's garden. Sir Hubert writes:—"Modesty is not exactly one of my failings, but I would hesitate to write down here what Dr. Richter prophesied if I were to study music—even for six months." We should likewise hesitate if Sir Hubert were to describe his performances afterwards!

Sir Hubert is a warm admirer of the motor-car. He writes:—"I leave the house of my friend at any hour suitable, curl myself up in the comfortable covered car, and sleep until awakened by the chauffeur's loud voice announcing, 'Lululaund, Sir, all safe!'" The artist's chauffeur is evidently not an egoist, for he frankly admits the fallibility of his driving, even to the possibility of an accident.

When Sir Hubert's picture, "All Beautiful in Naked Purity," was exhibited in the Academy, he tells us that it "kept the room in which it was placed practically clear of visitors; and as for the settee in front of it, nobody dared to sit there facing the objectionable work." This affords the artists a peg on which to hang a few remarks in regard to art and puritanism. He comes to the conclusion that "the noblest forms of art have represented the human figure; and flesh-painting represents the highest achievement of the painter."

Most of us associate Sir Hubert von Herkomer with his great picture "The Council of the Royal Academy, 1907." The most imposing figure in the group is that of Sir Hubert himself, and we must frankly admit that we prefer this pleasing and dignified portrait to the one he has given us in his autobiography.

THE SMALLEST WELSH COUNTY

Flintshire: Its History and Its Records. Being an Address to the Society given in the County Council Chamber, Mold, January 13th, 1911, by T. F. TOUT, M.A., Professor of Mediæval and Modern History in the University of Manchester. (Flintshire Historical Society. 5s.)

FLINTSHIRE is almost the smallest of the counties of the United Kingdom, and it may also with justice be included among the least known. Most of the other shires have histories of far more general interest, and the cultured student of his country's past would probably place Flintshire almost last in the list of counties to whose annals he proposed to devote attention. That which is least important to an Englishman may, however, be first in importance to a man of Flint. In any event, to many of the leading inhabitants of this tiny county the history of Flintshire is of sufficient consequence to justify the establishment of a society for its study. Thus the Flintshire Historical Society came into existence, and all lovers of the past in Flintshire and elsewhere should receive it with welcome, for out of the local history of even relatively unimportant districts is made up a good part of the greater history of the country.

Flintshire, although small and almost the youngest of the counties, is still not without a history of its own, full of justifiable interest to a wide circle. The Welsh marches, their chequered story and romantic surroundings are intimately connected with the tiny North Wales shire; so are the better known and more attractive incidents which successively narrate the past of her more important neighbour

Chester. If only for her connection with these two subsidiaries of English history Flint should be interesting. On the other hand the shire was for long an integral portion of Wales, and as such took a share in the vicissitudes of that Principality. Professor Tout, than whom none could have been better chosen to inaugurate the session of the Society, very properly devoted himself in this address to a general survey of Flintshire history. For others, the members of the Society themselves, is the task to pore over the records of the county and to unravel the problems which await solution. Professor Tout's office was to give general directions to the workers in the field and to introduce them to the task which is before them. The name of Professor Tout is sufficient guarantee that this office has been performed not only thoroughly, but also agreeably.

The county of Flint is a very modern one. At the most it stretches back to the reign of Edward I., but the union which that monarch formed for local government in that district fell far short of the limits of the county as now defined. Properly speaking, Flintshire may be said to have come into existence in the reign of Henry VIII. For instance, it was not until the latter reign that Mold, the county town, became part of the county. Incidentally we learn the reason for the disjointed nature of Flintshire. Marford and Hoseley are quite apart from the main portion, being surrounded by Denbigh territory. Until 1542 they had formed a portion of the latter county, but when in that year the county boundaries were rearranged these two districts were joined to the smaller county, so that all the Welsh lands of Lord Derby might for convenience be in one shire. Very properly Professor Tout does not penetrate deeply into any of the subjects on which he touches in this address. Incidentally, however, he makes an interesting suggestion regarding the origin of the "Clwydian" churches of West Flintshire, which has hitherto given rise to much speculation. Their architectural form—two parallel naves of equal dimensions—is peculiar to that district, but Professor Tout has discovered similar edifices among the Dominican churches of Languedoc. He reminds his readers that after the conquest by Edward I. practically all the buildings of the conquered territory, having been razed, had to be re-erected. At that very period a Dominican was Bishop of St. Asaph, and the influence of that school of friars was supreme in the diocese. It is even known that Dominican officials were employed in inquiring into the damage done to the churches during the wars. With these premisses it is easy to conclude that the mysterious form of the Flintshire churches is directly due to Dominican architects.

THE ROYAL IRISH REGIMENT

The Campaigns and History of the Royal Irish Regiment from 1684 to 1902. By LIEUTENANT-COLONEL G. LE M. GRETTON. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans of Battlefields. (W. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.)

A MILITARY work by Colonel Gretton, an officer specially chosen by that great military author and historian the late Colonel Henderson to assist him when writing the history of the 1899-1902 war in South Africa should be well worth reading. This book most certainly is so; moreover, whilst some regimental histories we are acquainted with, however accurate or the reverse they may be, are heavy work to get through, this volume we have read from cover to cover with pleasure. It is almost a military history of the British Army since the Revolution, so many are the campaigns in which the regiment has taken part. Very interesting is the account of the campaign in Ireland after the Battle of the Boyne, and especially the description from the diary of a Royal Irish officer serving there of the capture of Athlone.

There appear a few slight errors in the volume—e.g., the total of the casualties at the Battle of Blenheim on page 39 is not correct; again, it seems curious that the bounty paid to the major of the regiment at that battle should be nearly double the amount given to the lieutenant-colonel who was in command during the action.

The maps are clear, with no unnecessary detail, and by their aid the general course of the engagements described can be easily followed. To those who know the ground now the map of Aboukir and Alexandria in 1801, with the vanished lake of Aboukir as it then existed, will be of interest apart from the battle.

The want of "pull together" between Navy and Army in Lord Howe's operations at Toulon and afterwards is a great contrast to Abercrombie's operations in 1801, both of which are most excellently described, the regiment having been present. The splendid combination of Army and Navy in the successful landing at Aboukir in face of a formidable enemy awaiting them on the beach shows what can be done when both arms work together. It is a pity that we do not practise more of such operations nowadays, for if the way to learn is by making mistakes, the combined East Coast manoeuvres of some years ago were indeed instructive.

There are some quite good stories told in the book, one of which, referring to the New Zealand campaign, in which the regiment was engaged, we take the liberty of quoting:—

In a skirmish the son of a chief was made prisoner, badly wounded in the leg. To save his life the surgeons amputated the limb, and when the young man was fit to be moved a message was sent to his father that he might take the lad back to his village. The chief was very grateful for the kindness his son had received at our hands; he presented the general with a cartload of potatoes, and assured him that in future he would not kill any wounded soldiers that fell into his hands, but would only cut off one of their legs, and send them back to camp.

Our space being limited, we cannot deal with all the points we should like to regarding the book; we would, however, call attention to a letter of the late General Gordon concerning the regiment, in which he dwells on the difference between Irish regiments and others, and the necessity of treating them differently. There is no doubt that, generally speaking, Irish officers are best for dealing with Irishmen in the ranks, whilst if the writer of this review regards the English country lad as a better soldier it may perhaps be his national prejudice.

On the whole, a most creditable career has been the lot of this fine old regiment. It seems to have emerged even from that grave of great reputations the late South African War with a vast amount of good work to its credit and a minimum of regrettable incidents. There is a very full and fair account of the events in the Tirah campaign which led to General Sir H. Havelock-Allen's going to the frontier where he met his tragic death in the Khyber Pass.

AN IMPERIAL VOLUPTUARY

The Amazing Emperor: Heliogabalus. By J. STUART HAY.
(Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.)

THIS curious book is an attempt to whitewash the blackened character of the foolish Sybarite boy Emperor—to what purpose it is not easy to see, either ethical or historical. Even on Mr. Hay's own showing the whitewash is singularly thin. Gibbon admits the probable exaggerations of fancy or prejudice, yet he adds that "confining ourselves to the public scenes displayed before the Roman people, and attested by grave and contemporary historians, their inexpressible infamy surpasses that of any other age or country."

This sober and judicial verdict has not been upset by Mr. Hay. It is impossible to take seriously his hyper-sensitiveness about the supposed "lack of justice that the memory of Elagabalus has long suffered." We admit that the charge of cruelty may be "not proven." There still remain the sensual infamies of the "fearless, generous, affectionate boy," as Mr. Hay enthusiastically describes him. But his generosity was culpably prodigal, while his affections were criminally abnormal. That history from time to time produces such characters may be well known. But their indecent actions are best relegated to decent obscurity. Nor can we feel that the sort of character from which Nature revolts really gains anything substantial by way of excuse when the individual is ticketed a Psycho-Sexual Hermaphrodite.

The medical psychologist may diagnose sexual diseases, as Dr. Krafft Ebing has done so minutely, but the horrible perversions he recounts are none the less revolting; while the object of a doctor is to teach degenerates their real responsibility. There were sane Romans who believed in the mens sana in corpore sano, and they were aghast at the crimes of Heliogabalus. We are forced to the conclusion that one object of this book is the glorification of pagan apolaustic luxury and sensuality in contradistinction to Christian ideals of a higher life of self-sacrificing progress. Mr. Stuart Hay is frankly pagan. With equal frankness he evidently detests Christianity. We have made a long list of his sneers and jibes at that "neurotic superstition," the Christian religion, conceived and enunciated in the worst possible taste, aided by a perverse prostitution of Christian quite phraseology. This sort of satire is cheap indeed, and unworthy of a serious historian. Nor can the descent to mere vulgar indecencies be excused by telling us in the Preface that "Mrs. Grundy's prurient mind . . . may expect to be shocked." But there is also a pruriency in writing of and revelling in things over which custom (leaving Mrs. Grundy out) rightly draws a veil.

We confess to some surprise that a philosophic historian like Professor Bury should think it worth his while, in his Introduction, to belittle Christianity by saying, in effect, that it would have made no difference to the world to-day or since if "one of those homogeneous Oriental faiths which are now dead" had triumphed and if Christianity had disappeared—"by the dispensation of Providence," as he cynically puts it. The story of the culmination of phallic worship, as told by Mr. Hay, makes it difficult to understand how any true philosopher or impartial writer could regard the cults of Baal, of Mithra, or of Isis as likely to be of equal benefit to the highest progress of mankind with the spiritual ethics of Christianity. Mr. Hay's writing of the English language leaves a good deal to be desired. He is often in difficulties at the beginning of a new paragraph, and has constant recourse to that lamest of openings—"To return to," "To proceed." His style is undignified, as, for example, "He went one worse," "Just a bit awkward," and the use of the wretched Americanism "at that." There are ungrammatical lapses—e.g., "even like the term was applied." But lack of dignity in thought is hardly likely to find compensation in dignity of style.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Napoleon and his Coronation. By FRÉDÉRIC MASSON. Translated by FREDERIC COBB. Illustrated by Félicien Myrbach. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

UNDOUBTEDLY one of the greatest proofs of Napoleon's astonishing power lies in the fact that he was able to get himself acclaimed as Emperor by the very people who but a few years previously had slaughtered their own aristocracy, and held all matters of kingship a criminal abomination. The reasons that induced the great ruler of France to take this step are made clear in a masterly fashion by M. Frédéric Masson, as are also those that caused him to demand the assistance of no less a personage than the Pope himself at the ceremony. In the author's own words:—

He was strongly confident that a religious consecration would lend a weightier dignity to a Sovereign invested by the popular choice . . . He considered that only by this, by the Consecration and Coronation, he could become a true Sovereign . . . Henceforth he was endued with an indelible character, such as all the other Sovereigns were bound to respect.

The negotiations that preceded the Consecration were prolonged and not a little complicated. In view of the recent events in France, Pius VII. was not a little amazed at the request that he should come to Paris to endow the creation of the new Emperor with the seal of religion. The reigning Houses and the aristocracies of Europe were bitterly opposed to the plan, as, indeed, were many members of the Vatican itself. But Napoleon was in earnest. He was convinced that the element of religion must enter into the Imperial life in order to give a permanent stamp to the dynasty. To this end he was prepared with important concessions to the Church, and with the offer of a reversal of the policy that had driven the priesthood from France.

In the end the hesitation of the simple-minded Pope was overcome. He travelled from Rome with as much dignity as Napoleon's insistence would permit, for the Emperor, growing impatient, used every means to hasten the stately religious progress to Paris. As to the great ceremony itself, fears had been entertained in the capital lest an exuberance of taste on the part of Napoleon should bring ridicule on costume and general paraphernalia; but when the moment came the natural dignity of the new Emperor triumphed.

M. Masson's book is an extremely able one. He has provided a wealth of detail, and has yet retained unbroken the thread of an absorbingly interesting story—a notable achievement in itself. The negotiations with the Vatican throw a light upon Napoleonic policy that cannot fail to be extremely instructive to the many students of the life and times of the great Corsican.

Shepherds of Britain. By ADELAIDE L. J. GOSSET. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

MOST available sources of information have been ransacked in the compilation of this comprehensive work, seeing that there are some 160 contributions, chiefly by different authors, some being living writers, while there are excerpts from many others and from newspapers and magazines, even so far back as the Gentleman's Magazine for 1797. The result is a very interesting book on all kinds of subjects connected with sheep, sheep-farming, and shepherd-life in the pastoral districts of Great Britain and Ireland. Sheep-dogs naturally claim a good deal of attention, and there are many stories of their wonderful sagacity. The competitions known as sheep-dog trials, first started in 1873, have become deservedly popular and widespread. Among the numerous subjects treated may be mentioned Sheep Marks and Tallies, the Wool Harvest, the Care of Wool and the Labours of the Loom, Shepherds' Garb (alas! for the passing of the picturesque and sensible smock-frock), Shepherds' Arts, Implements and Crafts, and Pastimes, with an interesting section on Pastoral Folk Lore, where an account is given of a curious burial custom. A lock of wool was put into a shepherd's coffin to show at the Judgment Day that his vocation prevented him from attending church. All the same, we knew a fine old Wiltshire shepherd who died this year, aged seventy-six, who all his life seldom missed Sunday morning service, except during the lambing season. On the South Downs, before the days of cheap watches, shepherds used to make for themselves rough sundials on the turf by drawing a circle and fixing a number of sticks upright on the circumference, then having several gnomons, one for each hour after noon, in order to know at what hour to take the sheep home to fold. We lately heard of similar dials, but rudely made of wood, which were constructed, within living memory, by the wood-cutters on the Berkeley and neighbouring estates in the Severn Valley. Practically every sheep district in Great Britain is noticed; from the "Lookers" of Romney Marsh and the sheep of the "Towens" and Scilly to the Lake Country, and on through the Highlands to the wild sheep of the Shetland and Orkney Isles. We commend this delightful book to all true lovers of country life, who cannot fail to be pleased both with its versatile text and with the numerous good and very descriptive illustrations.

A Manual of English Pronunciation and Grammar for the Use of Dutch Students. By J. H. A. GÜNTHER. (J. B. Wolters, Groningen. 4s. 6d.)

MR. GÜNTHER's book is intended for candidates preparing for an examination in English. It is arranged in two parts, the first dealing with English pronunciation, the second with English grammar. In the words of the author: "As it has been my object to formulate the current habits of speech, to write a grammar of the language as written and spoken to-day, I have for the bulk of the examples drawn upon writers of present-day English." The list of these writers of present-day English is too lengthy to be reproduced here; let it suffice to say that it is a quite unusually comprehensive and well-considered one.

Mr. Günther's work is, indeed, admirable, not only in its lucidity and thoroughness, but in the wide scope it offers. The comparisons in style of the modern authors are notably excellent. Indeed, in this respect the book might be perused with equal advantage by the English student as well as by the Dutch. Mr. Günther refuses to lay much stress on the prohibition of the split infinitive. Here, we must admit, we are not at one with him. In his list of well-known writers addicted to the habit he quotes from Hardy; but in this case he has culled merely from dialogue. Therefore surely the force of the example fails! Yet even here the author's liberality is strongly to be commended, since he makes a practice of submitting every view and of refusing to dogmatise. The result has given us one of the most enlightened of modern grammars.

The Mansion House of the City of London. Compiled by CARL HENTSCHEL. Illustrated. (Carl Hentschel, Ltd. 6d.)

MR. CARL HENTSCHEL, Chairman of the General Purposes Committee of the Corporation, has gathered together in this well printed and illustrated booklet some interesting information concerning the Lord Mayor's official residence and other matters pertaining to the government of our ancient metropolis. In addition he gives us a glimpse at the occupants of the Mansion House and a short account of its principal treasures. Besides exterior and interior views of the famous building at different periods of its existence, there are to be found among the illustrations portraits of the present Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, and of several previous Lord Mayors, together with representations of the Seals of the Mayoralty, the old State Barge, some of the older pieces of the Mansion House plate, and the famous State Coach which so many thousands are all agog to see every 9th of November.

LOGOMACHIES

The Battle of Souls. By HUGH NAYBARD. (J. and J. Gray and Co., Edinburgh.)

Books on an imaginary invasion of England by Germany or other Continental Power are somewhat played out and tend to become rather a bore. The same may be said of books which deal with an imaginary reappearance of Christ upon earth, for the purpose of reforming Christianity, whether in London or Chicago. In this extravagant romance both these worn-out themes are combined. The wearisome result is therefore exactly what we may expect. Hence it is particularly amusing to be told in the publisher's preliminary review (which is as laudatory as the epitaph on a provincial mayor's tombstone) that "this book will cause a surprise to all thoughtful men and women, as something completely new in fiction." That it will find readers goes without saying. That it will "make a profound impression on the reading public" might also be predicated, if by the reading public is understood that mass of illiterate folk who enjoy the wildest possible sensation, especially if well spiced with vulgar attack on the human failure inseparable from all religions, together with a fine mixture of mysterious and occult devil-worship. All this and a great deal more may be found in Mr. Naybard's vapid romancings.

An English Prime Minister, Magnus Winter, and an Imperial Chancellor of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Baron von Adelsberg, fall under the horrid spell of a certain Lady Faustine Rosemede, high priestess of the Black Art, who summons the Oriental legions of the devil to work her wicked will. Far down below her London mansion, behind a huge door of iron, is a Celtic temple of Epona more than twenty-five centuries old, with appropriate oratories and altars, candles, and Oriental hangings, Celtic masonry and metal work, et hoc genus omne; while "the very deities, whose hideous shapes loomed gaunt through the blue light, were not altogether Oriental." Below this amazing chapel is a convenient dungeon, in whose "cimmerian depths" the high priestess, with the aid of "a file of dark-faced men in Oriental dress," imprisons the Iron Chancellor, and terrifies him into selling his soul (if he had one) and joining the Legions of Lucifer. Magnus Winter had already been overawed into similar evil bondage. Their ghastly initiation is performed by a band of Druids, chanting the songs of the Sons of Sin, marshalled by the Lady Faustine, "mighty Archdruidess, sixtieth in the line from the great Vertobrix." A no less important person than the devil himself seals the fearsome compact with a kiss from "lips hot as a searing-iron." Von Adelsberg shrieks and faints.

He could hardly do less in "the Hell-House of Keridwen." But he emerges to carry out with Winter the devil's own scheme for a war with Germany, and eventually a mere detachment of 50,000 Germans evades the English fleet, and is landed in Essex. But the horrors of war are prevented by a veritable deus ex machina. Christ appears in London. His advent is prepared for by an awful recurrence of the Great Plague, and by one Paul Fane, a sort of modern John the Baptist; in reality a country gentleman's son, somewhat a prig, who "grew in greatness of soul and strength of body" at Eton and Oxford—disadvantages unknown to his great prototype. But, as Mr. Naybard informs us, "when God raises up a prophet unto Himself He recks not of the class from which he springs." So the voice of one crying in Hyde Park denounces "Catholic and Protestant, Anglican and Nonconformist," priests and ministers alike. We miss the robust courage of the real John Baptist, for Paul loses a grand opportunity in not calling them "a generation of vipers"—though they are all "robbers." However, 50,000 people join "the League of Christ and of His prophet Paul Fane," and sign on in twelve handy books ready for the purpose. Their enthusiasm at Paul's fierce denunciations of Christianity and of the Church of Christ is rewarded by the appearance of Christ Himself at Easton Hall, while a private interview is graciously accorded to Paul at his lodgings. At yet another manifestation a Nonconformist minister's "clay-like face grew red with anger" at the blasphemous imposture. But "the Master held out His hands to this doubting Thomas. They were pierced! The man staggered back. Christ advanced a naked foot. Likewise was it pierced. With an awful shriek of terror the minister sank upon his knees. 'Christ! He is Christ indeed!' he cried." The next appearance is in Essex, when the German soldiers are told by Him to "depart in peace, for war is no more." And they go aboard British ships to the Fatherland. Universal peace for ever being now secured, general reform proceeds apace. Slums and rookeries are demolished. Winter, von Adelsberg, and the German Commander-in-Chief have already perished by awful stroke of the devil. Priests and ministers are abolished—for "the people had Christ's own word they were unnecessary to the existence of a Church, and that He had never given authority for their appointment." And after such pleasing "renascence of Christianity" this glowing prophecy closes with a sort of second Ascension of Christ in Hyde Park on a day in late summer before thousands of upturned eyes.

The Devil in Solution. By WILLIAM CAINE. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

WHEN we say that the "Devil in Solution" is cocoa, that the name of the hero of the book is Lord Mark Mucklethrew, a "Decuple Blue," and that the events of the story turn chiefly on his struggles with the cocoa fiend, the reader of this notice will have a suspicion of the sort of book Mr. Caine has given us. It is a skit of a particularly hilarious and exaggerated kind, a skit on athleticism, the society novel, the upper class, Parliament, and a good many other things. Mr. Caine obtains his effects by a ridiculous exaggeration and a complete overthrow of the probabilities. Lord Mark's rooms in Piccadilly are made to resemble an athletic outfitter's shop; his "pot-luck" supper is a twelve-course affair with a printed menu, and his valet is a disguised advertising agent, who tricks him into signing a testimonial to Ath-cocoa, and makes him swallow a cup of it. The effect is magical, but disastrous. While under the influence of the beverage Lord Mark is irresistible, but once the reaction sets in he is as a clod of earth. At the bump supper after his great sculling match from Greenwich to Westminster (an event upon which the eyes of the whole civilised world are turned and the price of Consols intimately depends) he breaks down in his great speech, and has to escape by the back door from the infuriated audience. In the House of Commons Cricket Match, instead of scoring a couple of centuries in each innings and taking twenty-two wickets for half a dozen runs, he acquires a pair of spectacles and a bowling average of 102·39 per member of the opposing team. In the end he is saved by the aid of his friend Tuft, and retains the love of the Lady Cerise Lapham. Mr. Caine's hard-driven farce is wearisome if any quantity is taken at a time, is something like the "By-the-Way" column of the Globe indefinitely prolonged. But the author certainly has a zest for his task and infinite resource.

In Highland Harbours with Para Handy. By HUGH FOULIS. (W. Blackwood and Sons. 1s. net.)

THESE short sketches originally appeared in the Glasgow News, and are to be considered as occasional journalism of a light and entertaining nature. They treat of the adventures and conversations of the crew of the Vital Spark, a small coaster among the Highland ports, a good deal in the manner of Mr. W. W. Jacobs, the characters showing much of the light-heartedness and easy wit which we enjoy in the writings of that genial author. The adventures are slight matters—an affair with a watch-dog, a few anecdotes of a man who came in for a legacy and wished to spend it quickly, a matter of a hair-lotion testimonial, a discussion of a yacht-race, a visit from a canvasser, and so on. The same four characters appear in all the sketches, and the sum total is a pleasant though not very precise or sober idea of life in a small coaster. Para Handy, the captain, Dougie, the mate, Macphail, the cynical engineer with a taste for novelettes, and Sunny Jim, the cook, are all as real and lifelike as characters may be who flit so swiftly before the reader's eyes. The humour, if not of the very highest form (who looks for that now?), is far from mere facetiousness, and the book leaves a pleasant impression behind it.

The Gift of the Gods. By FLORA ANNIE STEEL. (William Heinemann. 2s. net.)

A BOOK by the author of "On the Face of the Waters" is not to be opened without a sense of pleasurable anticipation. The reader need have no fear that this last will fall beneath his expectations. It is true that the work is slight; but the life and personalities of an Argyle island are worked out with a rare delicacy of touch. The gift of the gods was in reality no gift at all; it was a substitution the full joy of which was not to be realised until long after the exchange had been effected. Without unduly betraying the plot, it may be explained that a weak, thriftless, but heroic, husband loses his life in saving a shipwrecked man, who in the end steps into his dead deliverer's shoes. Until almost the very end of the book one is left in doubt as to the real fate of the first husband, who has passed from sight down the cliff in the course of his work of rescue. Had he reappeared the dramatic interest of the story would of course have been intensified, at the cost of art. But nothing of the kind occurs, and the little work fully maintains the traditions of its author.

POETS AND CRITICS

WHEN a short time ago I came across a book by the Poet Laureate, entitled "The Bridling of Pegasus," I confess that the title alarmed me. I do not want the present century to capture the winged horse. I should be sorry to see poor Pegasus munching gilded oats at a banquet of the Poetry Society, nor do I wish to find his photograph among the grinning actresses in the illustrated papers. But an examination of Mr. Austin's book soon reassured me. He has not bridled Pegasus. He has not even succeeded in harnessing Rosinante, but by a natural error he has hung his bridle on to a spotted wooden steed of great age, that served perhaps to amuse some of our less considerable poets in their infancy. Mr. Austin's criticism is as individual as his poetry, and far more stimulating. I do not think that any poet could read "The Bridling of Pegasus" without being roused to passionate anger. It is as though a village schoolmaster had paid a week-end visit to the foot of Parnassus, and had embodied his miscomprehensions of what he had seen in the form of a series of lectures to his apple-cheeked pupils. Here you have the condescension, the assertive ignorance, the occasional smirking humour. Let the little boys write on their slates Mr. Austin's assertion that Byron is the greatest English poet since Milton, and let them add that Mr. Austin is the most irritating critic since Remus. One of these statements is true.

It is too late in the day to review "The Bridling of Pegasus," but it suggests the fitness of some inquiry into the relationship between poets and critics. It is of course as natural for critics to dislike the work of young and adventurous poets as it is for poets to dislike the writings of aged and sophisticated critics, for critics—of all men who work in words—love to support themselves on those mysterious crutches known as canons of art, which any new poet worthy of the name promptly sends flying with a spurt of his winged foot. This is not to say that canons of art (the artillery of the small bore?) may not have a certain value—for critics; but poets, when they fall to criticising their comrades, are usually content to rely on their individual judgments rather than to appeal to any universal theory of greatness in poetry, and, considered dispassionately, it would be easy to support the view that critics select their canons of art to justify the preferences that they formed when their minds were still receptive and unhardened by the inhuman task of criticism. To take a handful of poets at random it seems impossible to lay down any one theory of poetry that will support the undeniable greatness of Herrick, Burns, Blake, Keats, Browning, Swinburne and Meredith, and it may be noted that the Laureate—who writes as a critic and not as a poet—while treating of poetry from the academic standpoint, does not dare this ultimate adventure. He is content to arrange poetry in classes, and assure us that reflective poetry is greater than lyrical, and that epic poetry is the greatest of all.

Even if we are to accept these dogmatic assertions, I can imagine no sane reader of poetry regulating his preferences by doctrine of this kind. To Mr. Austin the comparative popularity of lyrical poetry is a matter for keen regret. To me—so far does personal prejudice count in these matters—it is a healthy sign, since it suggests that those who read poetry to-day do so for pleasure rather than from a sense of duty. But if for no other reason, I would mistrust Mr. Austin's canons on account of the extraordinary conclusions to which they lead him. Probably most foreigners would agree with Mr. Austin that Byron is the greatest English poet since Milton; but poetry is the one possession that a nation cannot share with its fellows, and the countrymen of Keats and Shelley, of Browning and Swinburne, must perforce keep the enjoyment of their rarer inheritance to themselves.

Nor do his canons help Mr. Austin to fare better on smaller points. Thus when he wrote that "no poet of much account is ever obscure" he had clearly forgotten Browning, Blake, and the Shakespeare of the Sonnets.

The Sonnets are occasionally obscure because in them Shakespeare is expressing very intricate and subtle emotions, quite beyond the range of ordinary lovers. Browning is obscure because his mind was an overcrowded museum in which his thoughts could not turn round without knocking freakish ornaments and exotic images off the shelves. Blake was obscure, as Wordsworth was often inane, through trusting too much to inspiration. Great poetry is not obscure; but the ranks of the great poets supply exceptions to all generalisations.

Again, Mr. Austin finds it strange that two such great poets as Dante and Milton should suffer from a total lack of humour. This opens up a fruitful field of speculation, but probably this deficiency is the rule rather than the exception. Coleridge, Wordsworth, Keats, Shelley, Blake, Tennyson, and Swinburne all lacked it, though some of these poets tried to be funny at times. Browning had a sense of humour, but it may be doubted whether it did his poetry any good. Shakespeare had enough humour for fifty men of letters; but he had everything. Mr. Alfred Austin has not a sense of humour, though he sometimes indulges a cumbrous spirit of gaiety that recalls Mr. Pecksniff in his moments of relaxation.

No, I do not believe in canons of art, save, if you will, of a vague and ineffective character that leave artists free to do what they like. Nevertheless, the school of criticism to which Mr. Austin belongs being powerful these days, I think it would be a goodly task to prepare a list of aphorisms to hang by the bedside of critics of poetry. Mine would be something like this:—

1. A good critic is a man who likes good work, and by dint of his enthusiasm is empowered to perform miracles, teaching the blind to see and the deaf to hear.

2. There are two kinds of poetry, good and bad. Minor poetry is a phrase used by incompetent critics who dare not oppose their judgment to the possible contradiction of posterity.

3. "To artists who can treat them greatly all times and all truths are equal. . . . A poet of the first order raises all subjects to the first rank" (Swinburne).

4. If the poet's intellect gives power and direction to his work, his emotions supply the force that creates it. With most men the emotions become exhausted or sophisticated at a comparatively early age. Hence most poets have done their best work when they were young.

5. The aphorism that poets are born and not made is merely an untruthful expression of the fact that not every one can become a poet by taking pains. It would hardly be excessive to say that the first task of every artist is to create his own genius; it is our misfortune that most artists have neglected to do this.

6. Poets who try to teach in song have derived small benefit from their suffering.

7. We have all endured the man who sings because he must; there is something to be said for the man who sings because he can.

8. The wise critic will always approach poetry on his knees, even though he ends by sitting on it.

9. Bad poetry is not nearly so harmful as bad criticism of poetry.

And so on. . . . It would be possible to fill a number of THE ACADEMY with such things, without saving one critic from the quenchless flames. The only sane method by which to become a good critic of poetry is to love poetry. That is why Professor Saintsbury's "History of English Prosody" seems to me to be a great book. I think he has the most catholic appreciation of poetry that any man, not excluding the poets themselves, can ever have achieved, and he is free from the poet's inevitable prejudices. The first volume may be skimmed over advantageously by any one not specially interested in prosody as a science; but the second and third volumes should be read and re-read by all lovers of English poetry. Such a critic may well reconcile poets to criticism.

And this brings me to the vexed question of the utility of critics. It seems to me clear that critics can be of little service to men of genius or even to artists of real ability, but as middlemen between artists and the general public they are, unhappily, necessary. It is often forgotten how far the reading public to-day is dependent on the critics to tell it how many of the monstrous multitude of new books are worth reading. Poetry is very badly treated by the Press in general because there is no money in it, and the daily newspapers prefer to devote their literary columns to reviews of novels written in batches of six by elderly unmarried ladies between breakfast and lunch. But it must be added that the bulk of the criticism of new poetry that does appear in the periodical Press is surprisingly well done. The only pity is that there is not more of it.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

MUSIC

WE are all industrious nowadays. Idleness, dear, lazy Nymph, has few votaries. It is no longer the mode to have nothing to do. But there are some tasks from which we suppose that even those who are most avid of occupation must shrink. The imagination boggles at the thought of his task who had recently to choose the best nosegay of sweet-peas out of 38,000! It were less shocking, one thinks, to have to fly 1,000 miles in a monoplane. Among the more terrible tasks to which willing men bend their energies, that of selecting music for some eighty consecutive orchestral concerts, surely ranks high in its horror. How did Sir Henry Wood set about making the programmes for his "Promenade Concerts"? Did he get up early on eighty days, and compose one programme before breakfast? This would seem to be the easiest way of accomplishing the task. Yet what appetite for breakfast can he have had after the close mental wrestlings which must be undergone before even one programme that shall satisfy the varied tastes of the Promenaders can be settled? We admire Sir Henry Wood very much when he is conducting a concert with that buoyant freshness which can communicate itself even to the "Symphonie Pathétique," but we are not sure that he is not more amazing when we contemplate him at his desk evolving this tremendous list of music.

It may be said without exaggeration that these "Promenades" are the most important concerts that take place in London during the year. They bring the blessing of music to by far the largest number of persons, and to that class of persons which it is most important to influence for good. The more expensive Symphony Concerts and the Chamber Concerts appeal chiefly to those whose taste is already formed, and most of them are given in the afternoon, when breadwinners have to be at their business. But the "Promenades" are given in the evening, when everybody is free to go, and at a time of year when rival attractions are least numerous. They are very good, very cheap, and, oh! comfort of comforts, you may smoke as you listen. The vast majority of the "Promenade" audience is not highly critical. It is willing to be pleased. There is still something of the Old Adam in its spirit, and it applauds with great heartiness just those items of the programme which made Sir Henry Wood, when he set them down, just a little reluctant and impatient. Of course there is in the audience a substantial leaven of the higher critics, who have attended for the sake of the new work, or the Brandenburg Concerto, or the Debussy. But these do not count overmuch. The problem is to give the average young men and women who "like music" an opportunity to hear what is good and beautiful, so that their taste may be gradually improved. That the directors of these concerts have been working with brilliant success towards the complete solution of this problem is a fact patent to all who have followed the course of music in London during the last twenty-five years. Ten years ago such programmes as are now with confidence put before the public every day at the "Promenades" would not have been possible, and we venture to predict that those programmes which "critics" would consider the best will be those most eagerly enjoyed during the present season.

We are told by the one prophet who remains to us, Mr. Thomas Hardy, that it is a question if the reign of what may be called "orthodox beauty" is not approaching its last quarter. He is speaking, of course, of the beauty of scenery. He says of such places as "Egdon Heath" that they appeal to a subtler and scarcer instinct than that which responds to the sort of beauty which is called charming and fair. An older prophet, Mr. Ruskin, felt the same movement within him long ago, when he vowed that he would sacrifice all the view from Richmond Hill for one block of granite and a clump of lady-fern. There is little reason to doubt that they are right about the trend of taste in scenery. Like Catherine Morland under Henry Tilney's training, we are most of us ready to "voluntarily reject the whole city of Bath as unworthy of a place in a landscape." We note the same movement of taste when we go to the picture-galleries. When Mr. Tilney hears Miss Morland declare that the picture before her is "charming," he corrects her immediately, and teaches her to admire something that, if sombre, is much more "charged with meaning." Music appeals to a wider circle than do scenes or pictures. The modern movement of appreciation, therefore, must be given more time in which to make its influence so marked. But that it is growing, and growing fast, there can be no question. Sir Henry Wood and his colleagues recognise this, and they hardly put forward one programme in which there is not something to satisfy the amateur who desires that which is more than merely pretty and charming and delightful. There exist amateurs who would out-Hardy the poet of Wessex—who would like all their music to be Egdon Heaths, who forget that the pastoral scenes through which Tess and Angel Clare wended their unhappy way were beautiful too. At our "Promenades" we are to have smiling landscapes in abundance, as well as stormy November heaths, and, as we have hinted, keen eyes will discover a few morceaux in the programmes which are there as a solatium to the taste of those who would exclaim with pleasure at the sight of the geranium-decked houseboats on the Thames. But these are to be found chiefly among the songs, and we have no desire to be severe about their presence, though we own we should have rejoiced had the directors seen fit to raise, and raise considerably, the type of song which is allowed at their concerts.

A judicious conservatism seems to mark these programmes in regard to new compositions. The progressive spirit of a few years ago, when novelties were perhaps too numerous, is at present taking a nap. At the same time there is advance shown in this, that a few pieces which have proved wildly popular are not being "done to death." Indeed, we have looked in vain for Tchaikovsky's "1812;" and the "Casse-Noisette" and "Peer Gynt" are not to be played every week. Still, it seems to us that a good many popular pieces (excellent though they are), which have been performed over and over again, might have been given a rest, their place to be taken by less familiar works, which only need to be known to become popular. We remember that when Rosa Timmins was thinking about her little dinner Mrs. Gashleigh, her mamma, proposed a fine rich mock-turtle, stewed pigeons, and gooseberry-cream. "I will not have them, mamma," cried Rosa, and she stamped her foot. Had Sir Henry Wood followed Rosa in this display of firmness when the Mrs. Gashleighs among his advisers advocated certain dishes for the "Promenade" banquet we think none of the audience would have suffered. There are pieces by Saint-Saëns, Ambroise Thomas, Moskowski, Max Bruch, and others, which are as excellent as gooseberry-cream, but there are plenty of sweet things which might have taken their places, about which there would have been a refreshing piquancy.

But if there are not many new compositions to be heard, there are a great many artists whose names are new to us. We hope they will all be successful. They are sure of kind and generous treatment from the cheerful "Promenade" audience. Indeed it might be as well if a caution were given them that they are not to consider themselves Melba and Paderewskis because they received so many "recalls" at the "Promenades." Last year we heard several sensible patrons of these concerts complain that the standard of solo performance was not so high as they could have wished. These amateurs were all agreed that they would have preferred the excellent orchestra without some of the singers and the pianists. But we suppose the time has not come yet for such counsels to bear fruit. The young gentlemen in straw-hats who crowd the "Promenade" find no fault, as we have suggested, with the soloists; and although we ourselves are of the minority which would willingly dispense with the services of second-rate soloists, we shall try and remember that, to a large portion of the audience, they are not second-rate at all, and that we cannot expect everybody to be converted to an acceptance of the finest principles of "taste" as instantaneously as was Miss Catherine Morland.

The concerts begin on the Feast of St. Grouse, and will not come to an end until three weeks after the first pheasant has been shot. We trust that when October 21st has come Sir Henry Wood will not be the worse for his really gigantic labours. In former days he confined himself to conducting the first part of the programme; now, we believe, he conducts it all. But might not a division of labour be wise? Would it not be possible to invite the co-operation of a few of our excellent young conductors and permit them to direct some of the everyday pieces, which they would certainly manage very well? It would be an invaluable experience for them; the audience would not object so long as the chief pieces were under the command of Sir Henry, and that most indefatigable of conductors would find the strain considerably lightened.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

M. LOUIS DUMUR possesses to the highest degree a quality which is generally a special attribute of the Anglo-Saxon race—humour. But he adds to his humour a deep psychological insight. For some years he has devoted his talent particularly to the portrayal of the different strata of Genevan society. Being a Swiss himself, M. Louis Dumur has lived in Calvin's austere city, and has thus been able to study and depict the ways of living and thinking of its inhabitants, over whom, in spite of the passing of centuries, the fear and veneration of the great reformer still looms. And he has painted them with a masterly if often satirical touch.

The subject of M. Dumur's new book, "L'Ecole du Dimanche" ("The Sunday-school") (Mercure de France, 3f. 50c.) is only a means for the author to guide us through a certain section of Genevan society which is as curious as amusing. He evokes before us some partisans of the excessively clerical portion of the inhabitants of Geneva, and draws them so vividly that we imagine we see them live and act. And in truth we have all—or at least all those amongst us who, as children, have frequented a Sunday-school—known the "clever" scholar, Carcaille, the admiration of the fold, the pride of the clergyman, who knows by heart all the texts and contexts, and whose greatest pleasure consists in insisting on complicated explanations. Who has not met also the complacent monitress, Mme. Collignon, who gives an annual fête to the dear children intrusted each dominical morning to her motherly care? As for the description of the fête itself, it is replete with humour; each little detail is noted and commented on in so amusing and so true a way that one feels as if one assisted in reality at that awe-inspiring function.

M. Louis Dumur's two leading characters are Pastor Babel and Gédéon Gubernard—the first a fervent admirer of Calvin's doctrine, the second an impassioned freethinker. The author opposes their contradictory views all through the course of his work, and the deductions he draws are both original and interesting. There are perhaps in "L'Ecole du Dimanche" a few pages which may shock certain persons, but the ardent apology of Protestantism with which the book closes will certainly win for M. Dumur the suffrage of many English readers.

"Sonia" is a delightful authoress; her chronicles, which appeared in the Figaro under the title of "Petits Cahiers d'une Etrangère," are full of a whimsical humour which is delightful. But . . . she remains invisible; no one has ever seen her. Fortunately, however, for the numerous admirers of her talent, she has a very dear friend, M. Emile Berr, the distinguished writer on the Figaro staff, to whom she has intrusted the task of preparing these "papers" for the Press. Some even whisper that "Sonia" and Emile Berr are one and the same person, and perhaps—but hush! we must not divulge secrets! "Sonia's" latest work, entitled "Sonia et ses Amis" (Fasquelle, 3f. 50c.), has just appeared, and will form the most agreeable, as well as the most diverting, of summer reading. Her appreciations on the most varied subjects are jotted down without any particular order, just as they happen to occur to her, in a very feminine way. And her reflections, which combine wit and a fine psychological faculty, betray a rare knowledge of the intricacies and subtleties of the human soul. To give a fairly complete idea of "Sonia et ses Amis" one would have to quote largely from the work. It is sufficient to say that in it she deals with the most heterogeneous subjects—love and morals, pleasure and reason, religion and health—with so much grace and esprit that one successively smiles or considers whilst reading her trite reflections. And, a fact which is not the least charm of the work, "Sonia" is deliciously and femininely facetious, as will be seen by her amusing remark:—

En somme, une noble ambition ne me paraît pas inconcevable avec la joie de penser que le succès que l'on espère ferait enrager quelqu'un.

The character of Voltaire has inspired many authors, but there are few books on the great writer as interesting as the one M. Jules Bertaut has just written for the collection entitled "La Vie Anecdotique et Pittoresque des Grands Ecrivains" (Louis Michaud, 2f. 25c.). M. Bertaut, to whom we owe already a most curious "Victor Hugo," has collected in his "Voltaire" numerous anecdotes, some of which are very little known. He sketches the writer's life, underlining it with many incidents which throw curious sidelights on the mentality of the famous sceptic. M. Bertaut shows us Voltaire's existence as a young man in the great city of Paris, his love of luxury, his innumerable adventures, the anxiety of his father, who sent him to Caen, and later to The Hague, in the hope of curbing the rather too turbulent spirit of his son. With regard to Voltaire's imprisonment in the Bastille, we find the following anecdote which, we think, may interest our readers:—

Sa captivité dura onze mois. Ce ne fut que le 11 Avril, 1718, que Voltaire fut remis en liberté. A sa sortie des amis l'attendaient, dont le Marquis de Nocé, qui l'emmena au Palais-Royal, pour le présenter au Duc d'Orléans. Comme on faisait antichambre, le poète s'impatientait et, entendant le grondeur lointain d'un orage qui menaçait:—

"Quand ce serait un régent qui gouvernerait là haut," s'écria-t-il, "les choses n'iraient pas plus mal!"

Le Marquis de Nocé ne manqua point de rapporter au Régent le mot de l'embaillé d'hier, en le présentant:—

"Voilà, Monseigneur, le jeune Arouet que vous venez de tirer de la Bastille, et que vous allez y renvoyer!"

"Ma foi, non!" répondit l'autre en riant. "Et même je lui alloue une pension!"

"Je remercie votre Altesse Royale," répondit Arouet, "de ce qu'elle veut bien se charger de ma nourriture, mais je la prie de ne plus se charger de mon logement!"

M. Bertaut says also that when Voltaire met Bolingbroke he declared to a friend:—

"J'ai trouvé dans cet illustre Anglais toute l'érudition de son pays. Je n'ai jamais entendu parler notre langue avec plus d'énergie et de justesse."

In fact we see later that when Voltaire crossed the Channel he was just as enthusiastic over England in general as over Bolingbroke as an individual of that nation. And it is worth observing that M. Bertaut considers Voltaire's sojourn in England the key to the development of his genius:—

Au reste le voyage de Voltaire en Angleterre . . . fut la plus belle de ses opérations intellectuelles, puisque d'un seul coup elle renouvelait toutes ses connaissances et toutes ses idées. La vue de la civilisation anglaise fut en quelque manière un coup de foudre dans l'existence de Voltaire. La contemplation d'une société vivant et prospérant sur des bases si complètement différentes de la civilisation française modifia en quelques mois tous les principes et toutes les pensées de l'auteur d'Oedipe.

Voltaire's relations with Frederick the Great have afforded his biographer the occasion of writing a most amusing chapter, showing how by incessant intrigue Voltaire managed to win the friendship of the King of Prussia, with whom he had had previously a long correspondence. We see the development and ending of that friendship, which between two so pronounced characters as Voltaire and Frederick II. could not but terminate badly. M. Bertaut's book will be read with the greatest interest by those who have a taste for caustic anecdotes. He has contrived to collect in two hundred short pages the quintessence of the life of one of the most extraordinary characters that has ever existed—François Arouet de Voltaire.

MARC LOGÉ.

THE YOUNG TURK AS LEGISLATOR

IN dealing with the above subject from the standpoint of personal observation one is tempted to adopt the brevity displayed in an encyclopædia of Ireland under the heading of "Snakes in Ireland." "There are no snakes in Ireland." While it would be going too far too assert that numerically there are no legislators in Turkey, it must be reluctantly admitted that for all practical purposes they rank with the snakes of the Emerald Isle. The Turk proper has never been a legislator, and whatever importance may have been attached to the wisdom of the Cadi in the past, his successor to-day in the Chamber of Deputies or at the Sublime Porte most effectually conceals any inherited virtue in the art of Government.

Doubtless many centuries of arbitrament at the point of the sword, and of almost incredible repression at the hands of the Sultans, do not tend to the creation of leaders imbued with a high sense of constitutional governing powers. Time alone will show whether upon a people so nurtured can be grafted the usages of responsible government. In that legislative chamber on the Bosphorus are mixed, but not blended, the desires and ambitions of the Turk, the Arab, the Greek, the Jew, the Armenian, and the Slav, to mention only the more obvious warring elements. Given a heaven-born gift of the management of men and affairs, the proposition even then would be a tough one. Put in its place an utter absence of the sense of responsibility, a want of tolerance, of sympathy, and of experience, coupled with the possession of Turkish ignorance, pride, and conceit, and the result may be imagined.

The Turk considers himself lord of all; the Arab despises the Turk; the Greek, groaning under a severe trade boycott, hates both; the Jew and the Armenian make money out of all parties, but are liable to periodical massacre; the Bulgar in Turkish dominions wants his own independence—as also do the Albanians and Macedonians. A strong man, a very strong man, is wanted here.

Mahmoud Shevket, the Kitchener of Turkey, is a good soldier and an honest man, but no more; nor does the horizon contain a man who is likely to cope with the situation. The Patriots, who stage-managed that wonderful revolution, have, with few exceptions, been relegated to the background. Their place has been taken by a Camarilla, known—save the mark!—as the Committee of Union and Progress, which has constituted itself the power behind the Throne. Every Minister and important official holds his office at the will of this body, which directs, or tries to direct, the policy of the Empire. Its membership contains numerous cliques who fight among themselves for place or domination. The vote decides the appointment, but does not remove the intrigue against the successful one. Thus it happens that the Committee seldom speak with one voice; its leader has no settled policy. We must go with the strongest current, so that Ministers appointed by this wavering body have no clear policy laid down for them, and their traditional sense of irresponsibility, the fruit of their late Sultan's despotism, is accentuated by the precarious tenure of their office.

Hence the most ordinary business becomes almost impossible. The head of a State Department hesitates to act on his own initiative. He must consult his many counsellors, in most cases his many masters, to whom he owes his position. Their conflicting advice does not mend matters, with the result that nothing is done. Ambition is not wanting, and with the help of foreign experts great schemes are elaborated; railways, roads, shipping, irrigation, all claim the attention of the Minister of Public Works. Tenders are invited and accepted; millions are asked for, and in some cases, after interminable wrangles, voted, and then nothing more is done. Months of valuable time are wasted by capitalists and contractors, friction and much bitter feeling is engendered between the representatives of friendly nations, as the result of the Turkish diplomacy of playing one off against the other. The people of the country, whose hopes of much-needed communication have been raised, relapse into despair and call upon the name of Abdul Hamid, who at least did get the things he wanted done.

The commercial world of France and England will not soon forget the evil procrastination and evidences of bad faith on the part of the Ottoman Government in connection with certain contracts and financial operations. The recent resignation of Sir William Wilcocks points to the abandonment of the muddle of the Mesopotamian irrigation scheme. Upon one thing alone is there a fair show of unanimity—the country's defence! Millions are poured out upon the Army and a Navy of doubtful efficiency. A dependence upon cruisers no longer in their first youth, palmed off upon a more or less confiding Minister of Marine by the astute Tenton at prices almost equal to new, is not likely to add to the happiness and sense of security of the Young Turk or of the capable British Admiral, his naval adviser. Two gallant admirals have failed to make headway; a third is still struggling with an inefficient personnel and material, not to mention a superfluity of masters. The Army, under the tuition of Field-Marshal von der Goltz, has made greater strides, and its progress adds to the already overweening Chauvinism of the Ministry.

Unable to keep her own house in order, as evidenced by the uprisings in Albania and Arabia and the unrest in Macedonia, Turkey nevertheless persists in trailing her coat in front of Greece and Bulgaria. All these troubles add, of course, to the difficulties of legislation, at no time easy to carry into effect. In its comparatively short life the Chamber of Deputies has been the scene of many a stormy sitting, leading at times to personal violence. Even the more dignified Senate is capable of scenes which, in these stirring times in our midst, would cause a shiver to run down the backs of the habitués of our own gilded chamber. Nor are the Government's relationships with the Press any too happy. Intolerant of criticism, the suspension of a newspaper is quite a common affair. True, very often the journal rises again Phoenix-like from its ashes, under a new name, only once again to be suppressed. Not content with putting down the paper, political animosity goes so far as to suppress the editor. As a result several lamentable assassinations of prominent men in the journalistic world have to be recorded.

In many cases the legislative palm still itches, and, in spite of official condemnation, continues to be greased, but circumspectly and in a roundabout fashion. The old order of things, where backsheesh was taken as a matter of course, is no longer tolerated. Now there are too many eyes on the alert, whose owners are prone to denounce if they may not share in the plunder. The Council of Ministers, or Executive, with the Grand Vizier at the head, is a Committee of Union and Progress in miniature, with the same intrigues, dissensions, and wirepullings of the larger body. Apart from the formal opening of Parliament, the Sultan takes no part in legislation. He signs iradés on the request of his Grand Vizier, and has no initiative, truly a contrast to his autocratic predecessor.

Here then we find all the forms of a constitutional Government, a naturally rich country hardly at all developed, a hardworking, and, on the whole, if let alone, an amiable people, but wretchedly administered. Credited with full powers, what wonders could not a Cromer evolve in ten years! One has only to look at the wonderful results of English administration at the Customs to realise the benefits of a good system efficiently carried out. But it is hopeless to expect these proud and wayward leaders to consent of their own accord to a friendly foreign domination. It may be, if events in the Balkans end in a general conflagration, they may find a triple foreign control forced upon them. It would be a thousand pities if, after throwing off the yoke of Abdul Hamid in such a gallant manner, the Young Turk finds himself unable to handle the reins of Government in such a way as to command the respect of his people and his European neighbours.

ON READING IN BED

NOT that the subject is new; in this case novelty lends not the slightest vestige of excuse to the ever voluble pen. If it need apology let that apology be rather the very universality and hoary antiquity of the subject. Amidst all that is distinctively and blatantly twentieth century, this mellow tradition lingers tranquilly with us. We have no need to debate it, or to school ourselves to it with pains; it is assumed as naturally and irrationally as our dog's circumambulation before curling himself up for a doze. It is so ancient as to be prehistoric; so universal as to be without recorded initiation. We are unable to deck with bays the honoured tomb of our prime precursor. We may only hail him impersonally as one of those Titans who laid the foundations of the world. But for such a purpose as this fancy will serve us as well as history, and a short flight will link us up with Antiquus Lector in his airy villa at Baiae, as he lies couched with his favourite Flaccus, or even with some now mummified kinsman of the Ptolemies, scanning his hieroglyphs to the accompaniment of the immemorial lapping of the Nile.

To hark back to the word, "irrational" is the best expression of its quality. All pretended "reasons" and "causes" for the happy indulgence are mere wills-o'-the-wisp. Nor is there any reason why one should feel arraigned to give a reason, save the fondly-nourished sense of naughtiness that, after our human fashion, seasons the enjoyment. With some of us this may have its origin in dim memories of youthful nights when at least one sense had to be spared from the enthralling volume, to give warning of the parental step on the stair, whereupon a hasty snuffing of the tell-tale candle and a varyingly successful simulation of sleep. For we had strange theories of sleep then, as, for example, that the breath must be painfully suspended, and a kind of rigor mortis maintained—quite sufficient, poor innocents, to annihilate our careful deception without the diminished evidence of that tell-tale candle. Or, perhaps, if our youth were stainless, simply the sweetness of stealing an hour from sleep's domain, faithfully promised by our retirement between sheets, marks us guilty in the eye of Nature. But let it be; to invoke the moral law on this score will but burden our already heavy delinquencies, and will reform us not a whit.

Now there be that prescribe for us with pains and mistaken solicitude what our pabulum shall be: as that light and wholesome fiction is a good preparatory to the slumber of innocence; or that the systematic re-perusal of old favourites leaves a pleasant, peaceful glow in the somnolescent mind; or, again, that books of devotion titillate the conscience and induce the sleep of the just. But to define limits is destructive of the flavour, and to systematise is anomaly. Let your bedroom shelf be well stocked, and by way of selection, pick your tomes haphazard—or even blindfold—from your library. Having thus recruited your service, rest content. Never debate beforehand the night's election, but retire sedately at your accustomed hour, fostering the idea that your day is spent and that you have dismissed all the "weariness of books" from your mind. A little spice of the supercilious is no demerit. With a clear, childlike mind array yourself for the pillow. Then suddenly, as though seized by a novel impulse, take your candle to the chosen ranks and study the titles lingeringly. As soon as one of them hits your fancy take the book down. He is the lect. With him seek now your couch, and lazily turn his pages until your "frail eyelids" withdraw you from his spell. And on the next night repeat the process. Do not let the previous acquaintance mortgage the delightful uncertainty. The mood must be supreme arbiter; and the mood is errant. Thus one night we have trifled deliciously with Mr. Henry James; the next found new joy in Boswell; another night has delivered us over to "Eothen;" while the following has seen us dozing with Mr. W. W. Jacobs. Of all hours this must be the most catholic and the most erratic.

Concerning the sordid details, such as the perfect recumbent position and the quality and disposition of the candle—matters on which some delight to dogmatise—we have no word to offer. "The play's the thing;" these other little conditions will adjust themselves and may even vary with the event. "The Golden Bowl" will scarcely adumbrate the same posture as, say, Wordsworth's "Excursion;" nor can Spinoza be so easily taken lying down as "The Upton Letters." So long as, that delicious moment arrived when the printed words arouse grotesquely foreign fancies, you may blow out the candle with the minimum of effort, we scarcely see that it matters.

All this, of course, has to do purely with reading in bed as a habitual nocturnal pastime. As a solace in sickness and a judicious encouragement of incipient convalescence some other words might be added to its praise. But here again fancy and inclination must be allowed untrammelled arbitrament. Never be beguiled by well-meaning sympathisers, bulging with the lachrymose literature of sick-bed consolation. Suffer your mood gladly to outrage the proprieties of the case. And the sick mood will be nothing if not irregular. Some earliest recollections of Dickens's "Christmas Books" are connected with a juvenile midsummer malady. It was from the cramping embrace of la grippe that we sallied forth to the discovery of Uncle Toby—an unappreciated stranger to us in more robustious days; and on another similar occasion we inhaled the invigorating ozone of imagination tramping in breezy company along "The Path to Rome." Yet another redemptive sick-bed memory is supplied by no other than Ibsen's "Brand;" while not one, but many such, linger gratefully about the "Morte D'Arthur," dear companion of many moods and circumstances.

It remains to be observed that some there be who lay up their treasure overnight, and, waking betimes, drag out their choice in the cold, disillusionising light of dawn, suffering the desecration of their peace by premonitions of "getting up," and the resurgent trivialities of the coming day. But these are not of the true fold, and bare mention is all they deserve.

WHERE AMERICA RULES

"The fool inherits, but the wise man must get." Thus it has gone down through the ages, an unwritten law of progress—and possession. Authority is of the wise and foolish. The ignorant bow before the blusterer; albeit there is an instinct about mankind, as in the lower animal kingdom, that will inevitably force them to recognise their master. To rule well one must always be master; and to govern others man must first learn to govern himself. When dealing with those of unequal advantages, in birth, education, and the handicap of race, we see these traits more prominently brought into play. It is a grand opportunity; but the difficulties are correspondingly immense.

There is a mistake in the use of the slack rein, just as much as in the over-tight one. It is always a mistake to allow a good horse its head beyond control. It is also a mistake—I admit it—to attempt to judge the actions of any other power in authority without comprehensive knowledge. We may not judge, but we may observe and deduce; and since I have been in Manila I have been “looking on.” I have learned that there is a mistaken kindness in that slack rein, in that familiarity that will so often engender contempt. I am sorry to have to say these things, for, let me confess at once, my sympathies are a good deal for the slack rein. But it does not answer.

It is a mistake to attempt to treat the brown man as a white. It is more—it is an impossibility that will lead to trouble. The Americans—a good number of them—are facing this truth just at present. They know, the wise men among them, that they began by making a mistake in the Philippines; they would offer the hand of good fellowship and equality to their little “brown brother.” And what is the result? He has been trying to dig his claws into it ever since. Just at present there is much feeling against the American Government in Manila; there is no gainsaying it. An attempt was made to boycott the carnival; literature of a seditious character, stirring up the Filipinos to revolt, has been published in Hong Kong; offer of charitable help on the part of the Government has been refused, or practically so.

These things may happen all the world over where the white man has possessions and the native dwells on equal terms with him; but in no place does the native share equally with his white brother as in Manila. And we cannot hide from ourselves that the result is lamentable. The natives on these islands have little respect for the Americans. Americans do not pretend otherwise themselves. It is common talk on the Luneta, in the hotels and clubs, on the Plaza. Two American women sitting next to me on a public seat were discussing the present political situation here.

“I can’t think how it is,” said one woman to the other, “but they don’t like us; they never have. Oh, the English are different. The Filipinos respect the English, even the Spanish, and they didn’t do anything like what we have done for them.”

In this instance it is all the more remarkable as the colour question is so strong in America. The severest measures are meted out to the negroes in the States; lynching is not too bad for some offences; while here, in their territory, across the seas, the native will meet with a consideration and leniency often refused his white brother and America’s own citizens!

We have noticed the use of this slack rein in other things. It is strange that a people so energetic in many matters, so full of commercial activity, fire, and enthusiasm, should err—as they appear to do—in matters of discipline, order, and military etiquette. One would credit them with a keener eye, a sterner rule. But so it is. Watch a parade of American “soldiers” file past, mark their carriage, the uneven march, the lack of grooming in their horses, the unpolished bits and horse chains, their own uniforms, ill-cut, soiled, and dusty. Now see the native regiment—its smart appearance, its perfect line and alert response to the order of the officer. What a difference!

Do these things matter? I do not know; but order and discipline must stand for something. The lack of these things is somehow like a bad mark for an untidy copybook exercise. They may be just as good fighters, just as determined in their duty and their devotion; but—Well, a soldier is a servant. He has to respect those in authority over him, look up to some one or something. And the question is, How far can this rule apply to the average Americans? And if they do not do it themselves how can they, in their turn, expect to receive such respect, devotion, and consideration from others?

An incident occurs to me that will give a good idea of this difference between European and American military discipline. Passing a sentry-box one day, my attention was called to the sentry on duty. The man was sitting back in his chair, leaning against the walls of the box, his feet on the railings in front, his gun resting on the ground some seven or eight feet away. In the meantime he was carrying on an apparently lively conversation with other members of the guard, undoubtedly making “light of his duty.” And his gun, it has been remarked, just within reach of an enterprising passer-by!

The officials here are the cause of much speculation to me; the American policeman, in particular, is hard to recognise. Officers and men, policemen, postmen, and other deputies of the Government wear little to distinguish them one from the other, and fraternise almost equally. I am told that policemen carry a police badge on their chest, that officers of the American Army wear bands on their arms. In the distance they all look much alike, and in the case of a street skirmish, an argument, or the desire for information, I long inexpressibly for the indubitable and ever-ready friend of our own little Island—the indispensable Man in Blue.

“Jack is as good as his master.” The American Tommy sits down to a drink and cigar with his superior officer. It is just the same in civil life. American women will tell you that servants are very difficult to get in Manila. The truth is that the natives do not like working for American mistresses. They do not work for them as well, for example, as they would for the English lady or the Spanish señora. Yet the American woman will probably give them more privileges; she will treat them perhaps more easily. And they will promptly take advantage of her liberality and familiarity; they will laugh at her behind her back. It is a difficult thing to treat one who serves you as an equal and yet maintain one’s dignity; yet dignity must be preserved at any cost. Therefore, we see that the Americans are attempting an almost impossible feat, and in consequence they lose their position.

Home life in Manila would appear to be a negligible quantity. The Spanish do not understand the term as it appeals to us, the Americans are no less careless of its charm—careless, we would say, if not unmindful of all that simple word may convey. The English folk out here have lost interest. Manila is so different from England; the conditions of life are different and the domestic difficulties so great; besides, they cannot regard this, they will plead, as their home really. So the little comforts, the trifles that go for extra beauty, the individual touches—all those unnecessary, superfluous things—are missing.

In some ways we cannot blame them; yet it seems a pity. As for the native servants, upon their shoulders is cast the burden of much blame. Granted that the ordinary Filipino may be an untrustworthy occupant of the house, ungrateful and unreliable, here to-day and gone to-morrow—there are other “boys” to be had, from other islands, whom with care and patience one can train into quite excellent workers. I am not convinced of the utter worthlessness of the Filipino “boys” yet. I think they have been spoilt; but I think they also possess many good traits.

In speaking of the home-life here it might be as well to mention that front-doors—if there are any!—are usually flung open in all Spanish houses, and that the visitor is received on the verandahs. When paying an ordinary call, one seldom enters a living-room—an omission that is strange to the English traveller. As these visits usually take place between the hours of five and eight, afternoon tea is not usually offered; sweets, soft drinks, and others of stronger nature, are passed round instead. No one ever thinks of going out unless obliged between the hours of two and five in the afternoon when the heat is most intense, but with sunset the atmosphere cools and the climate becomes quite fresh and enjoyable.

In a previous paper I have mentioned the deplorable state of the native huts, or nipa shacks; also the steps taken by the American Government to clear these away, substituting others of more sanitary conditions in their place. They are making improvements everywhere; no opportunity for bettering the Islands or their inhabitants is allowed to escape. At Tondo the other day, one of the poorest districts of this city, 1,500 shacks were burnt down in an hour and five minutes, which gives some idea of the inflammability of these dwellings. Fortunately only one life was lost, but almost the entire district was wiped out, and only the sudden veering of the wind saved a hospital-building in close proximity. The Americans are now giving orders for these huts to be rebuilt on more sanitary and fireproof conditions; thus out of evil will good be wrought.

For like actions, for their cheery optimism and never-failing good humour, we admire the Americans. It has been prophesied that they will make of Manila a "garden spot of the Far East and one of the great commercial and civil centres of the world . . ." That it is "a city in the chrysalis, where the lusty Americanism is only beginning to take hold." But, like Los Angeles, it is going to grow and become unquestionably the great "city of the Far East. . . ."

To the young and enthusiastic all things are possible; it is worth while trying. But if America would learn from her mistakes, if she would take advantage of those great opportunities lying ahead of her, let her tighten her hold on the curb. Let her beware of the slack rein.

SYDNEY M. ENGLISH.

A TRIPTYCH OF GENOA

BY WILFRID THORLEY

I.

THERE are no gulls at Genoa, and there is no tide. The flotsam lies so thick along the docks that you might rake it in steadily like a haymaker. The Italian is not one for cleaning up after him, and frees himself of unnecessary débris by simply dropping it. So the scum thickens daily—bad fruit, broken flasks, rent linen, battered boxes, barrel-hoops, empty eggshells, and the rind of gourds floating idly in vast clots of glittering oil on the green water.

Elephantine cranes hook up half-ton barrels like month-old babies, and drop them gently into the holds. On the passenger liners their work is mainly done by the windlass and a steam-hoist that rattles furiously, and grates on all the nerves, like a rake passing over loose pebble-stones.

People pass incessantly up and down the gangways between boat and quay. Yellow and white ventilators spring from the deck like gigantic fungi, and mysterious vents vomit discoloured water from the ship's bowels.

It is with a sense of relief that the wandering eye alights on the leafless forest-tops of the sailing vessels like tangled harps made for the fingering of delicate Ariels. There is something about them more evidently in harmony with the winds they seek to waylay or elude. The wave-threshing of the steamer is a hidden thing but feebly hinted in the spinning eddy that trails after her; but these slender spars were clearly made for a foil or caress to the intangible waves of air. The skeins of their cordage print the vacant sky into a symmetry of strange angles and rhomboids in which the oval pulleys hang like netted birds; and the light ribbons at their mast-heads float out horizontally in the steady breeze like weeds in running water.

They are mainly coasting vessels comprising Savona, Spezia, and Leghorn in their rounds; some few even touch Naples and Palermo to eastward, and others go as far to the west as Barcelona. These are the pretty feminine-looking creatures that rock coquettishly among the frolic billows that seem to be playing an endless game of cross-tick with the dock for den. But many of the taller ones bear coal all the way from Cardiff or Shields, and their decks are powdered with coal-dust that glitters like hoar-frost in the blazing sun.

The sailing vessels have an air of domesticity which the steam liners lack. They rejoice in a continual washing-day, and hang all their banners out in the shape of shrunk jerseys and frayed pantaloons. There is generally a comfortable whiff of cooking in the air, and the officer commanding the larder sits on deck contentedly peeling potatoes like the boy in a certain infamous parody. Chanticleer crows blithely from his hidden pen, and a watch-dog dozes peacefully on the mat before the door of the captain's cabin; ease and security seem to breathe through every rib of their timbers; and the stout cables that tether them to the quays seem to be unnecessary bridles to such well-broken fillies.

Early nomenclators had good eyes and saw clearly the sail's likeness to a harnessed steed. Hence the terms "jib" and "spanker." But if sails are horses, they are surely mettlesome winged ones for ever chafing at the bridle and flapping vainly their tethered vans; there is pomp in their unfurling—the very act is a challenge to the elements.

To see them in a fit setting you must ascend one of the steep "salitas" that lead ladder-like to an unknown horizon, and finally bring you out on to the Mura di St. Erasmo, with its rhythmic panorama of billowy hills stretching away beyond the dry river-bed to Porto Fino looming hazily out of the blue water. You must go, sweating freely, on one of those hot mornings when the mists hang over the sea like gossamers, and the light winds ruffle its surface like watered silk. Your way will be cheered by the music of the pack-mules in the narrow alleys and the gambolling of green lizards up the walls; while, once on the level, a myriad grasshoppers will leap from under your tread like spurting water. There, too, you will find many a homely favourite among the wild flowers—corn-cockle, viper's bugloss, clover, and the traveller's joy. Five more sweltering minutes skirting the long barricade that ridges the slope, and you are among the scarred hills, with the old castle rooted fast on the farther summit like a giant barnacle left high and dry. The grass-blades are studded with millions of baby snail-shells that look like pearl-barley and crunch under your feet; and tufts of dwarf sea-holly still claim these arid slopes as lost fiefs of the sea.

Below lies the harbour like a faded map on a vast blue sheet. The slim masts stand like threaded needles set the wrong end up to spear the mist-veils that go drifting by. Feeble and ineffectual they look; rather as though their cobwebbed spars were delicate looms for the spinning of these morning gossamers. But let a single barque move out with all sail set and curtsy bravely to the wind like a courtly duellist, and you will see how much more beautiful she is than one of those dark-hulled liners that burrow a roaring pathway through the still water, and which, for all their power, are helpless slaves at the bidding of man. For the sailing-vessel asserts herself finely; holds secret communion with the sprites of air, and follows her own whims with an air of disdain. No blatant hooting of syrens for her, nor trailing of black smoke against the sky. She goes on her way with a suave and noiseless decorum, bidding no man stare:—

The stately ships go by
To their haven under the hill.

It is right; no other adjective is possible.

II.

You might spend many days in the half-light of these narrow alleys, among the hum and bustle of petty trading, and never suspect the tropic splendour of the outer light. The air is stifling. Hundreds of scavengers are at work daily clearing up the filth and litter, and the odour of sprinkled quicklime struggles against the fouler stench. There are marble porticoes bearing sculptured panels with horned skulls of slaughtered beasts, corselets, helmets, and all those things that bear witness to "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war." Hoarse women line the courts with baskets of peaches or silver fishes, chanting a loud antiphonal chorus in praise of their fare, which concludes with a slurred and falling note like Gregorian psalmody. Unspeakably dirty children play "five-stones" and wrangle vehemently on doorsteps; and a hot greed of life seems to assert itself at every turn. Monkeys and parakeets chatter together from the bird-stores; revolving fans whisk away rapacious flies in the pastry-shops; and sailors of all nations are ranting and roaring in the dim canteens, where the dark wine of Asti is slipping down their dusty throats. A legless man with a most demoniacal countenance pleads for your charity in the name of Christ, and curses you hotly on refusal. He is drawn in a tiny carriage by a pair of large dogs, and takes up his station under one of the many corner shrines to the Madonna, who gazes heavenward rapt in a most sensual languor and escorted by fluttering amorini. Newspaper and book stalls herald a victory for Italian automobilism, or the arrest of a Minister for fraud. Merry postcards of gay ladies disrobing lure the dawdling eye, and innocent little tracts offer to teach you all the mysteries of love for twopence only. A scavenger, whipping away a famished cat from a heap of garbage with his broom, shovels it into his bin and passes on. Strung banners of damp clothing festoon the way overhead, and the opened doorway of a church sends out a puff of sweet incense. A hawker stands by proffering candles for the devout, and a glaring anti-clerical poster on an opposite wall announces sensational disclosures of monkish vice in a popular weekly. The little love-birds flutter ceaselessly to and fro in their cages; the parrots screech and the pigeons coo as in the green forest. It is all one to them.

A black-haired sailor saunters up to the hawker and eyes his wares critically. His bare, brown arms are tattooed with cryptic symbols, and his torso veiled only in a network singlet. He takes up a trinket and tosses it down with a deprecatory gesture. The hawker is voluble, and his hands begin to work on either side of his tray like an equilibrist manœuvring with his balancing-pole. The customer's dark brows arch and fall as he makes a lower bid and turns to go. The pedlar is shrewd, bides by his price, and the man returns. Again he eyes the gauds—crucifixes, rosaries, and a loose heap of silver filigree ware framed about with votive candles. The sparkle of the trinkets snares his eyes. But to be routed into bargaining is the bitterest of all defeats to him and his kind.

What follows is a species of hypnotism.

He approaches the pedlar with arms as busy as mill-sails, voluble and tragic. The hawker smiles sardonically; shrugs his shoulders, and slides an inch or two backwards.

An instant more the sailor wavers. Is he balancing mundane against immortal gain? He yields, takes up a glittering silver heart tipped with mimic flame; enters the church with his offering; and murmurs a "Salve Regina" before the dusky shrine of our Lady of the Sea.

THE MAGAZINES

MANY of us have been struck at one time or another by the somewhat remarkable system of symbols to be found serving as a sort of skeleton to the divine zest of Shelley's poetry. The majority of these have been worked out by W. B. Yeats in an illuminating essay; but in the current number of The Quest there is an article by Professor Sieper, of the University of Munich, that deals with the "Ophite-Gnostic Influences in Shelley," in which some of these symbols are traced back to an identical use of them in that strange Oriental sect. Professor Sieper quotes a passage in exposition of this sect from the Leonardo da Vinci of Mereschowski (so he spells it; why cannot a uniform system of transliteration for the Russian be agreed upon by scholars?), and then proceeds to examine such works as "Laon and Cythna" (as "The Revolt of Islam" was first conceived), and "The Assassins," finding some very remarkable correspondences in them. It is noticeable that both these works belong to Shelley's earlier years, and it is evident that Shelley shook off the influences of an artificial system of symbolism in his later work. Nevertheless, none who have examined with any care such a poem as "Prometheus Unbound" can fail to see the traces of some similar system even there. Other articles in an exceptionally good number are "Some Phases of Religious Art in Eastern Asia," by Laurence Binyon, which deals comprehensively rather than critically with the subject; "Dante and the Renaissance," by Dr. Kampers, in which learning and illumination contend for mastery; and "Paganism—Greek and Irish," by Standish O'Grady. There is a fine opportunity to trace the ancient connection between Irish Paganism and the Greeks; but Mr. O'Grady has turned his subject aside to didactic purposes: necessary, yet scarcely wise. One is apt continually to lament the lack of such poetry in our magazines as haunts the imagination and memory, and, therefore, attention must be drawn to a poem entitled "Call me not Back" in this number. Moreover it is signed by a name that has lately been much before public attention—Mr. Edmond Holmes.

In the Quarterly Review there are several very admirable contributions. Since Mr. Arthur Symonds first began the signing of articles there have been few articles that have not been traceable to their authors in this review; and this has been more particularly the case with literary matter. Therefore it is somewhat surprising to see an article on "English Prosody" make its first appearance without a name to foot it. There are not many writers on this subject; and the suggestion is therefore given that the writer is one of those, such as Mr. Bridges or Mr. Omond, whom Professor Saintsbury treated with some unfairness in his monumental work on the subject. For, although the works of these gentlemen head the article, the review is mainly occupied with the "History of English Prosody, from the twelfth century to the present day." It is notable and complete. Its author does not fail to notice Professor Saintsbury's perpetual, if unintentional, unfairness in his handling of the views of his opponents in the prosodical field. Mr. H. A. L. Fisher has an article on "Lord Acton's Historical Work" that lacks nothing of its author's completeness of knowledge and perspicuity of insight. The manner of writing reviews to which the Quarterly still adheres has faults not less apparent in the result than in the logic of the conception; but in the review at present under notice the method is obviously marked out for triumph. In fact there is no other way in which the same result could be achieved; though the introduction of M. Aulard's monumental work on the French Revolution is rather apt to spoil the symmetry of the idea. Mr. Charles Tennyson writes on "Irish Plays and Playwrights," but fails to do necessary justice to certain aspects of the beginning of the Irish Theatre movement. It is to be imagined that he is indebted for his information on the subject to those who constitute what may be called the second layer of the inspiration rather than to those who first gave it its breath of life. Yet, from the outside, and from scarcely critical enough a standpoint, his article certainly covers a wide field.

One of the chief features in the Dublin Review is an article by Hilaire Belloc entitled "On a Method of Writing History." Mr. Belloc has a manner of confining his paragraphs to single sentences, which is apt to destroy a continuity of thought, and convey the impression of journalistic enterprise, instead of the weightier effect we should imagine he would esteem as more desirable in such an article as the present. This remark is not only a statement: it is a criticism of his article. His appeal for a new method of writing history (which is not new, seeing that it was the one chiefly employed by Carlyle) is comprised in this: that history should no more be merely a matter for learning and erudition, but should also imply that power of imagination and gift of description that should make the period chosen vivid and vital—re-created, that is to say—to the general reader. The idea has been in the air for some time, and it will be interesting to see how Mr. Belloc will employ it in the new history on which we believe he is shortly to be engaged. Another article of interest is that by Dr. Barry on "Catholicism and the Spirit of the East."

An essay of considerable interest in the Nineteenth Century is entitled "Readers a Hundred Years Ago," by the genial Dr. Hagberg Wright. Its title gives its scope. To be true, it is very largely concerned with writers a hundred years ago as well as readers, but that in no way diminishes its interest. One is always—and rightly—distressed to notice a writer enunciate an appeal for war, and support it with unction. But when a general in the Army, such as Sir Reginald Hart, writes "A Vindication of War," and heads it with texts from the Bible, then surely there is occasion to deplore a certain lack of right feeling. We are far from disagreeing with some of Sir Reginald's conclusions, and when he says that "The Bible does not say that war is the root of all evil, but that money is," we are apt to agree with that remark without admitting that it commits us to the further conclusion that the Bible advocates war. Moreover, as Ruskin pointed out, war may be supremely healthy, and peace supremely unhealthy. All this may be so. But it is surely quite another matter when a professional soldier pleads a religion that proclaimed peace on earth and goodwill toward men as the authority for his calling. It is at best indiscreet and at worst in doubtful taste. General Baden-Powell has an excellent article in the same magazine on the "Educational Possibilities of the Boy Scouts' Training." In Blackwood's T. F. Farman deals with the propaganda for Proportional Representation that has lately been inaugurated with considerable zest in France in an article he calls "The R.P. in France." It makes instructive and interesting reading. An exceedingly well-informed article on the present situation in Morocco appears in the same magazine under the title of "Morocco in Liquidation" over the pseudonym of "Kepi." In Mind for this quarter there are some admirable contributions. It may always be relied on for matter of substantial interest, but what may provide interest for the philosophical student may not always serve the same end for the ordinary reader. That is not the case in the present number. The usual four leading essays are, for example, one by Mr. Bradley on "On Some Aspects of Truth." As the controversialist with the late Professor James, and, in view of that philosopher's late book, this article proclaims beforehand the interest its reading confirms. "Professor Bergson on Time and Free-will," by M. Balsillie, is again just such another essay. The two others have not what may be called topical appeal, but they do not fail of interest for that reason. They are "Reality as a System of Functions," by Gerald Castor, and "The Meaning of Human Freedom," by G. C. Field.

Among the lighter magazines, the Midsummer number of the Century is a full cornucopia indeed. Probably the most interesting paper is the "Recollections of Millet" by Charles Jacque. In the Windsor Rudyard Kipling makes his first appearance after a lengthy silence. It is good to see his name again, but we should have liked to see it over a less reminiscent story. A good number, too, is Harper's. An article by Richard Le Gallienne on "Legendary Ladies of the Poets" suffers only from being too short; and Professor Robert Kennedy Duncan's name is a guarantee of excellence that his article on "The Prizes of Chemistry" more than well substantiates.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

[Our contributor who deals with Foreign affairs, Mr. Lancelot Lawton, leaves England this week for Russia. He will from time to time send articles from St. Petersburg and other centres which, we think, will prove of considerable interest to our readers.]

THE BERLIN CONVERSATIONS

THE Moroccan situation remains practically as it was at the end of last week. An official announcement was then made by the German Foreign Office to the effect that in the conversations between M. Cambon and Herr von Kiderlen Waechter there had taken place an approximation of views as to the basic principles of an agreement, and that the elaboration of details, which might be expected to take some little time, and required thorough consideration, was occupying the attention of the Imperial Government Department concerned.

There was no doubt wisdom in the issue of this somewhat cryptic statement, however little it may have been warranted by the facts of the case, inasmuch as it seemed to indicate a welcome relaxation of the tension between France and Germany, which had steadily gained in acuteness ever since the gunboat Panther made her appearance at Agadir some five weeks ago. But apart from the temporary feeling of relief produced by its publication, the announcement meant practically nothing at all. It was indeed ill-received by the Press of both the countries chiefly concerned. The attitude assumed by the principal journals of Paris is one of frank scepticism as to the existence of any justification for what it describes as a wave of optimism; while in Germany the Post and other Pan-German organs profess themselves furious at the mere thought that the Franco-German dispute may possibly be composed on terms of mutual satisfaction, and that as a result of Herr von Kiderlen Waechter's bargainings Germany may have to be the giver as well as the taker. The more violent journals have even gone so far as to blame the Kaiser himself as being responsible for the conciliatory attitude of the Government, with an unmeasured vehemence which has called forth the censure of all their more reputable and responsible contemporaries. It may well be, however, that this abuse and lamentation over a potentially humiliated Fatherland has not been evolved without some nicety of calculation, inasmuch as it is generally conceded that his Imperial Majesty is not insensitive to the expressions of public opinion.

The rigid secrecy which has been maintained from the offset as to the negotiations between M. Cambon and Herr von Kiderlen Waechter has in no way been relaxed, but since the officially announced "basic agreement" another interview has taken place between the two Ministers, and as a result of this meeting it is now semi-officially stated that no opinion can be expressed as to whether a definite agreement between the two countries is impending. The value of the alleged "approximation" is thus materially minimised almost as soon as its effect on public opinion has been gauged, and this would be quite in accord with the customary procedure of German diplomatic negotiations had there been any real justification for the contention of the violent party that the rapprochement had been brought about by the conciliatory attitude of the German State Secretary. That this, however, has not been the case has been the sedulous postulate of the German semi-official Press, which has been at great concern to assure its readers that the approximation of the opposed positions was brought about by concessions on the part not of Germany but of France. According to these inspired accounts, it was a modification by the Republican Government of its attitude which is said to have put an end to a crisis of a grave character which existed last week, when the last conversation revealed so considerable a divergence between the views of the two statesmen that both had a feeling that the continuation of the negotiations on the previous basis would be purposeless and harmful. A pause of two days' duration followed, without communication on either side, which is described as the height of the crisis, and at the end of that time, it is said, M. Cambon decided to send an urgent appeal to his Government for fresh instructions and powers. The consequence was the Ministerial Council in Paris on August 3rd, at which M. Cambon was given the desired power to make further concessions to the German demands. The same day, it is said, the French Ambassador informed the German State Secretary, and the negotiations took a course so rapid that by noon on the following day a basis had been formed in principle. At two o'clock on Friday, the 4th inst., a Note had been drawn up jointly by M. Cambon and Herr von Kiderlen Waechter, in which the approximation achieved was communicated to the official news agencies.

Be this as it may—and it should be said that the account is largely discredited in France—the latest statement from Berlin, to which an equal but no greater measure of credence must be given, considerably detracts from its value, if indeed it does not altogether nullify its effect, and the looked for departure of the gunboat Panther from the closed Port of Agadir has not become much nearer realisation than at any time since the Berlin conversations began. But indeed it is hardly to be expected that Germany, having at length made her pounce upon this most desirable harbour on the Sus coast, will be persuaded to forego the unquestioned advantages given her by the fait accompli without altogether adequate compensation in other directions. And from the German point of view adequate compensation for Agadir, which would before long imply also Marakesh, and would ultimately lead inevitably to the supersession, and thence to the extinction, of the now flourishing neighbouring port of Mogador, must be expected to imply something very considerable and of immediate tangible value. The selection of and descent on Agadir is no new project of German schemes.

The value of this lonely harbour on the Atlantic coast of Africa—deserted merely as an act of vengeance by its Moorish lord—has long been scheduled in German archives, and its desirability as an acquisition has for many years been preached and written by Germany's most eminent travellers. It may even be said that the constant aching but quite natural desire of German naval authorities to secure a coaling-station somewhere in the Atlantic rather than, or as well as, one in the Mediterranean ranks but as one of the minor reasons for the German endeavour to obtain a firm foothold in this corner of Moorish territory.

And as to that much-vexed question of a German coaling-station it should perhaps be recalled that the late Marquess of Salisbury was always of the opinion that Germany should be permitted to secure a coaling-station in the Mediterranean, preferably on some island, inasmuch as the possession of such a base would tend to separate her fleet, and thus render one or more sections of it especially vulnerable in time of war.

MOTORISTS who are interested in the question of securing the ideal system of lighting for their cars will do well to study the certificate of performance which has just been issued by the R.A.C. with respect to the 2,000 miles' trial of the Polkey-Jarrott electric lighting set, held recently under the official supervision of the club. Stripped of the technical phraseology in which all such reports are necessarily couched, the fact stands out clearly that the trial was completely successful, and that at last has been evolved a thoroughly reliable, economical, and in every way satisfactory system of utilising electricity, with all its admitted advantages over every other kind of illuminant, for car-lighting purposes. The trial consisted of commencing with discharged accumulators, and running on the standard trial roads of the Club at night—with the exception of the first and last days—over an average of 150 miles per night for thirteen consecutive nights. This means that from six months to a year's ordinary running was condensed into a fortnight. During a considerable portion of the test the climatic conditions were most unfavourable, much fog and rain being encountered during the first week, so that in every way the trial constituted the severest possible test of the reliability of the lighting outfit. The result, as set forth in the report, was that no adjustments of any kind were found necessary to any part of the equipment throughout the trial; the wear of the various parts of the dynamo was so slight as not to be measureable, and the only replacements required were five filament bulbs, representing a quite insignificant outlay. Such are the essential facts embodied in the voluminous official report, and it may be taken for granted that the result of the trial will be an immediate increase of interest on the part of motorists in electricity as a safe, practical, reliable, and economical mode of car illumination.

Mr. Thomas Alva Edison has just arrived on a visit to this country, and, according to the representative of a daily contemporary noted for its sensational discoveries, announces that he has now solved the problem of producing an electric accumulator which will entirely supersede the internal combustion engine as a means of motor-car propulsion. The hitherto insurmountable difficulty in the way of inventors has been, of course, the great weight of the accumulators required to propel a motor vehicle a long distance without re-charging; but he is now stated to have solved it by using nickelled steel as an outer casing, and a solution of potash instead of sulphuric acid. Unfortunately, rumours to a similar effect have been periodically current for a number of years, and the ideal Edison accumulator has never even partially materialised up to the present. One is therefore bound to regard the latest discovery with scepticism, in spite of the authoritative source of its announcement, more especially as the latter is accompanied by the staggering statement that cars fitted with the new invention can run 300 miles at a cost of 3s. Such an addendum to the report deprives it of any trace of verisimilitude it might otherwise have borne.

One of the cars that ran through the Prince Henry Tour without the loss of a single mark was the six-cylinder Rolls-Royce, entered and driven by Mr. Claude B. Palmer, of Pelaw-on-Tyne. With a heavy load of five passengers up, the petrol consumption averaged $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the gallon—an excellent performance in view of the fact that the car was built in 1908, and was probably the oldest in the competition. It had, moreover, done unusually heavy work prior to participating in the recent tour, including that of several Army manoeuvres and four different Parliamentary elections, in addition to extensive touring through Germany, Belgium, and Holland. Altogether, according to the published statement of the owner, the car has covered 21,992 miles on all sorts of roads without one involuntary engine-stop, and is now running as well as ever.

A good guide to the popularity or otherwise of any particular make of motor-tyre is the extent to which it is used on cars entered in important competitions, and it is interesting to note that no fewer than 51 per cent. of the tyres fitted to the cars which took part in the Prince Henry Tour were "Continentials." It will be remembered by those interested in such matters that the Prince Henry Trophies of 1908, 1909, and 1910 were won on cars fitted with this well-known make of tyre, and on this occasion the cups presented by the Queen and the German Empress were gained on cars equipped with "Continentials." Recent successes in important competitions in this country include both the Junior and the Senior Tourist Trophy races for motor-bicycles, events which impose the severest possible strain on tyres owing to the rough and mountainous nature of the roads over which the races are run. That both these events should be won on "Continentials" is a very high tribute to their durability, resilience, and all-round efficiency.

His origin has been traced to harmless clowns in Italy or Provence; and even he would smile a little to hear it.

Whatever his history may have been, he is now the only ideal that remains unchallenged. The knight in armour, the motley fool, the lean-faced saint with his rigid draperies and his burning colours are all gone. The one imaginative figure that is familiar and comprehensible to all of us is Pierrot. The severe beauty of his flimsy raiment, the white face under its round black cap, the peculiar spirit of which he is the symbol, are very dear to the heart of Europe. In the twilight of the gods he stands forth, luminous, frail, and debonair.

He is like a visitant from the moon, and keeps the manners and costume of the dead world. He is cold and clothed in alternate light and blackness. He walks in an atmosphere of mortality, almost of corruption; his presence is more chilling than any ghost's or devil's; he is the patron saint of decadence. Yet a thin unbreakable valour is in him, and he blows a silvery trumpet of shrill defiance against the shadows that enclose him. When he stalks before us, we seem to hear Pascal's plangent epigram vibrating into silence: L'homme est un roseau pensant—a reed which thinks; and though the Cosmos gather itself to crush him, the thought which is quenched when the reed breaks leaves the world black and gross and defeated. Pierrot, in brief, represents man's disdainful criticism of Fate. He is a smiling, cynical aristocrat, stepping daintily to the monstrous guillotine, and jesting by the way. He has no mirth, but draws our uneasy laughter, if we laugh at all, by his impeccable solemnity.

To this has the Comic Spirit been necessarily refined. Prometheus or Hamlet or Faust may symbolise the collision of the whole man—brain and heart and will—with the overwhelming Powers. Pierrot is the apotheosis of pure intellect in aloof antagonism to the brutality of circumstance. He is the least personal of types. Yet he goes often masked, as if he could seem more unfeeling than he is. He is so languid that he cannot be tired. He never sleeps, and when he leaves the revels one would not care to follow him, even in fancy. He exhibits his mortal ennui to himself in solitude as to the most elaborate company. What it hides were a question not to be propounded. He will come back when the rooms are lighted and the moonlight is on the gardens.

The dawn comes coldly into salons where the viols are silenced and the dancers have gone wearily away, and the flowers of last night are dead. Pierrot's pointed feet still linger on the parquered floor; but his bloodless face takes no new pallor, though the roses of youth would be wilted and ashen in the growing day. He saunters out on to the terraced walks; the chill breeze flutters his piebald muslin, but he shivers not. Amiable and impassive, he strolls away; he is vanishing down yonder alley of cypresses; he turns and waves a waxen hand. Is Pierrette at her window? There is a glimmer of white by the distant fountain—and he is gone.

COMPANY MEETING

THRELFALLS BREWERY

IN moving the adoption of the report and accounts, with its recommendation of a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on the ordinary shares for the year, at the meeting of Threlfalls Brewery Company, Ltd., held on the 3rd inst., Mr. P. J. Feeny, who presided in the temporary indisposition of Mr. Charles Threlfall, expressed himself as highly gratified in being able to submit such a satisfactory report of the business of the Company, having regard to the excessive taxation which had been imposed upon the trade. Shareholders would notice, he said, that they had treated their accounts in the same way as they did a year ago, but in comparing them it would be necessary to take into consideration the fact that they had had to pay the increased licence duties under the Finance Act for the full year. Nevertheless, their profits from trading had amounted to £185,598, as against £173,142, or an increase of £12,456. They had written off for depreciation £30,105, against £25,615, and, having placed £1,000 to workmen's compensation fund and written off £885, the expenses in connection with their debenture stock issue, they were carrying forward to next year the substantial sum of £38,098.

With respect to the issue of a portion of their debenture stock which had been made during the year, he would like to say that many of their large depositors had intimated that they were willing to accept that stock in exchange for their deposits at the market price of the day, and they, after having given notice to their debenture stockholders to that effect, had given to the depositors an opportunity to make applications, with the result that they allotted £350,000 nominal at 80 per cent., which was the then market price of the day. They had accordingly received in cash the sum of £280,000, and the discount of £70,000 had been taken from the reserve. That issue had been made without paying any commission whatever, and the only expense incurred in connection with it was the sum of £885, which included £625 for stamping the debenture trust-deed.

He felt sure shareholders would agree with him that by adopting that course the Directors had materially strengthened the financial status of the Company. He could only add that to present such a satisfactory report of their business in the troublous times through which they were passing was very pleasing indeed to him, and he was sure that they would all agree that it was due to a very great extent to the able management of their Managing Director, Mr. George Barker, who spared neither time nor energy in promoting the welfare of the Company.

Mr. Hedges, a shareholder, said that he had come prepared to criticise the issue of the debenture stock; but, having heard the explanation of the Chairman, he was perfectly satisfied that the position of the Company had been thereby improved.

The report was adopted, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks, moved by Mr. Buzzard, who pointed out that, heavy though the incidence of taxation might be, they had done very much better than most of the other large brewery companies.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

NOTWITHSTANDING the beautiful weather, in spite of the persistent good trade throughout the country, the Stock Exchange declines to be comforted. It is in a most melancholy mood, and sees evil in everything. Day by day prices are marked down, and one rumour follows another. We are all very sure that there is no need for alarm over the Morocco question, yet a silly scare such as the discovery that the sentries at a powder-magazine carry ball-cartridge sends a shiver through the House. I will admit that the Yorkshire Penny Bank arrangements shook our confidence. The Bank had eighteen millions of deposits, and it had for years relied upon the simple system of investing those deposits in gilt-edged stocks or gilt-edged mortgages. Both have proved delusive. The Bank attempted to give all depositors and customers a higher rate of interest than they could obtain elsewhere, and as the management had no chance of making money except by lending to its customers, it proved that banking upon such lines was but a method of philanthropy with no business attractions. It is useless to blame any one. It is the system that must bear the shame of failure. I do not wish to pose as Cassandra, but I foresee a similar catastrophe in store for such of our joint-stock banks as persist in placing the bulk of their funds in investments. Money-lending is, after all, dependent upon credit. Credit can only be judged by constant attention, the closest examination. The wrapping-up of one's money in the coupon napkin is the result of sheer indolence. It saves trouble to buy £1,000 Consols instead of spreading it over the purchase of twenty small bills. But naturally the risk is greater. For it is dependent upon the nerves of the nation, not the honesty of its traders. Our London joint-stock banks are bound in rules of the most stringent character, and thus bound they have to fight the great foreign banks, whose principal employees work on the tantieme system, and never lose an opportunity of making money. The foreign banks cut the thing close, and work upon a minimum of cash, but their growth has been extraordinary, and in Paris, Berlin, and the Near East they do all the trade, whilst even in London they do more than their proper share.

CONSOLS keep weak, and no one dares to prophesy any revival, for the gilt-edged market is completely out of fashion. Underwriters who have been stuck with stock—and what underwriter has been lucky enough to escape?—come into the gilt-edged market and try to raise money. The dealers will not put stock on their books, and the quotations therefore remain weak. But cheap money will tell in the long run, and, given peace, I consider a rise certain.

FOREIGNERS are still dull, and prices may be considered flat without any real weakness. But the bull account in Paris has been quite destroyed, and as soon as the French Junior Banks have disposed of their Argentines we may see a revival. There seems no chance of the Montenegro trouble coming to actual war, and once again I repeat that the great bankers laugh at war over the Morocco question. Indeed, they send buying orders into the market whenever the price appears tempting. A glance over the list of Foreign Stock shows hardly any fall of moment.

HOME RAILS.—All the railways have had a magnificent half-year's trade. All except the Hull and Barnsley have either maintained or increased their dividends. The reports have now been issued and the detailed figures bear out the preliminary announcements. Money has been saved, money earned, and money distributed. Yet in spite of all this the Home Rail Market is the dullest and flattest in the Stock Exchange. Had there still been any big bull account I could understand the fall, but that has gone. It seems to a casual person that all the dealers are as convinced of the future as I am myself. Therefore, being desirous of laying in a stock for sale during the autumn months, they are hammering the market with the notion that they can buy to-day what they may sell to-morrow. Those who think that they can obtain a gilt-edged investment to yield 5 per cent. at any moment of their lives, or whenever they choose, make a great mistake. They have the chance to-day. They will not get it long. It is preposterous to suppose that we shall see the present low level continue. The strikes are serious, but they will end. Strikes do not last for ever. Those who buy when everybody sells make the money that the fool loses. I am not suggesting a gamble. The cost of carrying heavy rails is prohibitive. But I do suggest a purchase.

YANKEES have had a smart reaction. It is merely one of those see-saws that we know so well in the American market, and fear so little when the "money is on." The big bankers are quite confident. To those who know New York this is sufficient. The crop is quite up to the average, and it is the crop and the crop alone that governs the railway market. We may read elaborate statistics about the railways, but they one and all depend upon the crops in their ultimate prosperity. Unions have fallen to a very tempting figure, and again I call attention to the convertible bonds in this and many other Yankee railways. We get an option for nothing, and good interest on our money. The public does not realise this. It comes into the markets and buys, but it does not study the position. Neither will it buy Yankee rails when they are low. I am told that the big finance houses expect an autumn boom, and when all the weak bulls are shaken out they will put up prices again. It sounds cruel, but finance in Wall Street is cruel. The strong man wins all the time. The weak man to-day is feeling the hammer, and feeling it very badly.

RUBBER shares are never dealt in, for the public holds at such prices that a sale is impossible. The aftermath of the boom is not being reaped with much profit. Many of the Malay companies will live to pay good dividends, but the Trusts are doomed, and the "outside shows" are also doomed. This is not of much help to the unlucky people who took shares. The Mount Austin, which was floated on a basis of forward sales, and whose shares were pushed to a premium on the strength of tons of rubber sold at huge prices now admits that it cannot enforce such contracts. Luckily, it has secured a fine of £10,000, which will go towards the dividend for 1912. But other companies have not been so fortunate. These so-called contracts are absurd, for they are only enforceable when things go well. When they go ill they mean a lawsuit. If a rubber company could job on such contracts I can conceive that they would be useful. But the Rubber Boards are not the people to job. That is an art not learnt in the Lane or on a plantation.

OIL keeps firm—I can say no more. But it is high praise in these days of sagging markets. The shale people in Scotland talk of a combine, but unless Fraser lead it, the promoters shall have none of my money. He is the only capable oil manager in the Lothians.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS are strong and weak just as the dealers buy back, and the shops support their special favourites. Neither here nor in Paris does the public take any interest in mines. The Brakpan crushing was good, for it showed a profit of 9s. 11d. per ton, which, when the labour allows, should show a handsome dividend.

EGYPT.—The damp weather still continues and the worm terror grows. The land wants dry heat such as we have here. That kills worm quicker than any vermifuge. I am told that the crop will in any case be over 6,000,000 cantars, which at the present price is quite good enough.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

A COSMOPOLITAN FOLK-SONG

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Thirty or forty years ago I often heard sung, and also recited, in Germany and Austria, some sing-song very much like the Cornish one mentioned in your to-day's number. As the audience always was much amused, laughed, and bravoed, I fancy it was considered a "comic song." I don't remember all of it, but am sure that it began:

Question I.: "Lieber Freund, nun sage mir was ist Nummer Eins?"

Answer: "Eins ist der Herr Gott der da Schuf die ganze Welt und Alles was da ist
im Himmel und auf Erde."

Question II.: "Lieber Freund, nun sage mir was ist Nummer Zwei?"

Then followed questions three, four, &c., to twelve, and after the response to each question the answers to the preceding questions were repeated in inverse order, thus always ending with the answer to the first question.

I remember that answer two was Jesus and his mother: three, the Trinity; four, the Evangelists; . . . seven, the Seven Sleepers; . . . ten, the Commandments; eleven, the 11,000 Virgins; twelve, the Apostles.—Yours obediently,

A. HOUTUM SCHINDLER.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

MR. GEORGE CAVE is apparently a singularly ingenuous person, and yet why should he be so? Mr. Cave, we find, was called to the Bar thirty years ago, he was Chairman of Quarter Sessions for seventeen years, and amongst many other responsible positions has represented the Kingston Division for five years, and yet what do we find this respected Member proposing? Fully aware of the complexion of the present House of Commons, and of the ways of the "childlike and bland" Labour Member, Mr. Cave actually got up in his place and proposed a self-denying ordinance. He thought argument would prevail! He smoothly suggested that it might look a little odd, if immediately after all power over finance had been taken away from the House of Lords, the very first act of the members of the House of Commons should be to vote to themselves a salary of £400 per annum. Was Mr. Cave poking fun at the famished allies? If he was, his humour was not relished, and his suggested advice was decisively rejected. In such a hurry were the confederates to "collar the swag," that they would not even wait for an ostensibly decent way or even adopt a workmanlike manner of removing the spoons. The resolution not to apply to themselves! Perish the thought! They were the only people whom they cared one jot that it should apply to. No mock-modesty, no nasty-niceness about them. They saw the people's money on the table. The transfer was the matter of a moment. The sweep—if not clean—was absolutely effectual.

The correspondence at present proceeding in more than one paper concerning hotel and inn accommodation in France, Germany, and England may be beneficial in many ways. At present, when the question of a holiday at home or abroad is discussed, the scale is often turned in favour of a Continental visit by reason of the charm and cheapness of the French auberge; and not only by these qualities, but the supreme one of good and genial management. At a hundred pretty villages in Normandy, but a few hours' journey from London, the English stranger is welcomed courteously by the proprietor—or proprietress—of the house at which he proposes to stay; the few words of imperfect English are proudly spoken, and he would be an ill-tempered visitor who failed to respond or to feel at ease. "Make yourself at home, sir," said the lady who presided over our evening omelette on a certain memorable occasion in Harfleur; and when we expressed pleased surprise at her knowledge of the language, it transpired that this welcoming sentence was all the English she knew. The Englishman en vacance feels far more at home in France than the Frenchman holiday-making in this country, simply because of these little touches of hospitality and amity which are found even in the most outlying districts.

The Smart Set for August well maintains the reputation for excellent literary work, both in prose and poetry, which began with its very first number. Mr. Richard le Gallienne, true to his trust as Keeper of High Romance throughout the English-speaking world, writes cleverly on the thesis that "never was there a more romantic age than ours," instancing the "magic toy" of the telephone, the "magic machinery of communication," and the doom of the duenna in modern courtship. "Soon," says Mr. le Gallienne in his concluding sentence, "it is to come about that a man shall propose to his wife high up in the blue heavens, in an airship softly swaying at anchor in the wake of the evening star." Very pretty, and in the true Golden Girl vein, although, as a rule, a man does not propose to his wife. The stories in this issue are capital, and we notice especially a good and original tale by Henry Sydnor Harrison, whose fine novel "Queed" we reviewed a week or two ago. As to the two and three line witticisms which fill up odd corners, the Smart Set was always famous for those, and we cannot resist quoting one of the best, particularly apt and pungent at the present day:—"It is easier to grind out epigrams than it is to think out solutions; hence the plethora of Shaws and the dearth of Maeterlincks." That hits the mark, and reminds us that a very fine and gently sarcastic cartoon of "G. B. S." appears in the current issue of Vanity Fair.

We have received from India the prospectus of an English edition of "The Golden Book," issued at Lucknow in 1903, which contained short biographies of about 2,000 notable persons, but which was in the Urdu tongue. The English volume will be named "Who's Who in India," will contain photographic illustrations, and is due to appear in the late autumn of this year. For those who have played any active part in the work of the Indian Empire, and who desire to have their names placed on record, a form is provided at the end of the prospectus. The specimen biography enclosed is very comprehensive and well written, and the book should have a large sale among the thousands who are interested in the Empire across the seas.

LESPAGNOLS-SUR-MER—1351

Their sails are low and full and square,
 Many upon a misty sea;
 Black crows move 'mid the helmets there—
 Who is it hath more need of prayer,
 They or we?
 For the Spanish sails are nine to our three.

The hungry waves may eat their fill
 Of men and eke of ships to-day—
 The sun is red and seems to spill
 His redness on the waves until We and they
 Abandon those grim tides and creep away.

Another green peers o'er the green
 Of purer waters—now the towers
 Of Winchelsea uprise serene—
 Beneath their shadow kneels the Queen,
 Flower of flowers.
 God have mercy on the Spaniards' souls and ours!

“IGNOBLE THEMES OBTAINED MIS-TAKEN PRAISE”

It would be wrong to suggest any connection between two prominent features of the position—political and social—which we observe at this moment. It can only be a coincidence that a national scheme of insurance—on a contributory basis—is quickly followed by agitation on the part of the assumed beneficiaries for increased pay. Pay beyond the amount of the contribution which the Chancellor paterfamilias has done violence to his record—at Limehouse—in demanding. And—yet is there no connection between the two? The Chancellor, in his capacity of statesman, is—more or less—alive to the dictates of thrift and common honesty; in his capacity of demagogue, he is otherwise. In which capacity is he likely to captivate the adherence of the most poorly paid and least responsible section of the population? We think Mr. Lloyd George “queered his own pitch” as author of a contributory scheme, when he used these words at Limehouse:—

Who is it—who is responsible—for the scheme of things whereby one man is engaged in life in grinding labour to win a bare and precarious subsistence for himself, and when at the end of his days he claims at the hands of the community he served, a poor pension of 8d. a day, he can only get it through a revolution.

There are many explanations of the responsibility for the final picture, although Mr. Lloyd George—as demagogue—suggested there was only one—namely, the selfishness, cupidity, and luxury of the classes who are not dependent at the last on the “poor” pension. Such language quoted on Tower Hill is sure to lash men on strike into fury.

The smug Labour members and their camp followers waste few words on the correct Chancellor defending his contributory scheme from the green benches of the House of Commons. The picture they present is that which we have quoted above.

Who can be surprised at the reply? Why should the man who is spending his life in grinding labour contribute out of his scanty earnings towards insuring himself against various contingencies? Employers' liability legislation has in many respects relieved him from any necessity to insure himself. His old-age pension is provided for him by every one but himself. Why should his eloquent electioneering friend expect him to show care, forethought, ordinary thrift, or any degree of self-denial? This man at least is logical. He has been carefully instructed that he is to be no participant in making provision for himself in various directions; why is he now called on to do so, because Philip in sobriety has turned his back on his gospel of plunder?

The more we ponder, the more we are inclined to quarrel with the opening sentences of this article. We do begin to think the process of demoralisation has proceeded so far as the result of Radical misdirection, that amongst certain classes the utmost resentment is felt against anyone who suggests that the duty of helping themselves falls in any degree on their own shoulders. It is all very well for the Chancellor to decree that they shall contribute towards the many misfortunes and ills to which life is heir, but they hold the trump card. Contribute—yes, if we must, but we will have more than double pay out of which to pay our contribution. The attitude is, of course, wholly immoral, but it is human, and how can you look for morality from that which you have sedulously demoralised?

The worst feature which is observed at present is that the superior wage-earning classes have not escaped the infection. Adopting a thoroughly illogical attitude, without examination and comprehension, they declare solidarity—a senseless fudge. The skilled, the intelligent, the self-respecting worker must be disloyal to his employer, disregarding of his family ties, an enemy to the industrial and commercial progress of his country, because—it is his duty forsooth to support the unexamined claims of the pariahs of industry and the professors of sloth and degradation.

We do not say that the position has actually developed at this moment as we have depicted, but all the elements are seen to be in action which would lead to a loathsome abyss.

If there are Labour leaders let them come forth now, and stand boldly against the inevitable tendency. Will they do so? We wonder.

It is obvious that the State—possibly after a cataclysm—will have to adopt very different methods for securing on the one hand—justice, and on the other responsibility, honesty, and character. Lofty methods must be recommended by those in authority, and the highest object must be realised as residing in the effort to lead and not mislead, to elevate rather than to debase.

REPUBLIC OR MONARCHY?

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

Is the Third Republic destined to last? This is the question you hear asked so often in France, and there are few who dare to give a decided answer. There are many royal vultures hovering on the horizon to gather round the body should the Republic fall sick through any untoward circumstances. There are the Bonapartists with the great name and glorious traditions of the mighty Emperor to dangle before the public. They have his code of law to point to, and the many splendid public works he has left as a lasting memorial of his genius, while the glory of his conquests can never dim, notwithstanding their unfortunate termination. The evils which Napoleon I. brought on France through his insatiable ambition have long since been forgotten or forgiven. The French feel that in spite of the disasters which ended his fifteen years of unparalleled power he left no stain of humiliation on France, and that if in the end he was conquered it was only because France ran short of men to carry out the frightful dictates of his genius for war. But the Napoleonic claimants are handicapped by the unpleasant interlude of the Third Empire. Louis Napoleon brought worse disasters on France than Napoleon I., and his defeat left an indelible stain of disgrace and humiliation which the French will never forgive and can never forget. This is unfortunate for the future successful exploitation of the Napoleonic Legend. It can be explained away by pointing out that Napoleon III. was of very bastard descent, the son of the most feeble of the Emperor's brothers and of Josephine's daughter Hortense, who, born of a stock emanating from the enervating West Indies, was hardly likely to become the mother of a line of potent warlike kings.

On the other hand Napoleon III. was accepted by the French people. For twenty years he was the most powerful factor in continental politics, and it was only after the disasters of 1870 that he was called a feeble coward and adventurer. Therefore the French people cannot shake off the responsibility for the Third Empire, and it will naturally make them loath to re-establish on the throne another Emperor cast in a similar mould. If the French are not satisfied with the return of a Bonaparte, they can turn to the other royal claimants—to one of the branches of the Bourbon family. The traditions, glories, and troubles of the Bourbons go back through so many centuries that their claims to the throne need no further explanation. They are anointed by time and by the Divine Right of Kings, but they are handicapped by the misrule and extravagance which brought the French peasant to the verge of starvation in the eighteenth century, and which ended in the French Revolution and summary execution of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. Then, again, the short revival of the Bourbons under Louis XVIII. is hardly a dignified incident of history. At Versailles there is a picture of Louis at work in his study at the Tuileries. His figure is corpulent and his face is that of a harmless family pig. Papers lie before him, and he holds a pen in his hand, but he does not write, and his expression is one of infinite boredom and imbecility. Contrasted with Baron Gros's superb work of Napoleon I. busy in the very same room, Louis XVIII. presents but a very poor figure. Then, again, at Versailles is another picture of the same unfortunate monarch making his hasty exit from the Tuileries on the news of Napoleon's return from Elba.

Either Louis Philippe or Napoleon III. must have caused this portrait to be painted to ensure the exile of the Bourbons for all time. No man could appear in a more unhappy light than the royal runaway. He is so fat that he can hardly walk, and in this picture his features appear more animated, not, however, with the heroic fire which usually shines in the eyes of monarchs when they cause their own pictures to be painted, but with an expression partly of shocked surprise and partly of fear, as though he were incapable of understanding how any rival could be so rude and so energetic as to turn him out of hearth and home at the expiration of a year's tenancy without even the customary month's notice which domestics and householders usually enjoy. France has laughed too often at the Bourbons, and when the French once laugh at an individual or at a Government they refuse to take either seriously again. Besides, the French can never forget that poor Louis XVIII. was twice returned from Europe's lost property office of dethroned kings by foreign bayonets over the bodies of thousands of her bravest sons. As long as the memory of these things remains, and as long as those two portraits are yearly gazed at by millions of French citizens, the Bourbons cannot hope to regain the throne of their ancestors.

Then there is the other branch of the Bourbon family, the Orleanists, as a possible substitute for the Republic. Louis Philippe was a worthy man, and his natural inclinations were to be a good constitutional monarch. But he was feeble, and he allowed himself to become the tool of unscrupulous Ministers, so he also crossed the Channel. His reign was colourless, and he has left behind him no glorious traditions—nothing, in fact, except a few unattractive portraits of himself in Versailles playing a heroic rôle in wars and events which no one now remembers. The Third Republic at present occupies much the same relative position as does Jack Johnson, the coloured champion, in pugilistic circles. Johnson is disliked by many; he cannot last for ever; but none of the existing White Hopes are ever likely to put him down for the fatal count. The Third Republic is disliked by many; it cannot last for ever; but none of the existing Royal Hopes are ever likely to knock it out. Jack Johnson's hour will come, so will that of the Third Republic, but no one can say when, how, or at whose hands.

No nation can go through two such chequered centuries in its history as France went through in the eighteenth and nineteenth without acquiring some political wisdom. The French have learnt wisdom from disaster. They are not going to allow themselves to be carried off their feet by any display of royal wares, however attractive they may appear. They realise that a Napoleon can add nothing to their glory, but that he might add very considerably to their national debt and to the long list of those who died to satisfy an insatiable ambition under the belief that they were laying down their lives for their country. Unless a Napoleon lives up to the family traditions there is no raison d'être whatsoever for his occupancy of the throne. He could hardly improve the Civil Administration of France, and he could hardly hope to add to the happiness or prosperity of the French people. The French recognise how much they owe to Napoleon I. in spite of his ambitions, but they have had a sad practical experience, from which they are only just recovering, of the evils which result from similar ambitions in the hands of a weak and incompetent man. The Bourbons are likewise equally unattractive, for in the eyes of the French they mean expense combined with imbecility.

It will be very difficult to revive any monarchy which has left so many traces of their worst features as the various French royal lines have done. Versailles is symbolical of all that is worst in monarchical government. It is the greatest monument to human extravagance which exists in the world. To a nation of small holders it is peculiarly abhorrent. The idea of one man and his wife occupying such a vast palace and spending such enormous sums of money on its upkeep at a time when thousands were starving in the streets of Paris, only a few miles away, is peculiarly repugnant to the thrifty French family man. Napoleon I. had the sense to realise this, and never lived there. Louis XVIII., whose family, in the words of Napoleon himself, "learnt nothing and forgot nothing," was animated by no such scruples, and frequently made it his residence. Philippe Égalité, forgetting for the moment his nickname, also passed some of his time there. Napoleon III. intended to do so, but seems to have abandoned the project. Philippe Égalité, however, thought better of the idea, made Versailles his permanent residence, and decided to turn part of it into a museum. He consecrated it to "All the Glories of France," and by doing so he may be said to have sealed up the coffins of all the royal aspirants to the Throne of France. He threw the palace open to the gaze and to the understanding of the French people, and they with quick perception gradually have learnt what a monarchy means.

But it is not only Versailles; there is St. Germain, there is Fontainebleau, and there is Malmaison. The French come in their millions from all over France and gaze in delight and admiration on these monuments of former days of greatness for the individual and misery for the masses. For a moment they may say to themselves, "How fine if these days could come back; how glorious it would be!" But this is only for a moment. Then the sense of proportion reasserts itself, and the worthy citizens reflect that it is better to come and see these things on Sundays or fête days than to starve outside the palace gates whilst the revels and music of the small coterie who compose the Court are wafted to the waiting masses. They leave the palace more than ever satisfied with Monsieur Fallières and his stipend of two hundred and fifty thousand francs a year.

The fundamental change which has come over France in the last twenty years is the decline in the political supremacy of Paris. Formerly where Paris willed France followed; but now all is changed. It is the provinces which control the policy of Paris, and this is the great achievement of democracy under the Third Republic. It makes for stability of government and for peace. The small peasant proprietor of France is a sound economist, and possesses great political acumen. He wants peace so that he may develop his material resources, and save money for his family. He hates the bare idea of war. The fear of invasion is ever before his eyes. He dislikes soldiering, though he recognises it as a necessary part of his duty as a good citizen; but woe betide the Government which sends him to the stricken field for any other reason than self-protection against a foreign aggressor. Such a Government would not last a day. Thus it seems as if nothing could upset the stability of the Third Republic, which is apparently founded on a solid rock of public approval. And yet something may. The love of glory and of individual greatness still lives in the excitable Gallic nature; sudden changes in public opinion are still likely to sweep the country, but they will not react in favour of a Napoleon, or a Bourbon, or an Orleanist. The danger would come supposing the country should be dragged into a great war. Then if any general should cover himself with glory and win battles for the nation, and thus restore her fallen military prestige, he would become by a simple automatic process first President and then—well, few men who have risen to power under such circumstances are content to pass into obscurity at the end of their allotted span of office.

FLAUBERT AND HIS LETTERS - I.

By FRANK HARRIS

THERE has been a sort of newspaper plébiscite held in France recently, and by an enormous majority of votes Gustave Flaubert was chosen as the greatest French writer of the nineteenth century, and his novel "Madame Bovary" was selected as the best French novel. The voice of the people in matters of art is usually negligible, and I find it difficult to accept either of these popular verdicts. I should place Balzac far higher than Flaubert as a novelist, and I should not hesitate to put two or three of his books above "Madame Bovary." At the same time no one will deny that this popular choice of a writer and a book reflects credit on French taste, compels one to a certain respect for ordinary French opinion. For Flaubert never took any account of popularity: he wrote for himself and was his own severest critic. Intent solely on getting the best out of himself at any cost, he made his life a long martyrdom to his craft. While Zola was producing fifty portly volumes Flaubert was content to leave a poor half-dozen; he spent seven years, as all the world knows, over "Madame Bovary" and fourteen on "Salammbô"; he told Georges Sand that an epithet often cost him ten hours' labour, and if he could get a page on paper in a week he was well content. Even if one had to add a good many grains of sceptical salt to this statement still there can be no doubt that Flaubert took his work with extraordinary seriousness; he was indeed a priest of letters, "the last of the Fathers of the Church," as he loved to call himself, utterly contemptuous of vulgar applause, and enamoured of perfection. It is astonishing then to find such a scrupulous artist and master of style turned into a popular hero and "Madame Bovary" proclaimed a deathless masterpiece by the children of the people who prosecuted Flaubert for having written this very novel, and treated him during his lifetime with disdainful contempt. One is accustomed to seeing popular judgments reversed; but this apotheosis of a criminal is extraordinarily rapid and extraordinarily complete, so rapid and so complete indeed as to suggest that Flaubert's masterpiece is now appreciated rather for its passionate appeal than for its high artistic quality.

Still we are not primarily concerned here with the popular pendulum-swing from extravagant blame to extravagant praise, but with the slighter fluctuations of the critical needle seeking the point of rest. Before the point is reached, however, certain hitherto unconsidered aspects of Flaubert's nature and Flaubert's activity must be brought into the account.

We know a great deal about him from one source or another. He tells us himself that he was five feet eight in height, corpulent, hot-blooded, and red-faced (rougeaude); from the de Goncourts we hear of his thunderous voice and aggressive personality; his outbursts of anger at small meannesses, his savage contempt for false valuations; Tourguénief tells us of his childlike frankness bred of long solitude, and his underlying kindness of nature, the spring of human love and sympathy at the heart of him. His niece relates with what magnificent generosity he gave up all his fortune to her and her ruined husband when he was over fifty years of age and already infirm and suffering. Heine's praise of himself is true, it seems, of Flaubert, as indeed it is true, I think, of most great artists. They have more of the milk of human kindness than other men:—

Schon knospet die Jugend welche versteht
Des Dichters Stolz und Guete,
Und sich an seinem Herzen waermt,
An seinem Sonnengemuete.

If we are to believe these witnesses, and they are unusually clear-sighted and fairly disposed, Flaubert was a rich, kindly, and vigorous personality, and might have been expected, therefore, to produce generously. Yet five or six volumes are all he has to show for thirty years of incessant, nerve-racking labour. This meagre output of an exuberant temperament forces me to accept Flaubert's account of the time and trouble he spent on his prose style. I believe that he read every page of it again and again with most meticulous care, now to remove an assonance, now to bring more variety into the form of the sentences, now to make sure that the rhythm of the words intensified the significance of each passage. He was perhaps the greatest among the masters who have turned French prose into one of the finest forms of literary art. And one does not come to foremost rank among such writers as Gautier, Renan, and Michelet without strain of hand and head.

As a rule the great creators have [so much] to say that they are apt to be a little careless as to how they say it—or rather they soon come to see that the utmost care given to the manner will not improve the result materially; the Balzacs, therefore, prefer to leave a dozen masterpieces to one or two specimens of impeccable and perfect artistry.

What bee in his bonnet was it that made Flaubert spend seven years on "Madame Bovary" when it would probably have been almost as good as it is if he had despatched it in six months? It seems to me that his experience of life in boyhood and youth, when our companions and friends and loves make the deepest impression on us, was unusually slight. One knows "Madame Bovary" intimately, profoundly; but Flaubert has hardly revealed to us another woman's character. And his men are nearly all thin and slight, studied from the outside with the indifference of maturity. His niece tells us that nearly all the personages of his stories are sketches from life, easily recognisable portraits of relations and acquaintances. Here we have the key to the puzzle. Indeed Flaubert himself supplies it. Now and again in his letters he lets slip the fact that he was a solitary in boyhood and very shy. His niece explains that his solitariness was increased by his bringing-up in the melancholy isolation of the hospital where his father was senior surgeon. As a youth Flaubert says he always felt that he was unlike other men, that he would shock people if he told them what he thought and felt; he would therefore keep silence as long as he could and then break out into a diatribe that astonished every one. His uncouth vehemence, his rudenesses even, were the inevitable result of his melancholy shyness and solitary upbringing. It was this nervous shrinking, due in part to an unusual precocity of genius, which made Flaubert a solitary even in boyhood and youth, and so impoverished his acquaintance with men and women.

A rich and powerful nature with only one or two models at command, Flaubert naturally resolved to make the one or two books he had in him as perfect as possible.

Yet no one by taking thought can add a cubit to his stature. Fine as is "Madame Bovary," it is not finer even in artistry than Balzac's "Curé de Tours." True, the style of "Madame Bovary," the verbal felicity of it, is incomparably more exquisite than anything to be found in Balzac; but the proportions of "Madame Bovary," what Goethe called the architecture of the book, is nothing like so perfect as the architecture of "Le Curé de Tours." In the first half dozen pages Balzac has excited our interest, brought us to like the little, heedless, harmless, good-natured, good-humoured, ease-loving Abbé, and in a dozen more pages he shows us the spider waiting for this happy, buzzing fly, and fills us with the premonition of inevitable disaster. Then relentlessly the current of the story sweeps on—narrowing, hastening, leaping to the catastrophe—a masterpiece of narration, a model of modern tragedy. The first hundred pages of "Madame Bovary," on the other hand, are tedious—they should have been boiled down into twenty—and the end is too melodramatic. The Bovarys of real life don't poison themselves; they slide from one liaison into another till advancing years force them to inaction. The tragedy of life to Emma Bovary is that she is inevitably lassata sed non satiata.

Nor must it be imagined that Flaubert's verbal style, good as it is, is beyond criticism. It would be easy indeed to show that the very excellence of it, the colour and beauty and music of the words, are utterly out of keeping with the realism of the theme. The simplicity, the apparent negligence of de Maupassant's style would have become Emma Bovary better than the sumptuous tissue of crimson and cloth-of-gold in which Flaubert apparels her.

Yet, in spite of Flaubert's meagre knowledge of human nature, in spite of his architectural blundering, in spite of the long-winded introduction and melodramatic tragedy, in spite, too, of a style far too ornate and splendid for the wife of a village doctor, "Madame Bovary" is a memorable book, and perhaps deserves to be called a masterpiece of modern fiction. Still, if this was all Flaubert had done I should not esteem him and love him as I do. Don't let me be misunderstood; I prefer "Madame Bovary" to all his other novels, even to "Salammbô," though his gorgeous style is better suited to this exotic theme; but, fortunately for himself and for us, Flaubert was a voluminous letter-writer, and, curiously enough, he has revealed himself more completely in his letters than in his novels. I say "curiously enough," for Flaubert was a severe self-critic, and yet took himself to be a novel-writer, and a novel-writer only. If ever there was an impersonal artist, one who desired above all things to hold a fair and true mirror up to Nature, it was Flaubert. What one man can do to hide his personal feelings and personal bias he did; he wanted to be as God's sun and illumine the whole object or scene with the impartiality of light. But just because of his shyness and the solitariness of his youth he had not sufficient knowledge of men and women to show his full powers as a novelist. In his letters, and chiefly, perhaps, in his letters to Georges Sand, he lets himself go and unconsciously paints himself for us to the life; and this Gustave Flaubert is enormously more interesting than anything in "Madame Bovary." The Flaubert of these volumes of letters is a prodigious big and kindly fellow, worthy to stand side by side with the greatest, with Balzac and with Shakespeare, though he lacks a good deal of Balzac's breadth and of Shakespeare's height.

I began this article because the third instalment of Flaubert's letters is now appearing. The publisher has just issued in one volume a new set of letters written by Flaubert from 1854 to 1869. Among them are forty odd letters addressed to "Mlle. Bosquet," in which a little love is mixed with a great deal of literature, and so we get a new cup of the "wine that's meant for souls."

But, alas! I have left myself no space now to talk even of these new letters, much less to say anything of the four previous volumes which are among my cherished possessions. Clearly I must deal with Flaubert, the letter-writer in a second article.

THE NATIONAL INSURANCE BILL

SOME CRITICISMS FROM A TRADE UNION
POINT OF VIEW—II.

THE effect of Clause 11 upon the workman is, to the general public, more important than its effect upon Trade Unions, and considerable sympathy will be felt for the injured workman whom the Government helps with one hand and hinders with two. Under the existing law the victim of an accident is entitled to half wages from his employer up to £1 per week, plus whatever his thrift has led him to provide by way of his Trade Union or his Friendly Society. In effect the Government's scheme robs him of every friendly benefit his common sense has sought to provide, and limits his total receipts to the amount of sick benefit paid under the Bill. The man may have half killed himself in the service of his employer, but he will only receive the same allowance as the shopmate who suffers from influenza or hay-fever. The Workmen's Compensation Act never aimed at giving compensation for the anxiety and suffering incidental to accidents: it only offered partial compensation for wages lost; compensation for suffering had to be provided by the workman himself through some form of personal insurance. Clause 11 not only prevents him making such provision in future, but robs him of whatever he has already contributed for such contingencies. So serious is the effect of this clause that Trade Unionists may prefer to drop the Insurance Bill in its present form, and to retain inviolate the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Attempts have been made to persuade the Government, for the purpose of determining contributions, to calculate wages on a weekly instead of a daily basis, but these attempts have failed, consequently the piece-worker earning 3s. on Monday and 5s. during the remainder of the week will pay the full contribution of 4d., while the day-worker whose wages are regularly 9s. per week will get off by paying 1d. If the contributions were based upon the average weekly earnings this injustice would be remedied, but the State's contribution would have to be higher.

That portion of the Bill dealing with unemployment offers Trade Unionists many opportunities for criticism. The exclusion of the majority of workers from the benefits of a scheme towards which they are compelled indirectly to contribute can only be excused on the ground of inexperience and inadequate data, but the attempt to differentiate between trades and to make contributions fit particular trade risks is less defensible, and is sure to create difficulties between the Unions and ill-feeling amongst the men. It may at first sight appear just to try and fit unemployment contributions to unemployment risks, but here again the Government ignores Trade Union practice, and loses sight of the fact that some one must work in the risky trades, not altogether of choice, but as a matter of national necessity. Had the Government appealed to the workmen on broad, national lines, they would have responded and agreed that all should pay alike and stand to receive alike.

Clause 73, section 1, seeks to increase the importance of Labour Exchanges by offering considerable advantages to employers who engage their workmen through this source. It permits the employer in one week to have half a dozen different men employed on half a dozen different days on the same job and only to pay insurance premiums as if he employed one workman during the whole of the week, but there does not appear to be anything in the clause which enables any one of the workmen to escape paying a full week's contribution, though he may only have been employed one day during the week. It will be possible with the clause in its present state to obtain for one week's work one contribution from the employer and six from the workman.

The effect of this clause will be to discourage direct employment and to weaken the personal relationship between employer and workman, and it offers further deplorable advantages to those employers who need, or who think they need, a surplussage of not too independent labour. Dock-workers may suffer considerably through this clause. In many districts their Unions have been able to regulate the calls, and men only have to attend at the places where they are usually engaged at certain specified hours. This ensures them certain opportunities for rest and food. Driven to engage through the Labour Exchanges, these men must be on call throughout the whole of the day, or risk the loss both of work and of benefits that might be provided under the scheme. Many Trade Unions view with justifiable suspicion the efforts to increase the influence of the Labour Exchanges without increasing democratic control over their actions; they fear the development of these Exchanges into gigantic anti-Trade Union organisations, administered at the public expense and caring only for the interests of the employing class. Something of this fear was expressed in the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted by the National Conference which met in the Memorial Hall in June:—

Non-unionists drawing benefit from the Labour Exchanges must be placed in the same relative position towards the members of an approved Trade Union as are Post Office contributors towards members of Friendly Societies—i.e., his contribution, together with the contributions of the employer and of the State must be isolated and subjected to a first charge on account of administrative expenses, the residue to bear the entire cost of his benefit, and the qualifying period for his becoming entitled to benefit shall be double that of a member of an approved Trade Union.

To obviate the danger which may arise from adding to the duties and the importance of Labour Exchanges, the Bill should exclude them altogether from the distributive side of the scheme and secure this for the Trade Unions.

Clause 79, section 1, presses hardly upon Labourers' Unions. These have never been able to obtain contributions sufficient for the creation of permanent unemployment funds, and their chances in this direction are not increased by the compulsory deductions under the national scheme. They will never be able to fulfil the conditions laid down if the Government maintains its determination not to refund more than two-thirds of what the Union has paid in unemployment benefit during the year; the remaining third will always be beyond the financial capacity of these Unions, because their contributions rarely exceed 3d. per week, and their average of unemployment is exceedingly high.

Clause 80 should be restricted to bona fide Trade Unions; otherwise all kinds of undesirable organisations may spring up and attempt to reap where the Trade Unions have sown.

The principle laid down in the Workmen's Compensation Act in respect of the dates from which benefit may be paid should be followed in the Insurance Bill, and benefit for either sickness or unemployment should be paid as from the first day if either sickness or unemployment extend beyond three full days. The Government scheme only proposes to pay for sickness after the third day.

Nowhere does the Bill seem to make adequate provision for the representation of Trade Unions upon advisory or administrative bodies or upon local health committees. The Unions were ignored when the superior appointments were made and the Advisory Committees formed after the creation of the Labour Exchanges. They have had grave reasons for resenting the manner in which these appointments were made, for more than one dispute has been complicated by the inexperience or class prejudices of those who were placed in charge. Quite recently, some one speaking on behalf of the doctors asked for a representation of two out of twenty-two; if the workmen, who are called to contribute four-ninths of the cost of the scheme as against the doctors' nothing, are represented in the same proportion they will be satisfied.

Trade Unions must be forgiven if they manifest some nervousness and some irritation at the attitude taken by the Government towards all attempts to amend the scheme from their point of view. Friendly benefits have been of considerable value to them; they have supplied a binding influence of a continuous character; they have helped to conciliate public opinion and to prevent this becoming wholly hostile, and they have also steadied the operations of the movement at critical moments. To transfer the administration of these benefits to other, and in some respects rival or hostile organisations may have political consequences hardly appreciated by those in charge of the measure. Stripped of these benefits, and excluded from the administrative work connected with them, the Unions must turn wholly to wage questions; they will become purely industrial fighting machines, approximating in action, if not in constitution, to the Confédération du Travail. If this is the object of the Government, it may continue to ignore the claims and practices of the Trade Unions while it is building up its scheme, and its object will doubtless be secured; whether the interests of industry will be furthered is another matter.

W. A. APPLETON, Secretary of the General
Federation of Trade Unions.

MONTJOIE

MONTJOIE lies in a deep valley of the mountainous district known as the Eifel. The little town is built on a bend of the river Roer, which is really one long waterfall from one end to the other, and is always turning in its bed as if it were looking for a hairpin. Like all mountain streams, it becomes a raging torrent in winter time after a thaw, which perhaps accounts for my impression that half the houses in the town are falling into it and that the other half are climbing out with glistening walls and waterweed in the crannies of their roofs. Wherever the townsfolk go in the valley they hear the breathless song of their river; it rings in the ears of new-born babes, it calls after the dying through the closing gates. On Sunday nights, when the young men have come home from the factories at Aix to meet their girls, who work in the silk-factories at Montjoie, the river absorbs the sound of their mirth, and, since it is a merry river, its voice is unchanged.

These silk-factories are the last word in a commonplace industrial story. At one time Montjoie was famous—"throughout Europe," says the guide-book—for the manufacture of cloth, and the town displays many fine old houses where the manufacturers lived in the years of their pride. For over two hundred years Montjoie flourished, and within the narrow limits of the valley ground became so scarce that the townsfolk built elaborate walls to make little terraces on the precipitous hills, where they might grow their cabbages. But the railway came too late to Montjoie, and the competition of manufactories more happily situated killed the cloth trade, and for a while at least the kitchen-gardens on the mountain side must have been unnecessary. Now Montjoie has recovered a little of its old prosperity, the girls making silk and the boys working all the week at Aix; but the fact remains that in fifty years the population has fallen from three thousand to seventeen hundred. The silk manufacturers have bought the old factories and left them idle to forestall possible competition.

It is to this decline in its prosperity that Montjoie owes much of its picturesqueness, for during the last hundred years it has not been worth anybody's while to build new houses, and the little town has crossed a century of vile architecture unscathed. I have never been in any town that felt so old as this, even though it is lit by gas and devout persons have built a hideous little chapel on one of the hills above it. Its narrow streets, paved with cobbles, and its half-timbered houses projecting over the footway, carved sometimes with pious observations in Latin, and approached by sagging steps adorned with elaborately-wrought hand-rails, create an atmosphere of matter-of-fact unromantic antiquity which is far more impressive than the glamour with which artists endow their conceptions of the past. In the June sunlight there was nothing mysterious about Montjoie; it rather convinced me that possibly the Middle Ages are not an invention of the historians. By day the young people were all at work and the streets were given up to centenarians and kittens, who would have looked very much the same a few hundred years ago as they did then, so that it was easy to give a handful of centuries back to Time and to play at being my own ancestor. In half an hour I had forgotten wireless telegraphy, the phonograph, googly bowling, and all our valuable modern inventions, and was able to walk through the streets with only a casual eye for the queerness of the architecture.

But when night falls Montjoie is full of ghosts and shapes of the dead.

To revert to the houses, they first opened my eyes to the possible poetry of slates, and conquered my normal English æsthetic prejudice in favour of tiles. Between the wide chimneys the slates are spread like butter on a new loaf, in ambitious and tumultuous waves. They are local slates of a delicate colour, so that from the hills Montjoie resembles a colony of brooding doves, and it is easy to fancy that if one threw a stone into their midst the sky would be darkened by flapping wings, and the valley would be left untenanted and desolate. But it is guarded by two ruined castles, one the mere shell of a watch-tower, the other a beautiful and imposing ruin that will be a desirable residence for any reincarnated seigneur by the time the State has finished spending money on its restoration. In chivalrous days this castle was besieged no less than six times, but now the hills are only garrisoned by enormous slugs. The black ones are longer than the brown ones, but they are not so fat; the black slugs are like silk umbrella tassels, the brown ones are like dates.

More interesting to me than the conventional ruins of castles was a large disused cloth factory, for, while it is natural that a castle should be ruined, a factory in decay disturbs our trust in the permanence of our own inventions. It was so large that the little boys had become tired of breaking the window-panes, and many of them were still intact; but through the gaps it was possible to see the looms standing idle under their coverlet of dust, the engines grown hectic in the damp mists of the river, and the white-wash peeling from the walls in soapy flakes. On these walls the workgirls had written their names and the names of their lovers, and I wondered how many tragic separations there must have been when cloth no longer paid in Montjoie, and half the inhabitants went elsewhere in search of work. Unhappily I discovered this significant sepulchre in the company of a man who was labouring an æsthetic theory that it was necessary to have visited Nuremberg in order to understand Wagner, and disturbed my sentimental speculations with idle babblings on music and architecture. I told him that Wagner would have been far more interested in the cloth-factory than in Nuremberg, and that a man who could look at it unmoved was capable only of imitative artistic emotions, which, of course, is true of most men. But I made no convert, even though I pointed out to him the oil-cans still standing where the engineers had put them down for the last time, and the nails where the girls had hung their coats in winter. There are moments when I hate cathedrals and fine pictures, because they make men blind.

One evening I went up to the factory alone to look for ghosts. The cows were being driven down from the hills with a pleasant noise of bells, and the river was singing huskily as though the mist had given it a sore throat. As the darkness came on I would not have been surprised if the deserted buildings had throbbed into spectral life, spinning cloth of dreams for the markets of dead cities. But they held mournfully aloof from me and the world, like a Spanish grandee wrapped in a threadbare coat, until a little old woman came out of one of the outbuildings and told me a story in a sad voice. She had worked there as a young girl, and when the smash came those who lived on the premises were allowed to stay there rent-free; but they had all gone one by one, and now she was alone in the midst of the great buildings that had filled her life since she was twelve years old. It was hard to believe that she was not one of the ghosts whom I had been seeking, and I returned to the town feeling as though I had nearly guessed its secret.

Montjoie is in Germany, an hour and a half by train from Aix la Chapelle and within a day's walk of the Belgian frontier. I descended a precipice one fine evening of June in the company of a mad Belgian architect, and found it waiting for me at the foot. It had waited a thousand years, and it will still lie expectant of the man who shall make it his own when the hand that writes these words is fast once more, after so brief a period of freedom, in fetters of incorruptible dust. The works of man last longer than man himself, though it be but a little longer. And if these old houses tell us only that our forefathers, like ourselves, built shelters wherein they could love secure from the gusty winds and the cold of the world, we are yet aware of a shy conviction that these greying and furrowed stones possess some deeper significance that eludes our judgment, made hasty by the fewness of our years. "If these ruins could speak—" the guide-book says regretfully, when all men know that they are never silent, though we cannot linger with them to hear their message. If the past would cease to trouble our hearts with its sweet and poignant mutterings, we might succeed in mastering the present, in overcoming the reticence of the days to come. I climbed down into Montjoie on a fair evening of June, and after a fortnight—a fortnight as short as a sunny hour—I climbed out of it back into a restless and unfinished world; and so it might be thought I had finished with Montjoie and Montjoie had finished with me. At one time this might have been true; but now I know that I am the slave of my dead hours and shall escape from my servitude no more. Like all men, I am a thousand men, and one man of me wanders still in those steep, uneven streets, looking at the faces of the houses, and waiting for the hour when they shall disclose their secret. Once in a dream I found Time sitting in a garden, and with a dreamer's courage I raised his shaggy eyebrows to peer into his eyes. They were as gentle and kind as a dog's. Perhaps the magic charm of old houses preserves the love and comradeship of the men and women who have lived in them. Perhaps when my spirit wanders by night in Montjoie it is cleansed and quickened by the fellowship of the immortal dead.

FLOREAT ETONA!

A History of Eton College, 1440-1910. By Sir H. C. MAXWELL LYTE, K.C.B. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

THE present is the fourth edition, revised throughout and greatly enlarged, of a work which was originally published thirty-six years ago. The author has always been careful to acknowledge the sources from which he has garnered his information: in bringing his work almost up to date he refers to the additional printed sources and the many friendly communications from individuals on which he relies. It has been easier for him to engraft and incorporate than when he set out to produce "a history of Eton in which matters of biography and architecture, studies and pastimes, old customs and single incidents, should each receive their due share of notice, and fall into their proper places, side by side in chronological order." It is the comprehensiveness of the book which has always given it a pre-eminence. There are other accounts of Eton from different points of view, but none before Sir Maxwell Lyte's book treated it as a whole. Whereas he examined original manuscripts, now later writers use him as their quarry. The size of the volume has been enlarged to accommodate the fresh material. The illustrations have been somewhat altered. It may be a matter of taste, but the new seven photogravures are hardly so agreeable to the eye as the other pictures in the book.

William of Wykeham had already, in 1379-87, founded Winchester and New College, Oxford, so that the scholar King Henry VI., a weak man, sometimes insane, had an example to imitate when he took formal measures in 1440, through certain officials and the Bishop of Lincoln, Diocesan of Buckinghamshire, to carry out his Charter of Foundation of "The King's College of our Lady of Eton beside Windsor," which in due course assumed form as a body corporate, endowed with landed estates, certain privileges, and feudal rights, included in successive Charters sanctioned by several Parliaments. Papal Bulls were secured in favour of the new College. King Henry visited Winchester and induced the Head Master, William Waynflete, to migrate to Eton to organise the new arrangements there, which he carried out before he became Provost in 1443. Statutes were framed, and subsequently extended, establishing the Collegiate body and the seventy poor scholars receiving free education, board, and lodging, called Collegers to this day. They were destined to proceed to King's College, Cambridge, simultaneously founded by King Henry. Provision was also made for an indefinite number of boys coming to Eton from any part of the world for education. Hence arose the Commensals, who ceased later; the Oppidans, the "town-boys," have since formed the greater portion of the school. The first Statutes have a characteristic mediæval termination:—"If anyone, at the instance of the old serpent, shall endeavour to invalidate the statutes, he shall be deemed guilty of perjury." Henry VI. took infinite interest in his foundation. Whenever he met any of the boys at Windsor Castle, he usually tipped them, saying, "Be good boys, meek and docile, servants of the Lord."

Sir Maxwell Lyte's history is too full of detail to summarise. After delays in building and starting, Eton experienced vicissitudes of fortune, survived threats of suppression, suffered retrenchment, received new endowments from private persons, went through appearances of plague and pestilence, lost property to Henry VIII., who contemplated Eton's destruction but died before effecting it, felt the Marian reaction, was honoured with numerous Royal visits and official visitations, entertained distinguished foreigners, had contests for the Provostship and Fellowships, developed the Playing Fields, experienced Puritan rule when Provost Rous was appointed Speaker of the Barebones Parliament, required additional school-buildings from time to time, including residential houses for the Oppidans. Eton life in the sixteenth century, and again in 1766, forming the subject of two chapters, can be fully realised. The boys' rebellion in 1768 on the subject of bounds was a serious affair; subsequent attempts at rebellion were equally unsuccessful: Dr. Keate, though small in stature, was full of courage and resource, not easy to terrorise. We must refrain from digressing into anecdotes. Sir Maxwell Lyte mentions the increase in the numbers of the boys and their fluctuations. The 207 in 1678 changed to 350, 425, 244, 326 to 513, 522, 230, 246, 510-627, 486, 444, 777, 801 in 1859, 908 in 1871, and lately over a thousand, an enormous number to manage. The list of distinguished college and school authorities is long; that of eminent Etonians is longer. The amusements have varied in course of time; bear-baiting, hunting the ram, and illicit sports have given place to modern pastimes which, as in England generally—Eton being a microcosm—receive much more attention than formerly. Other old abuses and institutions have passed away. "Montem" ceased in the 'forties, the joys of Windsor Fair are no more, floggings are less frequent, even the instrument of punishment has been changed. Some absurd customs still linger, and Eton has its special slang, though not so peculiar as the "notions" of Winchester.

Interesting and often amusing as the history of these 470 years is, modern Eton and its example are of infinitely greater concern. Lord Rosebery, a prominent alumnus, spoke of Eton, at a recent centenary dinner, as to his "mind the supreme scholastic educational establishment of the whole world." As lightning strikes the highest objects, so is Eton exposed specially to the shafts of criticism. Lying as it does almost under the shadow of Windsor Castle, as Sir Maxwell Lyte says, Eton has usually enjoyed an ample share of Royal favour, the advantages of which may be acknowledged. But does the school fulfil its main purpose as a place of education? What about the education provided? Mr. Oscar Browning, no lover of modern Eton, writes (in his "Memories of Sixty Years") of the Eton education in 1860, in its most favourable aspects, as one of the best educations that has ever existed; he recognises the value of classical education as a basis "so long as it remains in harmony with the spirit of the age." There is the point: has the Eton education advanced in accordance with the demands of the times? The Royal Commission of 1861-4 on Public Schools found great fault with it, and many changes have since been introduced. The staff of masters has been greatly increased; mathematics, modern languages, history, literature, science (in various branches) are recognised subjects of study. Do they obtain enough attention? Are they properly taught? Are the classics well taught? Such points can never be finally determined. Eton boys win a fair share of scholarships at Balliol, Trinity, and elsewhere; their great numbers produce a proportion of really able boys, sure to succeed in scholastic and University competitions. But if it be asked whether throughout the school full advantage is taken of the excellent education provided and available, it is not sufficient to reply that boys will be boys, and that much must not be expected of them between thirteen and nineteen. At Eton study is notoriously not in favour, industry is not fashionable. The boys aim at avoiding failure (and its consequences) in school-work, and seek success and glory in their games. The material is generally excellent. Eton is the school of the plutocracy; the charges are heavy, an air of wealth and comfort pervades the place. There are many eldest sons and heirs to fortunes who will not have to work for their living, know the fact, and cannot be made to study. The school system has other merits. The Provost, Dr. Warre, claimed that "'Floreat Etona' meant the recognition of certain traditions and principles, and particularly the tradition of liberty, under the influence of which those who knew they were free recognised what was due to authority, and without hesitation did that which they knew to be best for the school." The system of liberty develops self-government, organisation, self-reliance, a sense of responsibility. Eton, it was written, "has a special faculty in providing men with the qualities of leadership. She breeds captains," so that Etonians are constantly found in the very front, though not superior intellectually. The dominant, distinguishing Eton spirit was thus described by Lord Curzon at the same dinner:—

He thought they all felt that somewhere in the background there had always been in their hearts the inspiration of a common idea, the sense of purpose, responsibility, and duty, the desire to do nothing that at any time would render them unworthy of the great institution to which they had belonged. That, he thought, was the Eton spirit; that was the spirit which had made the boy of his own time shout "Floreat Etona!" as he led his company to the charge in South Africa, falling, shot through the heart, at the head of his men. That was the spirit which had animated the Eton Eleven at Lord's last year, and again in a lesser degree this year; and that was the spirit of the Eton Eight at Henley this year, when they constituted a "record," not merely in the history of the school, but of the Henley course. It was the spirit which was embodied in the words "Floreat Etona."

We hold no brief for Eton. The school produces gentlemen and good fellows; they might often be better educated. In the "Eton Anthology," lately published in gorgeous style, one of their own poets, W. Cory, has said:—

Ay! Eton yet! Let critics rail.
Let Harrow boast her powers;
I'd rather have the lads that fail,
So they be lads like ours.

ARMAGEDDON—A NEW VERSION

La Nouvelle Europe. By MARCEL BARRIÈRE. (Alphonse Lemerre, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

THE gift of prophecy was during long centuries supposed to be dead, but for the last thirty years or so we have had manifold and convincing proof that it has only lain dormant. Messrs. Wells and Bellamy occur at once to the mind as pioneers of the revival, and M. Marcel Barrière, whose latest book is before us, has graduated already as a qualified seer. Whether he is to be one of the major prophets it would be rash to predict at present: "de vivis nil nisi cautum." And besides, the modern prophet, like his prototype, is largely concerned with prophesying what will not happen; his gloomiest forecasts are directed at that which may be avoided. In his happier moments he is trying to produce desirable consummations by influencing aspirations. M. Barrière is one of the completest prophets we have met, because he has started with a whole syllabus of future history and philosophy, and is engaged in working it out step by step, lustre by lustre, idea by idea. It is the Rougon-Macquart idea applied to the future. Zola had a peep at the future, by the way, in "Vérité" for instance, but with what unspeakable results. Balzac created a world for a background to his Comédie Humaine, and many French novelists, including M. Anatole France, have produced families of books; but we doubt if any one before M. Barrière ever made in advance a syllabus of fifteen books. "La Nouvelle Europe" is the second volume of the second part of the "Trilogie Romanesque" of the whole "Heptalogie." Parallel to the "Trilogie Romanesque" runs the "Trilogie Philosophique," and the whole is to be completed by a "Partie Analytique."

The first part of the Heptalogy, comprising three volumes that have already appeared, and entitled "Le Nouveau Don Juan," describes the search for happiness in love of Prince Baratine, and is completed by the first part of the "Trilogie Philosophique"—"L'Art des Passions." In these books the true subject for the general purposes of the whole work is the education of the superman who is to regenerate the world. In the course of these adventures he gradually discovers his powers, his limitations, his ideals, and his mission. For M. Barrière believes that the problems of the near future can only be solved by men—by men of generous impulses and unbounded vitality. Democracy and a kind of Socialism he considers inevitable; the former indeed is with him a kind of religion, and the French Revolution a voice from Heaven. Socialism he admits on a highly individualistic basis. But above all, and before all, he must have an aristocracy, or even a tyranny.

The first volume of the present series, which is christened "La Dernière Épopée," is concerned with the first attempts of the tried and tested superman to forge tools for the fashioning of the new world. One of the first of the many terrific problems is that of the relations of the white to the other races. In the "Monde Noir," Baratine, as governor, turns the French provinces in Northern Africa into an ideal State, where race troubles are unknown and inconceivable, and the blessed principles of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity point the way to a golden age.

"La Nouvelle Europe" is the history of the last war, of the triumph of the French Revolution over its last enemies. France has just confided her destinies to a Dictator, partly as the consummation of the révolution sociale, and to sweep up the rests of a "disorderly Parliamentarism to which the country had aforetime owed a period of decadence and of unforgettable degradation," but really and principally to prosecute the inevitable war with Germany. This Dictator, Fouché-Lahache, is a friend of Baratine, and another of the strong men who are to be the physicians of society. He has little of the mysticism that distinguishes his friend, but he has that almost superstitious hatred of monarchy that surprises in certain French minds, and once or twice in the careers of many poets. His aim and goal is to get rid of the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs—whose dominions, by the way, have become fused into one great empire, under the presidency of Prussia. The Czar may be left to the natural developments of time. For allies Fouché-Lahache has the "Latin Republics"—Italy, Spain, and Portugal—on the point of constituting with France one great "Latin" federation—and England, in spite of her monarchy and House of Lords, which are, however, excused as being mere "shadows," and soon to disappear at that. This great alliance is not, however, completed till the moment when the French military organisation is ready for its task, and becomes, in fact, the casus belli. The equipment for France for the great struggle is methodically described—the training camps, the formation of an élite of professional soldiers, the organisation of the whole army in multiples of three. The training of the officers and the selection of the fittest for the important posts, as well as the sympathy promoted between officers and men, are other features that receive special examination.

M. Barrière is careful from the beginning to disown all idea of the Revenge and the reconquest of Alsace-Lorraine. In this matter he says that prescription has done its work. But, putting aside the question of the two provinces, we cannot admit that the idea of revenge is entirely absent from these pages. If there is one thing that galls the author, we should say it was the "Gott mit uns" of Kaiser Wilhelm I.; he credits his own Kaiser, grandson of the present one, and ruling, we suppose, in about 1930, with a very crude piety and a tactless and unseasonable method of expressing it. The worst thing about his counsellors also appears to be their "pietism." The triumph of the French Revolution is the uppermost idea in "La Nouvelle Europe," but the "French" is to the full as important as the "Revolution." Baratine objects to Fouché-Lahache's ruthlessness—"Le patriotisme n'est après tout que l'égoïsme des nations;" and the Dictator's reply is: "Soit. Mais la France n'est pas une nation quelconque; c'est la nation modèle."

The German and Austrian sovereigns are, then, the two obstacles to an international millennium. It is a very simple gospel, and, with important reservations and a substitution of the shade of Bismarck for the Imperial office and its holders, one that might command in many quarters a certain popularity. M. Barrière's war is the inevitable consequence of internal Socialistic troubles in Germany; it is the red-herring of the Imperialists. The French Government foresees the crisis and encourages it; England is bound to help for the sake of secular janglings and present interest. Of course, the war, in the hands of a French neo-Jacobin, could only go one way, and after a short campaign, most graphically and credibly described, and a tremendous battle on the banks of the Moselle, between Nancy and Metz, the Germans are completely routed. What follows is the end of the Prussian and Austrian dynasties, and the gradual disbanding of European armies. Baratine dies from the effects of a wound, and the Dictator quits his office in a moment of disillusionment. It is right that the book should end on a rather hopeless note, as there must be work left for the volumes yet to be written.

The part of the English forces in the war is distinctly gratifying to the national pride. National service has become an established fact, and English cavalry play a great part in the big battle. As for the naval duel, that is very soon over, and "the London Government was astonished to have been, for a moment, afraid of such an unworthy adversary." We are pained, however, to find that most of the victorious fleet are subsequently sunk in harbour by submarines—it seems a wanton blow, after the annihilation of the German battle-fleet.

Baratine's black troops play a decisive part in the big battle, more by their reputation—for they arrive at the last moment—than by their actual fighting. We quite understand the supposed cry of protest from Europe at this feature of the war; so does M. Barrière, though he is too much engaged in following one of his hobbies to endorse the protest.

The verisimilitude of the story is most complete. We were driven into getting out a map of the Franco-German frontier, and into following the campaign step by step. One possible horror of a modern battle is indicated; days of continuous cannonade produce such a disturbance of the elements that a storm of incredible violence is provoked, and most of the supplies and accessories of the two armies are destroyed by the wind and the rain.

The book might serve as a pendant to Mr. H. G. Wells's "War in the Air," only whereas in that grisly forecast civilisation is torn up by the roots, in the present case its cause is advanced. But then, if M. Barrière's conception were the first to be realised, it would cut the ground from under the other's feet. And if we must have one or the other, we prefer M. Barrière's catastrophe.

SOUTH AMERICA IN A NUTSHELL

The Ten Republics. An Introduction to the South American Series in Porter's "Progress of Nations." By ROBERT P. PORTER. With 12 Maps. (George Routledge and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE ten Republics with which Mr. Porter deals are those which comprise the continent of South America. The field, therefore, is exceptionally formidable in its proportions. Each of the ten countries has supported the weight of many and bulky volumes, and the mass of literature that is now extant on the subject is a little fearsome to contemplate. But Mr. Porter is not in the least concerned with bulk. He has placed the ten countries together, has boiled them down, and has given us his contribution in as condensed a form as that which a few tins of meat-extract represent to a weighty herd of live cattle. To desert bovine metaphor, his summary of the continent that extends from Cape Horn to Panama occupies rather less than three hundred pages.

Now this in itself is a notable feat, by the side of which the majority of merely commercial compressions pale. It was Columbus who probably gave the most rapid description of a country ever known. When asked to picture a certain mountainous island—which I believe, from recollection, was Madeira—the explorer, yielding to his weakness for graphic illustration, crushed together a smooth piece of paper in his hand, and thus produced an eloquent vista of peaks and valleys. Mr. Porter has dealt more tenderly and elaborately with his paper; nevertheless, he has contrived to give an astonishingly full measure of information in the space he has allowed himself for the purpose.

Although history is lightly touched on, the main interest of a volume of this size is inevitably confined to the industrial and commercial ethics of the various countries. Stress is very rightly laid on the enormous expansion of railways that has occurred within the last decade, and that is undoubtedly increasing in impetus with the passage of each year. The latest phase of this notable movement is, of course, the opening-up of those great districts of the far interior that until the present have partaken almost of the nature of hinterlände, so great were the distances that separated them from the centres of practical commerce. This more ambitious system of development is still in its comparative infancy; but in another two or three years it will undoubtedly have matured sufficiently to produce results that cannot fail to astonish the world. This, it should be understood, applies less to Argentina than to Brazil, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Peru, for, as the author justly remarks, Argentina "now stands fourth among the nations of the whole world in the matter of railway development in proportion to population."

So far as Argentina is concerned, Mr. Porter renders full justice to the progressive spirit with which the inhabitants of the Republic are permeated:—

Meanwhile Argentina progresses by leaps and bounds, a land of plenty for all but the naturally inept and incapable. Its people are frankly and entirely occupied in the pursuit or the enjoyment of wealth, caring but little how they are governed and regarding politics with indifference, so long as it rains. . . . The national prosperity rests on the surest of foundations, since an inexhaustible source supplies its constituents, and for these, the prime necessity of mankind, the demand can never even waver, so that in summing up Argentina's prospects of future material welfare the slightest fringe of pessimism would appear to be inadmissible.

It is, of course, impossible to follow the full scope of Mr. Porter's work in this notice. Let it suffice to say that each Republic is adequately dealt with, and we have an ample summary of Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay, with their pastoral and agricultural wealth; of Chile with its nitrate fields; of Brazil, Bolivia, and Peru with their coffee, rubber, and minerals; and of the various industries of Venezuela, Ecuador, and Colombia. It is a large field—in lozenge form!

The historical portions of the book are, on the whole, ably and fairly accurately rendered, although here and there occurs a slip that cannot well be passed over in silence. The author, for instance, in dealing with the history of Paraguay states that in 1814 the country "became independent under Dr. Francia, a beneficent despot, who ruled the country firmly and encouraged agriculture and industry."

Now the adjective beneficent is one that can scarcely be applied with justice to the first Dictator of Paraguay. As a matter of fact, Doctor Francia was a tyrant whose methods can scarcely have been outdone in cruelty by any other despot in the history of the entire world. Indeed, the adjective now applied to him renders the relation of a few of his deeds essential, if for nothing more than for the purpose of comparison and for a subsequent alteration of opinion concerning the character of the man.

According to the testimony of reliable eye-witnesses resident in the country at the time of the tyranny the merest chance criticism of the methods of the Dictator was in itself quite sufficient to cause its rash author to be cast into prison. But these prisons were no ordinary places of incarceration. Each was a small cell without windows or air-holes into which some forty miserable wretches were packed tightly together, and this in a tropical atmosphere! Nevertheless, had Francia's cruelties ended at this point all would have been comparatively well. The ghastly interior of the prison, however, formed merely the prelude to a series of torturings and floggings beneath the stress of which a large proportion of the prisoners died ere the official time for their execution had arrived. Irrespective of cause or reason the very existence of the highest and lowest in Paraguay lay at the mercy of the tyrant's whim, and Francia valued human life as little as terrier treasures that of a rat. Here is a record of this "beneficent" Dictator that will reveal something of the strange workings of his mind:—

A poor woman, knowing no other way of getting an audience of the Dictator, went up to his closet window; she was sent to prison for her temerity, and her husband, who had not even heard of the pretended crime, was obliged to share in her punishment. The Dictator was so deeply offended at this want of respect, as he called it, towards his person, that he gave to the sentinel placed before his door the following order: "If any passenger should dare to fix his eyes upon the front of my house, you will fire at him; if you miss him, this is for a second shot (handing him another musket loaded with ball), and if you miss again I shall take care not to miss you." This order being quickly known through the city, the inhabitants carefully avoided passing before this terrible palace; or, if any person were obliged to do so, he kept his eyes constantly bent upon the ground.

This story might be received with some incredulity were it not in the company of so many others of similar nature and of undoubted authenticity.

Perhaps these remarks will help to prevent an unduly rosy passage down posterity on the part of Dr. Francia. As a matter of fact, an historical slip of the kind does not detract from the industrial and commercial value of Mr. Porter's book. He has succeeded admirably in bringing together a store of information in a handy form that cannot fail to be invaluable as a work of reference.

INDIAN WILD TRIBES

The Kacháris. By the late REV. SIDNEY ENDLE. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.)

WE have here another volume of the valuable series of monographs of the numerous tribes in Assam which are being published officially under the orders of the Government of the Province, the companion volume to which, "The Naga Tribes of Manipur," by Mr. T. C. Hodson, we lately noticed in THE ACADEMY (April 1st, 1911). It is very proper for the Government to undertake the publication of such books, which are useful both for administrative purposes and as contributions to the knowledge of ethnology, folk-lore, tribal customs, &c. They testify to the efforts of the Government to understand the people with whom their officers have to deal, and they certainly must prevent the perpetration of many mistakes and conduce to improved relations, as these semi-civilised people find themselves better understood and their motives appreciated. The history of the whole of Assam has been well written by Mr. Gait, the accomplished Civil Service officer who has conducted the recent Census of all India and is now engaged in writing the report on it. But these monographs go more into detail than is possible for a comprehensive work.

The little book before us was compiled by the Rev. Sidney Endle, who laboured as missionary and planters' chaplain for upwards of forty years in the Darrang district, north of the Brahmaputra River, with his headquarters at Tezpur. His life was devoted to his beloved Kacháris of that district, as Mr. J. D. Anderson, late I.C.S., in his Introduction shows. His popularity with the natives and his familiarity with their language enabled him to acquire information which a Civil Service officer can rarely hope to gather. He could preach with equal ease and eloquence in English, Assamese, and Kachári, and he compiled a manual of the latter language. The people known to the English as Kacháris and elsewhere termed Chutiyas are by themselves called Bodo (or Bada, Boro, Bara). In Assam proper the Hindus designate them Kacháris, in Bengal they are known as Meches, the same word as Mleccha, barbarian, a term applied offensively to the English in India. The origin of the Kachári race is still obscure, but it is not unlikely that it was in earlier days the dominant race in Assam; its Mongolian type, however, indicates Tibet and China as its original home. Immigrations from the north and north-east probably occurred, by which the Ahoms left their mark on the country. These aggressions account for the division of the Kacháris into two distinct groups: the northern located north of the Brahmaputra, as previously stated, and the southern, the Dimasa, Great River Folk, who were driven out of the Brahmaputra valley and sought refuge in the country now known as Cachar, the hills and the district of that name. Tribes of the same race, but known by other names, such as the Koch and the Garos, are included in these groups. Within Assam the whole race numbers probably more than a million souls. The Bodo language has survived, in spite of Hindu and Shan invaders and settlers.

These people are described as being among the most innocent (through ignorance) and kindly of semi-savage races, intellectually inferior, strong rather than skilful labourers, intensely clannish and obstinate, possessed of many virtues, but yielding at their festivals to a weakness for the national beverage—rice-beer. In their social and domestic life they generally resemble other rude folk, with differences. The system of mutual help prevails among them, their food is not limited or restricted, except that no orthodox, old-fashioned Kachári will ever touch milk, and their women do much of their fishing. Mr. Endle attributed their internal and tribal organisation to a totemistic basis; his description of their sub-division into septs or clans is very interesting, but the restrictions on marriages have long since passed away. Kacháris of the old-fashioned, conservative school still think it a duty to show respect to their totem (the tiger) by formally going into mourning whenever they learn that one of these animals has died in the immediate vicinity of their village. Polyandry is absolutely prohibited. Respect for chastity is maintained; in certain cases of suspicion the rice ordeal is adopted. A certain quantity is given to each grown-up girl to be masticated; the offender, under the pressure of the fear of imminent detection, is unable to masticate her portion, the faculty of secreting saliva failing her in her terror of discovery and disgrace. The Kacháris' religion is of the animistic type, its underlying principle being characteristically one of fear or dread. As a rule no idol or temple is seen, "but to the Kachári mind and imagination earth, air, and sky are alike peopled with a vast number of invisible spiritual beings, known usually as 'Molui,' all possessing powers and faculties far greater than those of man, and almost invariably inclined to use these powers for malignant and malevolent, rather than benevolent, purposes." They have borrowed many deities from their Hindu neighbours, some household, some village, including a cholera demon. But the Kacháris have no priestly class and employ no Brahmans in religious ceremonies, though in times of special emergency the services of the "possessed woman" (the Deodani) are requisitioned for an appropriate ceremony. The Kachári has some vague and unsatisfactory belief in a life after physical death. He is often regarded by his Hindu neighbours as a Boetian, but he has practical qualities and a saving sense of humour which lighten the cares and toils of existence. Mr. Endle devoted a chapter to the Kachári language which belongs to the agglutinative, as distinct from the inflexional, family of languages, and Mr. Anderson has appended some specimens of interlineal literal translation of folk-tales which linguistic students will appreciate.

We have said enough to convey information of the character of the book and of its utility to certain classes—local officials and students of mankind. Such works are written by specialists for specialists, and have their value accordingly. The four coloured pictures are very good, and the illustrations generally are realistic; the map showing the area occupied by the Bodo races will be helpful to ethnologists.

LIFE IN NORTHERN NIGERIA

A Resident's Wife in Nigeria. By CONSTANCE LARYMORE. Second Edition, Revised. (George Routledge and Sons. 4s. 6d. net.)

It is with great pleasure that we welcome the second edition of Mrs. Larymore's little volume on Northern Nigeria, the first edition of which, we notice, is placed amongst the "authorities" on which the article on that country is based in the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Major Larymore, C.M.G., was appointed a Third-class Resident in Northern Nigeria in 1902, and our authoress elected to accompany her husband, and, as she puts it, "no Englishwoman yet had gone where I meant to go, or done what I hoped to do." She was courageous, and disposed to bear with cheerfulness any risks and discomforts which she might encounter, and any one who reads her book will acknowledge that few women have roughed it more and been in more tight places, and faced both with greater equanimity.

The risks run were not the outcome of any unfriendly disposition on the part of the natives, who seem invariably to have behaved like nature's gentlemen, and in many cases regarded her with genuine admiration and affection. At Katágum, where she was the first white woman ever seen, she tells us that—

The Sariki explained to me that as I had evidently been "sent" to them as a special mark of favour, it was quite necessary for them to know my name—what should they call me? "A man's name," I remarked, "is given to him by his friends. Give me a name yourselves." After cogitating in whispers, the old man said, smiling, that they would in future know me as "Uwama" (our mother).

The dangers which she escaped arose rather from the menacing forces of nature, such as the navigating of cataracts in the higher reaches of the Niger, and the tropical cyclones which render landing on the harbourless West African coast a frequent source of accident. She was never nearer death than when, in transshipping from the mail-steamer to the branch boat Dodo outside the bar at Forcados during an October hurricane, the Dodo was hove-to on the lee side of the mail-boat, and the transfer of passengers, mails, and baggage made in an open ship's boat. The heavy sea threatened to swamp the boat at any moment, which after having almost reached the Dodo in safety, was sucked in towards the propeller, and barely escaped being crushed on the heaving swell beneath the stern of the vessel.

Another bad quarter of an hour was when she returned from leave in 1908, and was steaming up the Niger at night in a stern-wheeler, and the vessel began to sink by the bows in forty feet of water. An iron barge had been lashed alongside, into which the crew and passengers hurried, and, struggling desperately to sever the lashings, only just succeeded in cutting it adrift before the steamer made its final plunge. Major Larymore, who had rushed below to save his dog, was imprisoned in the cabin by a mass of sliding baggage, which blocked the companion as the bow sunk and the stern rose. His wife fought fiercely to clear away the heavy packages, while he smashed his way through the jammed door of the cabin, and just in time he, she, and the dog dropped over the rail into the arms of the men in the barge.

Mrs. Larymore appears to have been very devoted to animals and pets of divers kinds. She seldom returned from leave to commence a new tour without a dog or two of sorts, and on one occasion had the enterprise to import a crate of buff Orpingtons and black Minorcas; and we read on various occasions of native cats, of marabouts, a baby ostrich, and even a baby hippopotamus.

One story she tells about a pony which is very remarkable. The pony got colic, and was doctored all the afternoon with hot fomentations and other remedies, and was given up for dead. The native vet. then asked if he might take him in hand, and having got the pony on his legs, "passed his hands five or six times down the animal's flanks, murmuring to himself the while; finally, taking the muzzle in both hands, he looked very hard into the pony's eyes, recited a string of Arabic sentences, and, stooping low, blew into each nostril three times." Whereupon the pony eat a bran-mash, "and never showed another symptom of pain or illness." Perhaps after all the fomentations had something to do with the cure.

We have all read something of the great city of Kano, with its 40ft.-high wall and its thirteen gates; but Mrs. Larymore adds some interesting details concerning the interior of the town. Her account of Hadeija, a similarly walled town still further north, and the reception of the party by the Emir, makes a striking picture of the grandeur of the native rulers, and their clouds of expert horsemen in the chainmail and plate armour which the Arabs of the Soudan borrowed from the Crusaders—a scene which reminds us of the account given by the present Governor of Northern Nigeria of his reception at Kano some twelve months ago.

This book will be read with interest by all who follow with intelligence the growth of the Empire, and the sturdy enterprise and patient endurance of the King's servants in the Dominions beyond the Seas.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Hebrew Satire. By J. CHOTZNER, Ph.D. (Kegan Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

IN our notice of Dr. Chotzner's previous work, "Hebrew Humour," in our issue of the 30th of September, 1905, we pointed out that the author had apparently mistaken the meaning of his title, inasmuch as there was little of humour to be found in the essay which gave the title to his volume. After a perusal of the present work we find ourselves justified in passing a similar criticism upon it; for in this book Dr. Chotzner has apparently again mistaken the meaning of his title, as there is but little of satire to be found within its pages. This cannot mean that the Hebrew genius is devoid of satire. Rather otherwise should, we think, be the case. Satire must be almost the natural resource of a highly intellectual race such as the Jews, which through various methods of oppression is debarred from the natural processes of rejoinder and attack. One would have thought that Dr. Chotzner, in choosing such a field as he has, had obtained the opportunity of developing an unlimited estate wherein the rough material of a dozen volumes similar to that of "Hebrew Satire" lies ready to hand. Either we are sorely mistaken or the author has very strangely overlooked the wealth lying at his feet, for his garner of Hebrew satire is quite insufficient to justify anything more pretentious than a newspaper article at the most. The anecdotes which he has collected are in the main devoid of satire, and some appear to have no particular point in them whatsoever. The same may be said of the translations in verse, whose form, moulded by the hands of our author, gives no consolation to the disappointed reader, falsely attracted by the title of the book; for these examples do not serve to support Dr. Chotzner's claim to the poet's wreath. No, it cannot be gainsaid that the book is quite unworthy of its subject.

The Wonder Book of Railways. Edited by HARRY GOLDING. (Ward, Lock and Co. 3s. 6d.)

FOR all boys who love engines, and are curious to learn something about the way in which a big railway is managed, this well-illustrated book will be a treasure. Articles dealing with the whole life of the iron road, from signal-cabins to sleeping-cars, and from the lowly yard-locomotive to the magnificent expresses which travel hundreds of miles without a stop, are contributed by various authorities, and little fault can be found with them. It was perhaps a mistake to attempt the explanation of the valve gear of a locomotive without diagrams in a book written especially for youngsters; we almost wonder the writers did not expatiate on the mysteries of "lap" and "lead" while they were about it. On the whole, however, the technical portions, when they are necessary, are very clearly put. A capital chapter on the alteration of the Great Western Railway's broad-gauge is included, and a picture of the departure of the last broad-gauge through train to Penzance on May 20th, 1892, reminds the present writer that he caught that train, amid great excitement, at Plymouth. The changing of the gauge in two days was a feat of which the Great Western may well be proud, in spite of the fact that Brunel's obstinacy cost them so dear. Sections dealing with the Tube Railways, with headlights, uniforms, bridges, mails, help to make this volume really valuable; it should become a well-handled item on every boy's shelf of favourites.

Tyrannical Revision. By the REV. PONSONBY A. M. SULLIVAN.
(Catholic Literature Association. 1d.)

MR. SULLIVAN has brought together within the limits of a small pamphlet a very able and concise appeal for the proper understanding of what would ensue should the resolution proposed by Convocation and giving much greater power to the Bishop of a Diocese to settle "any question which may arise between the minister of a parish and the people with regard to . . . conduct of the services" be added to the Preface of the Prayer-book. He views both this resolution and the much-disputed Ornaments Rubric from a very broad standpoint, and endeavours to point out many of the disputes and tyrannies which would take place should the suggested alterations be made. It is rightly pointed out that the priests and laity are often more loyal to the Church than the Bishops themselves, and that to allow an individual Bishop to over-ride the law is to entrust far too much power into his hands. We think that all who take an interest in Church matters would do well to purchase Mr. Sullivan's booklet.

MISREPRESENTED DARTMOOR

The Beacon. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

It would be well, we believe, if Mr. Eden Phillpotts were to wait two or three years before he writes another novel of Dartmoor and its inhabitants, for there are not wanting signs that his point of view is becoming distorted. In his last story, "Demeter's Daughter," the heroine is drowned; her eldest son is a scamp; her second son is killed in South Africa, and her husband falls in love with another woman—a wintry affair altogether, as we remarked at the time. In the present book the heroine—if the word may be thus mis-used—decides to leave her husband and live with the patient, stage-managed strong man who has waited for the moment when life will send her to his arms; she goes to him, and he is murdered on the same night; his murderer soon after drowns himself. Another mis-married couple have their place in the tangle, and solve the difficulty in the unconventional method which in fiction seems rapidly becoming conventional; and so the weary round goes on, until we begin to think that the author must have conceived his plot while suffering from severe melancholia.

Why pile Mount Ossa upon Pelion, to scale the heights of disaster, in this sorry fashion? Why not give us a memorable idyll or two of Dartmoor, in the manner, shall we say, of "Under the Greenwood Tree"—for, knowing that heathery moorland as we do, we can reassure any readers who may be tempted to regard it as the black home of broken marriage vows, of men who are as the beast, of love that ends in misery, and misery that ends in suicide. Hearts of men and women beat as healthily and happily on Dartmoor's hills as elsewhere, and although there are tragedies which must be immortal—such as "Tess"—Mr. Phillpotts has not yet the excuse of having written one on the grand scale, one to move the soul to its depths with an irresistible natural sympathy and pain.

Despite all this complaining, we must not convey the impression that "The Beacon" is a poor or an uninteresting book. It has many chapters which we would not willingly have missed, many characters who are the salt of the story with their quaint wisdom and their pungent conversations. Lizzie, the London barmaid, curiously drawn to take up her life under the shadow of Cosdon Beacon, has "notions." She marries Trevail, a weak man, and strives constantly to uplift him, to give him larger ideas, and to release him from the domination of his savage uncle; the tale of her efforts forms the main theme. She fails, and goes to Dunning, the waiting rival, on the very evening when her husband, unknown to her, has decided to free himself and to start life afresh with her on another part of the moor. Then comes the murder, and Trevail is under suspicion. It is difficult to find oneself in sympathy with any of the principal characters; but the secondary ones—Aunt Fanny, who plays the Greek chorus with her advice and comment, the various wisecracks of the district who gather and chatter in the bar of the Oxenham Arms—these are excellently drawn. "The Beacon" which so strongly attracts Lizzie and repels her husband, who is all for the comfortable valleys, is meant to play the same part as does Egdon Heath in "The Return of the Native;" but the magic is not here. Something is missing. Let Mr. Phillpotts discard his dark spectacles and take a pair that shall correct his astigmatism and show him pleasant lands and a healthy-minded people; then let him write about them, and we shall be surprised if he does not give us a novel of splendid Dartmoor that shall get near to the truth, close to humanity, and rank as a classic of the West Country which he is so thoroughly misrepresenting in his present mood.

Phoebe and Ernest. By INEZ HAYNES GILLMORE. Illustrated by R. F. SCHABELITZ. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

THE authoress of "Phoebe and Ernest" has written a most amusing account of the home and school life of two youthful Americans who are brother and sister. We are introduced to Phoebe, who has just turned seventeen, on the day she first wears a long skirt. She is two years older than her brother Ernest, who is then in the hobbledohoy stage of adolescence, with a supreme contempt for girls. In matters of calf-love the American youth seems very much akin to his British cousin, as Ernest's behaviour, when he receives the first arrow from Cupid's bow, shows us:—

Ernest was sixteen, and for the first time in his life he had seen a girl when he looked at her. . . . As long as she was engaged with the front of the class Ernest's gaze adhered as closely to her as if it had been glued. But suddenly the big, black eyes darted up a whole row and pounced on Ernest. It was like having a pair of burning-glasses trained on him. Ernest's look sank like a plummet to his book. To his amazement, the type began to perform an intricate fancy dance. He fried in a blush that worked inward as well as outward. A clammy perspiration broke out all over him. His shoulders twitched, and he seemed to have no control over his mouth. He had never before known a sensation that was rapture and agony in equal parts. But the most perplexing part of it was that he liked it more than he loathed it.

Hitherto he had been careless of his personal appearance, but now he becomes the "mould of fashion" and the "glass of form." Nevertheless Fay Faxon, with her "maverick members" (Yankee for curls of a sort), eloped with "a dreadful man, a summer boarder," from Akron in New Hampshire.

It is Phoebe, however, who is the ruling spirit in this entertaining book. She practically runs the Martin household "with a gaze of seraphic, star-eyed innocence." And even her brother, who, when in a hurry, "dove into his coat," admitted that "though a girl, Phoebe was almost human . . . and a crackerjack at tennis." We have to thank Inez Haynes Gillmore for a pleasant hour or two spent over these delightful sketches which so vividly portray the free-and-easy life of the American home, and which inter alia have enriched our vocabulary with such choice Americanisms (or are they Elizabethan English?) as "Mutt!" "I gussied up so for Minnie," "Hasn't she a corking figure?" "Sasshayed," "The stunt is to have everything on a level with the eye—search me why;" and many others. We would that the publishers had seen their way to add a glossary to the blank pages at the end of the volume, but we are grateful that they have not enriched the cover of the book with "a female of a winning blonde pulchritude smiling archly on the world at large," which is what they do in the States with "the month's best sellers." From the pictorial point of view, the illustrations by R. F. Schabelitz are attraction enough.

Our Guests. By ST. JOHN TREVOR. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

WE have searched, and searched diligently, among the pages of Mr. Trevor's story for a "guest" who could be said in any possible way to be at least human, even if not interesting, but without success. The guests, so-called, are persons usually known as "paying," and in the present instance live, move, and have their being in a country-house known as the Chateau. There is a broken-down son of the nobility; a young coloured gentleman named Aboo from South Africa; a Mrs. Blunderall, who holds prayer-meetings for the benefit of the South African gentleman; to say nothing of an exceedingly rude person who goes under the name of Trimmer, and is described as "a business man;" and Mr. Croucher, who, when he is not riding part of a bicycle round the country, spends his time in digging potatoes. There is not a humorous passage in the book, unless Mr. Trimmer's remarks to Aboo are supposed to pass for such. "They've splashed the tar on you pretty thick, anyway," is the greeting extended to him by our business friend upon his introduction to Mrs. Blunderall's protégé; and when Aboo merely smiles by way of reply, he is met with "a very fine smile too; what's the price of ivory?"

On one occasion Mr. Croucher leaves his potato-patch and agrees to go for a cycle ride with Aboo, and the following is the way in which an accident to Mr. Croucher's machine is described:—

It became gradually afflicted with a sort of leprosy. It had locomotor ataxy down one side, and was partially paralysed on the other. The break got lockjaw, and the bearings developed acute appendicitis. Then the left pedal got housemaid's knee, the handle-bars had a dislocation of the umbilical cord, the seat contracted angina pectoris, the free-wheel suffered severely from rathumial argitis, till, in fact, every part seemed affected with some chronic and virulent ailment.

If this is the kind of fare we are to expect from works of fiction, we suppose that the only thing to do is to turn to medical treatises in the hope of finding a little recreation.

One Ash: a Barn-door Story. By ALGERNON GISSING. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

No particular reason appears to be given why a girl like Linda Champion should ever have consented to marry such a crafty, suspicious, and mean man as Master Kench proved himself to be. Neither of them professed any semblance of love for the other, Kench's main idea apparently being that he was obtaining a capable woman whose "fortin be in her hands," and who was well able to take her position as a farmer's wife. Of course such a union could prove nothing but disastrous, and the reader is led through complications and situations which are often strained very near to breaking point. Linda is a noble woman who does her duty in that state of life in which she is placed; and although she ardently longs for a single ray of tender sympathy, she is "spiritually and physically incapable of approaching within the remotest glimpse of actual error," so that when temptation assails her in the offer of the protection of Dick Botherway, her husband's nephew, she entirely and resolutely refuses to listen to him. As a character-study of a man whose whole thoughts are bent upon laying up treasures upon earth, who is callous and tyrannical to a degree, and who regards his women-kind as beings specially sent to minister to his material comfort, Master Kench is exceedingly well portrayed. So also is Harriet, his daughter, a selfish and altogether most objectionable person, who is banished to take charge of "The Pothooks," a village inn, when Linda enters One Ash as its mistress. The book ends amid the peal of marriage bells, this time solemnising the nuptials of Dick with his cousin Harriet—another union which, having regard for the dispositions of the parties concerned, to say nothing of their great desire to be "even" with each other, can scarcely be expected to prove a happy one. However, we suppose that if all had gone smoothly there would have been no need to write the story, and we should then have missed the pleasant hour or so which has been devoted to its perusal.

The Silver Shamrock. By CAPTAIN HENRY CURTIES. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

"TEARS, IDLE TEARS" should be the motto of the gallant captain's namby-pamby, lachrymose story. When Violet, the heroine, is not bursting into tears, Mr. Duncasson, "the head of the Society of the Silver Shamrock," is burying his face in his hands and sobbing. Such moments of weakness, and they are by no means few and far between, spoil a story which, improbable as it undoubtedly is, depends for success on taut nerves and rapid action. The osculatory performances of Harold, the hero, are quite as irritating, and what might and should have been a virile account of mysterious plots and counterplots becomes no more than a feeble sentimental tale with a few exciting incidents thrown in. As a pourtrayer of the tenderer emotions Captain Curties does not shine, and he certainly makes Violet as yielding and silly a girl as could be. He is more at home when dealing with revolvers, knives, and anarchist bombs, and shows some knowledge of English high and low life, and also of "le continong," though his French is at times faulty. The Silver Shamrock on this occasion has nothing to do with Ireland; it is the symbol of a society, formed in the days of Napoleon I., which "takes charge of the whole of the private fortunes of kings and their relatives," and further protects them against anarchism and assassination. No tear-shedding weakling could successfully direct such a gigantic undertaking.

THE THEATRE

THE SPRING SEASON OF 1911

WHILE nearly all the leading theatres are preparing to face a new season, it will be interesting to make a sort of summary of what they have achieved in the one that is over. At a first leap, in the spirit of pessimistic irritation into which the London manager drives the enthusiast by his invertebrate methods and utter ignorance of his business, it might be said that the Spring season has achieved nothing, that it has given yet another striking proof of the dire need for theatre reconstruction. So far as the productions of London managers are concerned, with one or two exceptions, such a statement can be made. Whatever good there has been in the season that is now over is due to outside managers and—if the term may be used—to alien companies; and it will be remembered, and gratefully remembered, simply for the admirable and imaginative work of the Irish and Scottish players. The former, at the Court Theatre, with no blatant flourish of trumpets, and without the assistance of elaborate scenery and effects, made something of a sensation. Not for many a year have London playgoers seen acting so true, so sincere, so strong or so humorous, or plays so poetic, so human, so atmospheric or so simple. The Irish players drew all intellectual people to Sloane Square not once, but many times, and achieved, we are glad to know, infinitely more than a great artistic success. It is much to be hoped that they will continue to pay a yearly visit to London, and so provide those people who have not yet been forced by the reiteration of foolish plays and inept actors to desert the Theatre with plays and acting which satisfy their requirements. Of the Scottish players, their plays and methods, less has been seen, but in "Buntz Pulls the Strings," first produced as an experiment to an invited audience, they showed themselves to be to English acting what the sea is to the Serpentine—fresh, alive, spontaneous, irresistible.

Mr. George Alexander and Mr. Gerald Du Maurier are the only London managers who have done anything which deserves to be remembered. The former did well with Mr. A. E. W. Mason's play "The Witness for the Defence." Because Mr. Mason is not a dramatist his play was worth seeing. As a novelist he was careful to look to his story, and that was the only thing that mattered. Had he been a practised playwright he would, in all probability, have expertised most of the sincerity and ingenuousness that was so pleasant out of the play, and left it a mere machine-made thing, a Suture affair, something a long way after the master-machinist Sardou. Miss Ethel Irving did admirable work in this play, and Mr. Alfred Bishop was altogether delightful. Mr. Gerald Du Maurier, with wisdom quite foreign to his profession, chose a play for its own sake, and not because he could exploit himself in a showy part. In selecting it he paid no consideration at all to the sort of thing he knew very well would be written of it by the ordinary penny-a-line critics. They wrote of it as sentimental. They scoffed at the long arm of coincidence, which, as a matter of fact, never entered into it. "Passers By" is the one really charming entertainment of the season, and Mr. Haddon Chambers is to be congratulated on the excellence of his character-drawing, the simplicity and point of his dialogue, and the freshness of his ideas.

Mr. Charles Hawtrey just managed to run through the season, but with a very feeble and uninteresting adaptation of a very nearly as feeble and uninteresting French play. Mr. Hawtrey must really make up his mind at last to take up a fresh part. We have had all we can bear of the inveterate liar with the all too tight coat and lavender tie. Mr. Cyril Maude has not done well. He frequently sees fun in what is to an audience dreadfully banal and foolish. "A Single Man" was dragged into a hundred nights, but Mr. Hubert Henry Davies must be a little more careful in future. The most charming play which Mr. Maude has found for years was Mr. L. N. Parker's "Pomander Walk." How injudicious it was to have put it on at the fag-end of the season, in the hottest weather of the year, has been proved from the fact that it only ran a few weeks. We see that Mr. Maude is to do a new version of "Rip van Winkle." Who is to play Rip? There is no Fred Leslie nowadays. Rip is not a comic little gentleman, all over make-up. It is certainly far more in the way of Mr. Martin Harvey.

Mr. J. E. Vedrenne and Mr. Dennis Eadie made an unfortunate start at the Royalty Theatre with Mr. Jerome's play, "The Master of Mrs. Chilvers." They would have had a success had it been written by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones in his lightest mood. Having failed to attract with this piece, which was, at any rate, made to resemble a sovereign, they lost their heads, and asked a sophisticated London audience to accept a handful of small change. Their second attempt shut the theatre, which has been let for the autumn to Miss Marie Tempest. It will be interesting to see whether this bright little actress will succeed in drawing a public away from the lights. Mrs. Patrick Campbell once did very well at the Royalty Theatre with "Magda," an admirable revival of "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith," and Mr. Frank Harris's daring piece, "Mr. and Mrs. Daventry." She was, however, supported by such actors as Mr. Gerald Du Maurier, Mr. Fernandez, and Mr. Arliss.

Mr. Charles Frohman, who has always aimed at breaking records, achieved an epoch-making series of failures at the London theatres which are under his control. Mr. Somerset Maugham's cynicism found no sympathisers at the Duke of York's, and Sir Arthur Pinero's warped conception of human nature angered people who went to the Comedy Theatre. The latter play, "Preserving Mr. Panmure," had nothing in its favour except really wonderful stage-craft. At the Globe Theatre Mr. Frohman was on sharing terms with Mr. Lewis Waller. Their first production, "Bardelys the Magnificent," was a poor, pretentious thing, in which all characters were marionettes. Their second was "A Butterfly on the Wheel," and, because it contained one good act, ran something over a hundred nights. Like Mr. Hemmerde's other play, "The Crucible," in which, as in "A Butterfly on the Wheel," he was joined in authorship by Mr. Francis Neilson, it was crude, amateurish, and stagey. The dialogue was the sort of thing that is written by the authors of halfpenny novels and Mr. Garvice, and it was only rendered possible by the carefully-chosen company of finished actors and actresses. Without them, not even the exciting Court scene would have saved the play.

Mr. Fred Terry produced a vulgarised version of a celebrated French novel in which he gave an extremely able and interesting performance and one moment of exquisite feeling. "The Popinjay" was valuable for nothing else. "Kismet" is a success of scenery and suggestion, and in spite of the utterly un-Oriental acting and appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Asche. It owes everything to "Sumurun." "Fanny's First Play" has brought prosperity to the Little Theatre. As a finished example of strenuous freakishness it is without comparison. It contains many amazing moments, much smart dialogue, some superb characterisation, and it is played to perfection. Miss Dorothy Minto's performance is an unforgettable thing. Miss Lillah McCarthy deserves success. She is a fine, sincere actress, and a courageous woman. Everything she does is infinitely better than the thing she did last. There is no question whatever as to the fact that Miss McCarthy is the best actress on the London stage, far and away.

In coming to the work of the Haymarket Theatre there have to be recorded the productions of two total and inevitable failures and a sort of success. The latter, "Lady Patricia," was a very amusing, polished, mechanical play of the "Importance of Being Earnest" school. It was delightfully well played and staged. In it Mrs. Patrick Campbell burlesqued herself in a manner which must have made Mr. Pélissier envious. All the same, her methods puzzled and even annoyed those of the British public to whom Mrs. Campbell is a stranger socially, and told against the play. Of the two failures, the first—"All that Matters," by Mr. Charles McEvoy—contained several scenes of rich comedy and some really excellent characterisation, but the three leading parts were sadly miscast. Miss Neilson-Terry made the country girl one who obviously stepped out of a bad school of acting. She was terribly self-conscious, theatrical, and unnatural. Mr. Norman Trevor was flat and uninteresting, and Mr. Lyall Swete unwittingly comic. Of "Above Suspicion" nothing favourable can be written.

Mr. Laurence Irving made two brave attempts to capture success. In his choice of plays he went from one extreme to the other. "The Lily," which was intensely interesting and strong, was too problematic and foreign for ordinary English consumption. Mr. Irving achieved a notable personal success in this play, and astonished even those who believe in him most. "Margaret Catchpole" was a tour de force, and but for the sudden hot weather would have developed into a financial success. It cannot be long before Mr. Laurence Irving occupies a permanent place in a London theatre.

His Majesty's Theatre continued to "present" revivals of Shakespeare's plays. After the much-talked-of representation of Henry VIII. Sir Herbert Tree gave "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Merchant of Venice," "Twelfth Night," and "Julius Cæsar," in all of which Mr. Arthur Bourchier was exploited, being amazingly miscast always. The Gala Performance at His Majesty's was memorable, and has already been fully described in these columns.

THE FIRST ENGLISH EDITOR

HINGHAM is an important village in Norfolk, which possesses a remarkably fine old parish church, and its Vicar during the greater part of the first half of the seventeenth century was the Rev. Robert Pecke, or Peck, according to the somewhat confused spelling of the times. The Peckes of Norfolk were an influential family, for the most part Royalists, but Robert Pecke was an obstinate Puritan, who had for years been in trouble with his Bishop; so that when Matthew Wren, uncle to the famous Sir Christopher and one of Laud's most uncompromising supporters, was appointed to the See of Norwich, strife between the two was a foregone conclusion.

The Bishop at first carried everything before him. When he ordered the Communion-table in Hingham Church to be removed to the chancel and to be railed in, the Vicar, mindful of his own previous convictions for nonconformity in 1615, 1617, and 1622, at once signified his willingness to obey, and the Communion-table was placed at the east end of the church accordingly. But when the report came to the Bishop that the Vicar, in order to testify his personal disrespect for the "altar" thus made, had not only torn up the floor of the chancel, utterly wrecking all the monuments, but had also levelled it below the level of the body of the church in order to render the Communion-table invisible, his wrath was great. Robert Pecke then was prosecuted for his vandalism and had to flee to New England, where he founded the town of Hingham, near Boston, Massachusetts. For the moment victory remained with the Bishop, though the parishioners refused to pay their tithes to the Curate-in-Charge when Pecke's living was sequestrated.

Robert Pecke had three sons—Samuel, Thomas, and Joseph—and a daughter named Anne, who married Captain John M. Seabrooks. Samuel had been apprenticed to a scrivener, perhaps partly with a view to having some one in the family with a knowledge of the law; for litigation was an expensive matter in the seventeenth century, as no doubt the Vicar of Hingham had found out, and a scrivener, or "writer of the Court letter," had to spend seven years in the study of the law before he was permitted to draw up the wills or deeds of his clients.

Just out of his apprenticeship indentures when his father fled to New England, probably with little or no means owing to the ruin of the family fortunes, and, like all other Puritans of the time, with his hopes fixed on the newly-met Long Parliament as the avenger of his cause, Samuel Pecke took steps to place himself in a position calculated to render his New England friends good service. He rented a stall in Westminster Hall and was thus able to let his friends know from first-hand information how affairs progressed at home.

We do not know much about the occupants of the stalls in Westminster Hall, save that they were booksellers as a rule, and that their little shops were sandwiched in between the Courts of Law which sat round the hall. Bold Boughey, warden of the Fleet Prison, received their rents as a perquisite of his office, but only two of his tenants are known to us apart from Pecke. Both were booksellers who printed their names on their pamphlets: Thomas Banks "at the sign of the Seal in Westminster Hall," and a "fat old woman," called Mrs. Breach, who carried on business "at the foot of the stone-stairs going up to the Court of Requests." Mrs. Breach must have seen many stirring sights in her time. She was still at her place in the hall at the end of the reign of Charles II., when she was prosecuted for selling a seditious pamphlet.

Up to the year 1641 no "news-book"—or pamphlet of domestic news—had been periodically issued in England. Archer, Nathaniel Butter, and others had issued periodicals called "currantoes," but these were simply translations from foreign sources, and had no connection with home affairs. Pecke, therefore, at first confined himself to one of the ordinary ways in which a scrivener supplemented his income. He wrote "newsletters"—an occupation in which, so we are told, he might earn as much as fifteen shillings a week (about £3 of our money). At the same time, he appears to have acquired the newly-invented art of "short-writing"; probably practising it in taking down the speeches of the House of Commons. To this we owe our modern newspapers, for the debates waxed fast and furious, and everyone was anxious to know what was being said in the House.

Pecke's opportunity came with the abolition of the Star Chamber in June, 1641. With the Star Chamber went the whole system of licensing, and instead of seeking the permission of the licensees (who most assuredly would have refused it), Pecke was at once able to obtain the authority of Parliament to print the speeches which he had taken down. Accordingly, in the same month, Pecke published a bulky volume, entitled "Speeches and passages of this Great and Happy Parliament from the third of June 1640 to this instant June 1641. Collected into one volume according to the most perfect originals exactly published. Printed for William Cooke," &c. Five months later he published a second volume, entitled "The Diurnall Occurrences; or, Dayly Proceedings of both Houses in this Great and Happy Parliament from the 3rd of Nov. 1640 to the 3rd of Nov. 1641," also printed for the bookseller Cooke. The success of these was evidently great, for when, in the same month of November, 1641, the Irish broke out into open rebellion, general permission was given by Parliament to publish its "Diurnall Occurrences" weekly, and Pecke's little pamphlets flew all over the kingdom in lieu of his newsletters. Of course he at once had competitors enough and to spare, so that the various pamphlets of "Diurnall Occurrences" at the commencement of 1642 will be found to differ in the most extraordinary manner. So Pecke hit upon the idea of calling his "newsbook" the "Perfect Diurnall"—a title in the end recognised to be his only. The "Perfect Diurnall" survived, with varying fortunes, until Cromwell suppressed the whole of the licensed Press in September, 1655, in favour of his own official bi-weekly, written by Marchamont Nedham. In this way Pecke's little pamphlet, at first of eight and afterwards of sixteen pages quarto, became the ancestor of the great sheets we now buy for a penny or a halfpenny.

The journalist's lot in the days of the Great Rebellion was not a happy one. He was liberally abused by everybody, including his own side, and the slightest freedom in criticising the actions of Parliament met with prompt punishment. Samuel Pecke, Father of the Press, was twice imprisoned, and the little we know of him can only be gathered from the abuse of opponents. Nevertheless, one such enemy, the Rev. Samuel Sheppard, Royalist poet and journalist, passed one word of encomium upon him which deserves to be recorded to the honour of both. Writing in 1652, Sheppard says of Pecke. He is "no doubt of the humour of the Samseans in Epiphanius, who were neither Jews nor Gentiles nor Christians, but preserved a commodious correspondency with all. He is very impartial in his intelligence, which shall save him from further castigation." These remarks, for the times, were very high praise indeed. It is only fair to add that Pecke, as a rule, will be found to be truthful when his competitors on the same side manifestly were not.

The Rev. Robert Pecke returned to Hingham somewhere about the year 1644. He did not survive to see the return in triumph at the Restoration of his old enemy Bishop Wren (after twenty years' imprisonment in the Tower), but died about the commencement of April, 1658. Samuel Pecke was his executor and principal legatee, and, no doubt, also ended his days in peace at Hingham.

EIGHTY IN THE SHADE

We have had an old-fashioned summer. How often during the last few sun-starved years has the lament gone up that the seasons are not as they used to be when we were young. That assertion and its sequel remind one of Leech's reply to a complainant that Punch was not as good as it used to be: "It never has been." The summers of the two years of Victorian Jubilee and that of the marriage year of the King were very similar to this present summer of the Coronation. The sun has lately given us a rare taste of his quality. We have had spells of tropical heat that have well-nigh broken the record. Already in the early days of August the dry leaves come pattering down in clouds; the horse-chestnut is turning rusty; and even the bracken begins to look played out. The blossom of that glorious weed the great convolvulus begins to assert itself like the modern Teuton. It reminds us that we are drawing on toward the fringe of autumn.

He who has not seen tropical forest trees half-smothered in the embrace of their attendant creepers can have little conception of the meaning of the phrase "the struggle for existence." The great convolvulus, clutching and seeking to strangle any living tissue which blocks its way, is perhaps our nearest approach to those villainous weeds which the tropical tree nurtures in their youth, protects from the fierce heat of a point-blank sun, and which later in the season reward their protector by a hug more deadly than that of an anaconda or a grizzly. The struggle of most living things as we see them in the Tropics is for light and air. When streams of heat quiver across our line of vision, the dog will coil up in the hottest corner he can find and absorb as much of the actinic force as he may. A healthy child will do the same. He will bask and bathe in the sunlight, and rejoice in its abounding sense of growth. "Dogs and Englishmen," say the Mexicans, "walk in the sun."

It would be a curious study to trace the special physical conditions of night-haunting creatures. The bat is a survival of vast tribes of extinct forms. Did the earth-environment of his remote ancestors in the dim Mesozoic Ages foster a habit which still persists? The race of the owl, again, has physical differences which separate it from all other birds. Night-prowlers of the day and the beasts of prey which stalk them are, perchance, relics of a cosmic story that is told. The primitive forests of the world are shrinking fast. Vast areas of the New World since it has come under the ken of the Old—and that is not time enough for turning over a page of the world's story—have lost their covering of impenetrable vegetation. Before Man came on the scene, with his restless inquisition, the only causes that could start a forest fire would be lightning or earthquake. Now hundreds of square miles of forest are mown down every year as the result of artificial fires.

Locked in the dim recesses of primitive twilight forest-ways, we may be certain that life-types lived and moved—the hunter and hunted. Did they pass on the trick of shunning the light of day to night-wandering creatures of our time? The lion and tiger and other skulking foes of vegetable-feeding animals in this respect have grown amphibian. They prefer the dusk and the dark, but they do not dread the light, as does the veritable night-prowler or the underground digger. It might be worth the while of some leisured naturalist to follow up our trail of a possible clue. The human tribes who frequent great tropical forests are wanting in vivacity and the sense of humour. Even so the nightgoing world of animal life is shrinking—we had almost written anæmic. The jackdaw and the dog have a sense of fun; the owl and the iguana no trace of it. If present animal life-types reflex earth-conditions which have disappeared, an investigation of our point might lead to a truer conception of what the surface of this earth was like when hidden in the dark womb of time. We hear guesses of Mars as a planet screened in ruddy foliage. Was the earth once close-mantled in green, save where rivers and oceans flowed?

The genus Salenia of sea urchins was a few years ago believed to have died out in Cretaceous days, the only trace of a later date being Acrosalenia of the London clay. When dredging off Cape St. Vincent, at a depth of about two miles, and of course thus in Cimmerian darkness, Salenia varispina was brought up still flourishing in the dredges of the Challenger Expedition. The cousins several times removed of many a chalk fossil still haunt the bed of the Atlantic Ocean.

We all read and re-read with perpetual delight Wordsworth's "Ode on Intimations of Immortality." Is the Pythagorean basis of his creed mere chimæra? Surely not. Shelley, with sublime inconsistency, wove its root-idea into imperishable verse, for it is—

That sustaining Love
Which, through the web of being blindly wove,
By man and beast and earth and air and sea
Burns bright or dim.

As we look across the mellowing ranks of corn, or listen to the sigh of summer breezes whispering in the glades of a forest, or gaze on the ineffable glory of sunrise kindling a waste of waters, we know that no dead hand has twisted the strands of intelligent life. "Lift the stone and thou shalt find Me. Cleave the tree and I am there." Life is an unrolling drama, the acts of which are supreme world-moulding forces. In its scenes men and women are merely players. We can never shake ourselves free of the environment of all our yesterdays.

We are justly proud of the record of our race. It has grown "dominant over sea and land." If we learn to rely upon the shows of things, grow artificial, shallow, materialistic, then the knell of our decadence will surely sound. History is but the story of empires that have been swept off the board. The German Emperor believes himself inspired by a higher Power. If he can imbue a due proportion of the German nation with his conviction, that nation, if and when it acts within the bounds of equity, will doubtless reach its destined goal. But to what is the Prussian race, at any rate, tending? It is a race trained and cultured to a high degree, instinct with patriotism, imbued with a sense of swaggering ill-sufficiency, ready to trample down any obstacle in the way of its material aggrandisement. It has grown materialistic to the core, and in that lies its Nemesis, for no nation has achieved, or ever will achieve, permanent success which is wanting in idealism. This is the spring and fountain of all that is great in men and peoples. It was this, perhaps, in a perverted form, which enabled Napoleon almost to grasp the sovereignty of the world. The light of idealism waned, he fell, and his house of cards fell with him. By idealism Cromwell trampled first on the wrongs then on the rights of England; Havelock swept across India like an avenging hurricane; Gordon held China in the hollow of his hand.

Statesmen may labour to build up systems and devise codes. Their petty parchment bonds will be interred with their bones if they fail to embody equity and honesty of purpose and a higher standard than mere material gain to themselves or the nation they profess to serve.

THE BARRENDERO

IN and out of the creeks of the Pasig River are floating a number of nipa-bancas—small barges piled high with nipa palms, of which unsubstantial material the native builds his frail shacks. This is the "fire-season" in Manila.

Fires here are not like those at home. They are not generally confined to the quarter in which they commence, but sweep whole districts clean, so that the most strenuous efforts on the part of the Fire Service—and any ready helpers—can but somewhat check the progress of the flames. I have said "somewhat," for well the people in Manila know that doomed houses, when built of nipa, are usually left to their fate—a swift and final one, and all endeavours are concentrated upon the extinction of any objects that may form fuel for the blaze, and the pulling down of intervening shacks, clearing of the ground before the oncoming conflagration.

At the first alarm, even as the engines are upon the scene—(within a few minutes)—the work of demolition is begun. The neighbouring roads are crowded with natives, —men, women, and children—all carrying bundles of their household goods. Here we meet a wee boy, a saucepan flung over his shoulder almost as big as himself; a bigger boy carries a sack of clothing in his arms, and tears of fear and weariness run down his small, brown face unchecked, in all probability unnoticed. Behind will follow the mother of the family, maybe two smaller children clinging to her skirts and a baby tied across her back. Some secure native rigs and carramatas upon which they pile their valued possessions, ready for instant flight at the approach of the fire.

Such scenes are common enough in Manila during this time of the year, when, on an average, three or four fires are notified in a single day. The rapidity with which these conflagrations are started and are over is scarcely credible. Under two hours a small village will be burnt out, nothing being left to mark the cause of the disaster but a few charred poles and heaps of ashes, with perhaps a single house left standing here and there, witness to the vagaries of the winds and flames in that vast field of desolation. For these solitary buildings only accentuate the misery of the scene and enforce upon our notice the ruined space about them.

In a previous article we have seen that the Americans are doing their utmost to protect the city against these recurring fires. Within a certain district nipa-shacks are forbidden to be built. As these houses fall into disrepair, or become otherwise uninhabitable, strong and securer dwellings are put up under more sanitary conditions. But there still remain too many of the old nipa-huts, and where they are, the chance of resistance in the case of fire is small indeed. At the first spark of flame they are gone, burnt out like a box of matches, and nothing on earth can save them from total destruction. During the last nineteen hours seven fires have taken place in the city, and the suspicions of the authorities have been fully awakened. It is possible that the general excitement prevalent, the atmosphere of expectation, hurry, and danger has acted unhealthily upon morbid minds. Oil-soaked rags have been found in several houses; but it has been proved in one or two cases that such attempts to start new fires have been made by those who are mentally weak rather than with criminal instinct.

Again, it is declared that some of the houses are set on fire by the owners themselves, or by enemies who take this opportunity of revenge as least likely to meet with retribution at the hands of the law. Kill in the open they dare not, but a fire is another matter. Who can say how a fire is started in an empty shack? The family are taking their afternoon siesta, or have left their house to attend mass, leaving the prescribed light burning before the altars of their favourite patron saints. What so dangerous as this unprotected light in a deserted house?

But fires are become so common that they are treated by many almost with indifference. The attitude of Stoic calm in the homeless ones is indeed wonderful. By the bounty of the Government and other big institutions they are fed, whilst accommodation is generally found for them in a neighbouring church or barn. There they are huddled until they can set about putting their fragile homes together again.

Once again the nipa-palms are demanded; the vendors have brought them to the walls of the city, and their provision is not in vain. It is a difficult question, this building of the nipa-shack. Nothing can quite take its place in this country. It is an excellent roofing, cool, cheap, and in every way suitable for the needs of the people. And yet it has this one great danger of extreme inflammability. What are the authorities to do? It has been suggested that they would like to see every nipa-shack burnt to the ground, and that the fires are started at their instigation, but the sensible can afford to dismiss such rumours as malicious and utterly without foundation. Let us instead give them credit for doing their best in a situation bristling with difficulties; in certain districts they have forbidden the rebuilding of nipa dwellings, and are making every possible endeavour to prevent the extension of fires and to capture those who are, maliciously or otherwise, responsible for their origin. They are doing their best, let the landlords and the people come to their assistance now. Let the landlords refuse to build any more houses of such inflammable description, let the people show greater care in protecting their property, and much trouble and loss will be saved this city.

Yesterday I could look across a well-covered area, dotted over with the dwellings of the people, busy with native women and children, intent on their morning tasks, alive with the clatter of their tongues and the crowing of the favourite rooster. To-day there is silence. The trees are charred and blackened, piles of scorched wood are strewn upon the ground. In some places there is nothing save the earth itself, broken and burnt by the hungry flames. This is all that remains of a once populous district.

And the hot sun shines over the Pasig river, and the skies are clear and blue again after the reddened and smoky haze that clung to it the day before. It is clear and fresh and sweet; in the air is the scent of flowers from the wonderful medicine tree, and the breeze sweeps unobstructed across the charred plains. But the barges, piled high with nipa, are drawn up to the banks of the estera very close. They are ready, and they will be wanted very soon now.

THE NEW DECADENCE

A CASUAL survey of the condition of the arts in this country at the present day, in contrast to that of twenty years ago, would seem to provide small foundation for a jeremiad. England has emerged, during the last two decades, from the slough of Victorian mediocrity—a morass which engulfed all save a few great spirits. The drama is gradually shaking off the toils of the bad playwright and the worse actor; the Impressionists, despite their excesses, have broken the back of the Still Lifeless school of painting; the heights of Wagnerian music have been scaled; Meredith and Hardy have come into their own after long exile (with due respect to those public libraries in the provinces which have placed "Jude the Obscure" on the Index!), whilst Mr. Yeats and his companions in the Irish literary renaissance have infused a new vitality into Poetry, and reclothed it in its ancient beauty. Admittedly, the sight of the new Museum building at South Kensington, or of the Victoria Memorial, reflects small glory on the sister arts of sculpture and architecture. But then one cannot have everything. Certain it is, says our casual observer, that the arts are cherished to an extent which would cause considerable uneasiness to the typical sturdy, but stupid, Englishman of fifty years ago, could that worthy person revisit the glimpses of the moon. Culture is in the ascendant nationally, say our optimists, and if we have not yet succeeded in rediscovering the age of gold, we are, without doubt, questing in the right direction. They bid us take note of the young generation, which struts before the sun clad in the glittering habiliments of culture, girt round with courage and helmed with shining thought. The spectacle is inspiring. Alas! to one who, undazzled by the accoutrements of the heir of the English ages, ventures to examine them at reasonably close quarters, it is plain that the old saw concerning glittering substances is justified once more. Neither in regal gold, nor in chaste silver, nor in honest steel does the young generation disport itself, but in nickel plate.

We are living, as certain Radical politicians are never tired of telling us, in an age of transition. The nation, we are assured, is now in the throes of a revolution in thought which will, ere long, usher in the golden age of Socialism—though, in our opinion, the connection between Communism and the Stone Age could be more easily demonstrated. The great majority of the working classes, who (not being members of trade unions) must be convinced rather than dragooned into support of the Marxian gospel, have turned a deaf ear to the apostles of Socialism. As a result, the latter are wearying of the task of enlightening the lower orders, and are transferring their attentions to the "thoughtful" section of the middle and lower-middle classes, convinced that it is with these standard-bearers of the younger generation that their hopes of success must ultimately rest. This view may prove as mistaken as that of the Socialist agitator of the 'eighties, to whom the proletariat was the hortus inclusus in which alone Socialism would take root and flower. As this faith in our young "intellectuals" is not confined to the Socialists, however, a cursory analysis of their credentials will not be amiss.

The "intellectual" young man, as becomes a self-elected member of the new samurai caste, marks himself off from the herd sartorially. He not infrequently garbs himself in aggressive tweeds and wears a cloth hat of indeterminate shape, or goes hatless to the four-and-forty winds of heaven. As an additional means of instilling terror into the hearts of his imaginary foes he is prone to entrench himself behind pince-nez, through which he glares defiance of conventions and creeds. But tweeds or no tweeds, hat or no hat, pince-nez or naked een, he never forgets Ibsen's dictum: one should never put on one's best trousers when one goes out to battle for freedom. To this end he will even don knickerbockers.

The young "intellectual" of the fair sex is less easily recognisable from her outward appearance. She has learned from the mistakes of the happily-defunct New Woman that the advantages to be derived from an approximation to masculine attire are considerably outweighed by the disadvantages—a fact of which her female ancestors of a thousand years ago were fully cognisant. She rarely indulges in the potato-sack for soaring souls, preferring to take her gowns from Bond-street, even though she derives her ideas from Balham. The charm of her femininity is broken, however, when conversation begins. Yet it is possible that, though the dear creature carries her soul in her eyes, and a perfect swarm of bees in her bonnet, her heart is in the right place. The fact that she professes a profound contempt for that organ tends to confirm this supposition.

The subjects of conversation among our "intellectuals" of both sexes are well-nigh unlimited, although this cannot be said of their comprehension thereof. Should you be of a gambling nature, it is safe to wager that before you have conversed for ten minutes with the average adherent of the new "culture" (who would, by the way, promptly deny that he or she was "average") the name of Friedrich Nietzsche will be flung in your teeth. True, they refer to the German philologist as "Nitshi," but they are terribly in earnest about him, nevertheless. His name is ever on their tongues. Not to have read "Also sprach Zarathustra" (with which, fortunately, they rarely have more than a nodding acquaintance) is to place oneself beyond the pale of polite "intellectual" conversation. Ignorant of his claims to be regarded as a poet, claims by no means negligible, they insist on his greatness as a philosopher. Needless to say, the attempt to extract anything approaching to a concrete philosophy from his writings has proved a difficult task. These neo-Nietzscheans, not taking kindly to difficulties of this description, have consequently adopted the easier method of fathoming upon the "master" the farrago of half-baked ideas which fill to overflowing their own "advanced" intellects. Where Nietzsche fails them in this respect, Mr. G. B. Shaw is requisitioned to give countenance to the outpourings of their precious egos. When neither the Irishman nor the German can be pressed into service, recourse is had to the inevitable Ibsen. Whether these three writers, who, with all their shortcomings, are not mere posturing apes, deserve such treatment at the hands of their would-be disciples is a moot point.

Yet even this intellectual triumvirate is sometimes incapable of supplying the needs of our pseudo-intellectuals. In the case of an apparently brand-new idea, however, its very novelty is relied upon to secure it a place in the patch-work credo of "advanced" thought. Thus, eugenics, which is, at the most, but an embryo science, is hastily acclaimed. Scores of "intellectual aristocrats," pallid and purposeful young people for the most part, meet in little groups to discuss, with an impudence as colossal as it is well meaning, the laws that shall regulate the procreative tendencies of the human herd—themselves excepted. One would imagine that these half-fledged reformers, many of whom seriously regard themselves as the natural progenitors of that rather tiresome person the Superman, would begin their charity at home so far as State-regulated breeding is concerned.

Eugenics, of course, is only one of the many problems which engage the activities of these leaders of the young generation. Their sole aim in life is to be regarded as "advanced"—a term which, stripped of all disguise, means simply to be different. Thus it is that these cults are constantly engaged in a frantic adhesion to outworn heresies and out-moded ideas which, recurring after long cycles of neglect, are hailed as new and original, and therefore (such is the mentality of these intellectual giants) worthy to be believed. They must be considered advanced at all costs, or they perish.

Bearing this in mind, it is easy to see that it will not be long before their present gods are dethroned. Ibsen is already coming to be tolerated, rather than revered as of yore, though Nietzsche is possibly good for another ten years' run. Mr. Shaw is in hourly danger of being voted a "back number" by some enterprising youth, not because his pronouncements are less defensible, or indefensible, than they were, but solely because "everybody reads Shaw nowadays," as one tweed-clad but disgusted individual remarked to the writer. This phenomenon covers the secret weakness of the "intellectual aristocrat." He, like all braggarts, is essentially a coward. The "advanced" young person lives in constant fear lest he should wake to find that the Philistines—i.e., those members of the community outside his own select group of egomaniacs—have invaded his camp. He does not believe in the ideas which he champions so loudly, and dare not risk his reputation as an "advanced" thinker by advocating any single one of them once it has ceased to be denounced by the Philistines aforesaid. Were he transported to the Middle Ages, where he would find so many of his ideas in full bloom amongst the various sects of heretics, he would die of very shame.

How far, then, are these pseudo-intellectuals of ours a danger? The question is not easily answered, so incalculable are the results of folly. It should not be forgotten, however, that though they have constituted themselves the standard-bearers of the new generation of Englishmen, the great bulk of our young men have not accepted their leadership. One cannot but regard this as fortunate, since, beyond a vague desire for what W. L. Henley termed "the dominion of the common Fool," they have no idea as to their ultimate goal. "Carried about by every wind of doctrine," provided it be sufficiently bizarre, they are possessed of a childish desire to shock people, not into thinking, but into talking—about them, for preference. Having appointed themselves the arbiters of the arts and sciences, of religion and morals, they proclaim themselves the foes of convention in strident tones, though mentally incapable of distinguishing between necessary conventions and those no longer necessary. This pose of fearless iconoclasm, which veils an idolatry far from fearless, undoubtedly impresses the looker-on. But if one continues to look on for a sufficient time, one discovers the essential vacuity of the whole game.

The only danger, perhaps—a danger remote, but not quite negligible—is that the antics of these acrobats of the intellect may be taken seriously. We have, peradventure, been misled by the vagaries of the late Victorian æsthetes into thinking that decadence is evidenced only by flowing ties and green carnations. The decadents of our day are of a different stamp, but it is questionable whether an insanely excessive devotion to sensuous beauty is more harmful to the race as a whole than the present craze for intellectual novelty at the expense of intellectual integrity.

THE TOILS OF THOUGHT

HAMLET! The very word has become a symbol through the earth of the perplexity that holds the deed suspended in the thought. Yet no brow-furrowed, prematurely-wise student was the Prince of Denmark. How he trod the marshes of thought, in chase of a will-o'-the-wisp seen from afar yet never attainable, is the world's wonder: the world's enrichment, moreover, for in his sedgy journey he sprung on truths that have passed to apothegms. But this was not always so. He had not always been lost in his thought's mazy intricacy. It was the impact of circumstance on a rich and engaging personality that produced so dire a result—a result that was itself the tragedy, and to which the ensuing death was but the relief of sorrow.

Let it not be forgotten whose son he was. It was no filial tenderness that made the son compare the father to the usurping uncle as "Hyperion to a satyr." It is Horatio who speaks of "that fair and warlike form in which the majesty of buried Denmark did sometimes march;" and who remembers the supreme gesture with which "when, in an angry parle, he smote the sledded Polacks on the ice." It is Horatio who recalls the single combat old Denmark undertook under challenge from Fortinbras; and its glorious conclusion. It was a king of men that Hamlet had for father; and he was a very son of his. His swift and prompt action in the matter of the pirates; the manner and command that found him ready acceptance with those lawless souls; the calm, superior contempt of his manner to Rosencrantz, Guildenstern, and Polonius: all much resemble his father's treatment of the "sledded Polacks on the ice." The Ghost's tribute to him of a "noble youth" was not wanted for us to realise that this was a man of kingly proportions, replete with the qualities of courage, to whom nobility was an instinct, and chivalry the natural breath of his mind.

Hear him as he greets Horatio! Horatio bids him know that he is his "poor servant ever." "Sir, my good friend; I'll change that name with you," is his response. Which is indicative of much. For it is only the natural lords of men that can dispense with titular honours, even as it is only the pusillanimous of soul that cleave to them. He stands on false ceremony with none; he is courteous and gracious to all. He asserts his dignity with none; if it is there it will assert itself, fitly and sweetly. It is his brightest lustre that he is the touchstone for the Court of Denmark; the honest approve themselves in their love of him, the dishonest in their hate of him. He is upright and of highest integrity; but this is no achievement of his—it is his natural garment; it is more, it is himself. Yet he is aware of it, and justly proud of it. "I am myself indifferent honest," says he, and, so subtle is psychology, accuses himself of faults that the more enhance the beauty of his soul. In the very grapple of death he shrinks at leaving behind him a "wounded name." Ophelia did well to call him "noble minded," "The courtier's, scholar's, soldier's eye, tongue, sword; the expectancy and rose of the fair State."

No naturally vacillating mind was his. He wore greatness as a natural habit; and it was a greatness that could turn to the importunity of occasion with answering deed, if need be. But on the progress of so fair a promise there fell a cataclysm that turned the whole business of life awry. His father died—subtly, suddenly, mysteriously. And within a month his mother had wed his uncle, who had usurped his place. To his sorrow was added sharp suspicion; and to them both there came disgust.

His intelligence was fine and informative, and he fell to reflection. His perception was acute, so acute that the minds of all he met lay before him like an open book; and this brought an instinct that, mingling with his reflection, shattered the very founts of his sanity. Was ever problem like to his? The fact that he held his uncle in such contempt made him, in the instinctive equity of his mind, question his suspicions of him. As for his mother, she who gave him birth, whose very texture he had in him, it is her falling off racks him most:—

Within a month;
Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
Had left the flushing in her gallèd eyes,
She married. Oh, most wicked speed, to post
With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
It is not, nor it cannot come to, good.

So he cries out in his torture of soul. Yet what can he do? He may suspect his uncle of foul play, but what proof has he? He may even (soul-torturing thought!) suspect his mother's complicity. But of what avail is it? Reflect he must; a leaner soul than his would even do so much: yet this can but ruin him the more. Nevertheless, he does not forget his chivalry. When his mother chides him with his sorrow, asking, "Why seems it so particular with thee?" it is with inexpressible dignity that he replies, "Seems, madam! nay, it is; I know not seems."

To so dire a complexity comes his father's apparition. His worst fears are confirmed. "The serpent that did sting thy father's life," he learns, "now wears his crown." "Oh, my prophetic soul! My uncle!" he cries. It was even as he feared. When revenge is demanded of him he yearns for nothing so much as "wings as swift as meditation or the thoughts of love" to sweep to his revenge. His melancholy is whipped to a terrible excitement. It becomes well-nigh unbearable. When his friends find him he is strange and wild: so strange, so wild, that they suspect his reason. He feels it himself, yet cannot control it.

His worst fears are confirmed and he reels at the blow, but he still has no proof, and this throws his whole soul into confusion. He cannot take action without proof; for there are others to whom he is responsible. That they should think him but a felon striking at the crown for himself, that they should think him even such another as his despicable uncle, makes him shrink from a blow that would end all. How dare he strike such a blow, with no more than an apparition's breath to back him? Yet how dare he resist the blow in the face of his father's solemn injunction?

Thwarted from action, he flies to reflection. Denied the action of a hot insurgent blow, his mind flies to the fury of thought. His own nobility undoes him. Yet it is not vacillation; it is too furious for vacillation. His intelligence undermines all nature, and is suspicious of all honesty. Particularly, and above all else, is he revolted at his mother's grossness: touched by so fell a wand the whole matter of sex reeks in his nostrils, overwhelming him with nausea. His mother! His own mother! Yet he, too, loved. So he turns to his gentle Ophelia for comfort. But his letters are returned; audience, even, is denied him. If there was one thing lacking to complete destruction in him, it was this. He finds her out; and passes his hand over her face, scanning her, to assure himself that this was even she, she whom lately he had loved. It was; and he passes from her with sighs "so piteous and profound that it did seem to shatter all his bulk." Later, the loathing of the thing upon him, he bids her get to a nunnery: "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." It has disaffected him. Thereafter he regards her as but a subject for bawdy speech, his disgust taking vent thus.

Strange mood this for the achievement of revenge! It makes him doubtful even of himself. He becomes more and more introspective—all things drive him that way. Addicted thereto naturally by his nobleness, the perilous state of his mind makes him even more given over to the "craven scruple of thinking too precisely on the event." "Rightly to be great is not to stir without great argument" is a principle of his thought, and he cast about how to prove murder on his uncle, and so prove the Ghost's words true, and the Ghost himself a true ghost.

His uncle sees through him, however. Polonius endeavours to attribute the state of Hamlet's mind to his love for Ophelia; but the King will have nothing of that. He says, "There is something in his soul o'er which his melancholy sits at brood." He imagines his secret discovered, and it becomes a play of thrust and parry between him and Hamlet. He sets Rosencrantz and Guildenstern to watch him, and hatches a plot to hurry him off to England, even as Hamlet in his turn hatches a plot to bring him to self-conviction in a play of his construction. They both proceed together, but it must needs be that Hamlet's plot, being a home matter, should mature first.

"The play's the thing wherein to catch the conscience of the King," Hamlet had said. It did more. It revealed them each to the other as open foes. Above all it cleared Hamlet's mind of all doubt. Now there only remained for him to spring his deed with promptness. Yet, with the proof he needed lying in his grasp, there still remain two prime impediments to action. One is the terrible state into which his mind has been plunged, making him doubtful even of himself. The other is the urgent question of ways and means. His delicacy of mind revolts at so crude and disorderly a settlement as a stealthy chamber-blow afforded. Yet there is no court whereat to arraign him. He sees the King at his prayers, and shudders at the crude opportunity thus presented. Moreover, he is about to see his mother, hoping to discover if indeed she had any complicity in his father's murder. That is now his chief business, and he passes on, folding his intention in dark thoughts.

So the two antagonists fence each other, looking for occasion to furnish the necessary opportunity. Each fears to brave opportunity. The King is hedged by fear. Hamlet is caught in the toil of scruples; conscience has indeed made a coward of him. His "native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." Yet opportunity is not long ere it falls. And it falls to the advantage of the King, for Hamlet has killed Polonius. On a plea of public safety he is dispatched to England.

A short solution, this! It is not long ere an over-ruling fate and his daring courage win Hamlet back to the arena. He comes armed with the thought that "there's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will." His demeanour is calmer, his mood is more resolute, he is more watchful and tense. He knows the King has some plot afoot, though he knows not what it is. He knows, above all, that the end is now sure of swift arrival. Therefore, when young Osric comes to him, as he talks with Horatio, telling him that the King has wagered on him in a fencing bout against Laertes, his instincts scent the final crisis. "Thou would'st not think," says he to Horatio, "how ill all's here about my heart; but it is no matter." Horatio protests; but Hamlet derides it. He "defies augury." "It is," says he, "such a kind of gain-giving as would perhaps trouble a woman."

His instinct did not err. The tragedy has grown ripe, for he falls to a poisoned thrust from Laertes' foil. All trouble, all grief, all difficulty is over. Learning his fate, he completes his revenge, smiting the King to death in the very heyday of his crimes; and with the same breath wins the coveted death. It was so, it had to come neither earlier nor later, despite the fury that the trammels of thought and self-censure wrought in him. Yet to the last he proves himself quick and sensitive to the charge of dishonour. Says he to stout, Roman-hearted Horatio:—

If ever thou didst hold me in thy heart,
Absent thee from felicity awhile,
And in the harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
To tell my story.

Had Horatio searched the gamut of praise he could have found nothing fitter to his subject than when he said, "Now cracks a noble heart." Noble from first to last, it was his nobleness that destroyed him.

A TRIPTYCH OF GENOA

III.

THE alleys of Genoa are incredible. You thread your way through their network swarming with half-naked children and loud-voiced women. Lean cats nose furtively amid débris from the kitchens, broken flasks, and filth unnamable. Suddenly you come upon the remnant of a marble column scrawled over with obscenities, and still supporting the marred cornice of an acanthus capital, from which a tuft of dry weed waves in the light breeze borne up from the port with its burden of coaldust from the mines of Newcastle or Aberdare. Gay loops of tattered garments hang limply in the turbid lower air, and tethered macaws shriek from the verandahs of cheap albergoes like frantic sybils prophesying doom. Skeins of taut wire zig-zag across narrow slits of blue sky; for, amid all this picturesque dilapidation and filth, Genoa is a great port, and has urgent business with the ships of all the world.

The cathedral is of black and white marble in alternate bars; its doorway columns are covered with a strange flotsam of arabesques that drifted in with Eastern argosies centuries before the Genoese had learnt to bargain for freights of coal that should compel fire and water—those volatile fiends—to the service of man. Huge lop-eared mules draw cartloads of it along the quays; and, hard by, the intolerable clang of the boiler-makers is heard in gloomy shipyards.

Liners from New York are waiting in port for their freight of raw labour for the American market; iron-gorged monsters from Swansea or Bilbao, whose swift screws trample down the surge with the suave energy of assured power, snarl out a strident warning as they sight the tall "Lanterna" that guards the harbour's western bound; and, encircling the port in a magnificent sweep—like a theatrical back-cloth suddenly shot out from the wings—one sees the superb line of hills heaped with houses, terrace above terrace, crowned with the grey ramparts of the old castle, towards which the slender bell-towers point like so many fingers. Trams dart hither and thither amidst this busy hive; they burrow through hills, they mount viaducts, they curve along the coast-line until at last, clear of the dense foreground of quays, warehouses, and giant funnels, one sees the blue gulf waters casting their blind riot of white foam against the black rocks.

There is eager speculation on the fate of cargoes overdue in buildings plastered with the announcement of cheap fares to far-off Eldorados or nearer Edens on the Riviera; while a few yards away the priest is chanting to Christ and all His saints in the glory of a hundred candles. Only a few women are there to worship; and two small ragamuffins play hide-and-seek in and out of the central portico and the great tethered red curtain which shuts out the unhallowed glare of day. In the cafés and bars the electric fans winnow ceaselessly, and the glasses shine and tinkle their cool allure through curtains of beaded strings.

Down at the dock-side, among gay funnels and grimy pontoons, the boatmen are fixing up awnings of striped canvas, while the oars lie idle in the rowlocks and the water-shadows ripple on the bows. There, too, a brown boy is swimming, a small charm dangling from his throat. He dives under the broad belly of a red boat and comes up on the far side, puffing like a seal. He grips something black in one hand. It is a mussel that his fingers have raked away as he wriggled under the weed-clogged keel. He yells to a boatman, throws the prize aboard, and dives again.

The tug Paolo Guiseppe slips by, making a V-like trail of silvery bubbles that slap the quay wall and subside. Steam—seen only by an impalpable tremor in the air above it—hums and hisses from the funnel like swarming bees. The glaze of offal oil makes a strange dazzle on the water, and the air is sickly with the reek of raw molasses. A near crane winces under its heavy burden and squeals shrilly as it swings round. Coalheavers, naked save for a slip of sacking round the loins and shoulder-blades, trot noiselessly up and down long planks, unloading a broad barge of its dark burden. Their smooth copper skins are smudged over with coal-grit to the colour of a dirty penny. They plant their bare feet deftly on the sun-baked planks, and pass ceaselessly up and down like a revolving chain.

The gaunt, featureless, six to ten storied houses gaze down blankly, through windows that look like eyeless sockets, on the live clamour of the port below. Their colour and the company of little odds-and-ends of castellated towers, barocco belfries, and grey rock-ridges alone relieve their deadening aspect; the cleverly-painted mimic balconies and masonry, blistered and crackled by the sun like a dry biscuit, serve only to enhance their haggard frowns with the mockery of splendour. I think I should choose to be a topmost dweller, in spite of the climb, for he alone may take his ease in his own roof-garden, among hen-pens and potted vine, with light-winged pigeons to hint of heavenly company and sing him a daily canticle for sprinkled grain.

For a few soldi the tramcar will carry you, in a swirl of dust, to a wave-washed cove where you may breast the billows under a little white citadel perched on the terraced rock. Here the sea has wrought like some fantastic lapidary, studding the half-merged rocks with tooth-like barnacles and a myriad tiny pinnacles of tented shell. They are little havens of faery that feel no rude stress of time or tide; the absorbent fringe of beech-sand shines like shot-silk as the waves withdraw, and the rock pathways are tufted with aloe-trees and palm. Gazing down airy fathoms from the rock-summits, you may see the tanned youth of Genoa crowding the diving-boards, as thick as aphides on a rose-stem.

But yonder, in the great harbour, there is always the stir of brave labour and of a wind that is made an universal ambassador to all the nations of the world, for the giving and taking of tribute. The very Babel of the shipyards is heartening, and the spirit leaps skyward with the corded spires.

WILFRID THORLEY.

THE GENTEEL ARTIST

PERHAPS there was once a day when the artist was a man of toil, capable of vying in industry with the farm labourer and of excelling him in most things else. One likes, for example, to think of those mediæval gilders and carvers and stainers as sitting all day from dawn till dusk by leaded panes in queer old silent houses, plying their tasks with relentless perseverance, careless of the weather and the antics of history. One likes to think of them taking frugal meals beside their work, munching an apple while putting the finishing touches to a gilded devil, holding the tankard with one hand and the brush with the other. One feels sure that when the night came they went to bed with a very pleasant weariness, slept soundly, and did not lie awake wondering how they had managed to fizzle at the eighth green. No doubt their pleasures were simple; and the invention of some slight artistic device was the joy of many weeks. They lived quiet lives and died quiet deaths, leaving behind them arts which we mimic with a vain superficiality. No doubt, like all enthusiasts, they were capable of quarrelling violently over very small details. No doubt they were on occasion careless of their morals, and rather neglected to arrange the universe and to populate Valhalla according to their private moods. They had their faults, being human; but when we turn from them to their successors of these days, how very favourable to them is the comparison! How very garish seem the surroundings of the prosperous ladies and gentlemen who paint our successful pictures and write our successful books; the pleasant people who sit in padded chairs before mahogany writing-tables, wielding gold-banded fountain pens or dictating in a leisurely manner over a choice cigar or cigarette!

There appeared once, in one of those popular articles on contemporary painters which have long been a feature of a certain magazine, the portrait of a gentleman standing elegantly before the easel upon which one of his own creations reposed. A spotless silk handkerchief peeped from his pocket, his cuffs were stiff and white as if they had only just left the haberdasher's, his beard was as trim as an aristocratic shrubbery, the crease in his trousers was perfect, the cut of his coat ideal, the radiance of his shoes all that dreams could desire. He had a negligent air, as of being about to do something interesting with a perfect ease and politeness. A cigarette drooped from the corner of his mouth, and his half-closed eyes seemed more intent upon the floating smoke than on anything else in this transient world. In the background were rich curtains and expensive furniture. Beneath his feet was a thick carpet upon which presumably no spot of paint had ever fallen. And the sum total of one's idea of this gentleman was that he was in no danger of producing a great painting. He might be a charming companion, he was more than well-groomed, and he was very possibly more than usually clever. But the beholder felt quite sure that he was not a great artist. He had never felt the sweet bitterness of the garret, he had never dreamed a day away on a hillside, he had never shuddered at a vision or wept over a fantastic sorrow. Or, if he had, at a simpler age, done any of these things, the experience had left no mark, and had not made him any more cunning in his work,

The story goes, it is true, of one great painter of a past century who always attired himself for his easel as if for a fashionable gathering, in the stiffest of ruffs, the richest of velvet, and the most costly lace. And it is easy to sympathise with his attitude. He looked upon his art as something to be attempted only in a perfect purity of mind and body; he clad himself for his work as the bride for her wedding or the young girl for her first Communion. And if any such sentiment was present in the breasts of our modern genteel artists and writers, one could welcome it and approve. But to them their art is a business or a whim or a side issue of some sort, a thing to do for a couple of hours in the morning before golf, or a couple of hours in the evening before dinner. It would never be permitted to interfere with a social function or a motor-excursion. It would never cause its devotees to miss a meal or to bundle a friend out of the room with a vigorous rudeness. It would never produce exhaustion or the sweat of a terrible toil. Its creators do not weep like Dickens over their imaginary deathbeds nor tremble like Poe at the horror of their own visions. They do not sit for impotent hours over a blank sheet, nor revile all created things because they cannot attain the impossible. So far from being a religion their art is scarce even a profession; it is merely an exercise. They may gather fortunes, but they are never more than dilettanti, and the poorest hack of Grub-street or the most utterly forgotten carver of Ghent is their better.

Art is not the be-all and end-all even of this present life, and it is possible for the artist to take himself and his work far too seriously. One would not have every poet and painter possessed of devils; but surely a touch of fanaticism makes for great achievement. Art has, in these days, real and apparent enemies which it never had in ages of infinitely less widespread culture, and the artist who aspires to the meagrely-rewarded success of true distinction will get through the easier if he be lightly touched with fanaticism. Nothing in a man of character breeds this healthy fanaticism more certainly than a little hardship and want of luxury. Other things being equal, one feels that a great poem is more likely to be written on a deal table than on an article of inlaid rosewood. The genius in the garret may have an uncomfortable time in many ways, but he has one great advantage over his more luxurious rivals—he is compelled to throw himself body and soul into his work. He must live with it entirely. All moods and all hours must contribute their inspiration to it, all sensations of the mind and body must wait upon it, every thought and impression must carve some line, however faint, in its ideal structure. The night spreads her wings about it, all the colours of the sun light it up, all the noises of the city, all the voices of Nature are somehow echoed in it. It lies as close to life as any work of man may lie, and in the result, be it failure or success, it has not lacked attention. The garreteer, whether he eventually dies famous or completely unknown, has been worthy of his craft. But the genteel artist, in his expensive study or studio, smiled upon by electric lights, flattered by costly mirrors, embraced by Russia-leather chairs, can seldom make any such claim. His successes are usually mere tours de force, like juggling with billiard balls, noteworthy only because they amuse and because not everyone can imitate them. He turns out a novel or a painting as neatly and as coldly as the machine turns out the packed ounce of tobacco, and probably in the general scheme of things the three products are of similar value.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN ARBITRATION TREATY

WITH all the welcome relief of the bugle's "Cease fire!" came the announcement last week that the signatures of the British and French Plenipotentiaries at Washington had been affixed, together with those of the President of the United States and his Foreign Secretary, to documents that recorded the high determination of three Great Powers to abstain from the arbitrament of war, and henceforth to "seek peace and ensue it." On the eve of what promises to be one of the bitterest political struggles in the history of the oldest Dominion of the British Empire, at a time when the Mother Country herself is riven with internecine feud, and while the nations of Europe are aching to come to death grips, the news was heard like the note of a silver bell struck amid the ominous murmur of an approaching tempest. Yet only a few days are allowed to pass, and the message of peace, issuing from the Capitol, is translated into a hostile challenge by a Senate trembling with choleric anger at the mere idea that even in the cause of world morality its constitutional prerogatives should undergo the slightest formal modification.

Let us examine the facts as they relate to ourselves. For nearly a century past, ever since peace was established by the Treaty of Ghent, the two English nations have not drawn the sword against each other. It is true that differences have existed, and that these have sometimes occasioned a dangerous friction; but never has diplomacy failed to bring about an amicable settlement. When we take into consideration the fact that the destinies of the two nations have often brought them to the cross-roads of dispute, this record is a remarkable tribute to the spirit of enlightenment which has animated their rulers. Whereas, in regard to English statemanship, this spirit of enlightenment has manifested itself in a consistent but conventional diplomacy, American policy has frequently initiated startling departures from precedent. For example, in the year 1897 there was devised at Washington an instrument, now known as the abortive Olney-Pauncefote Treaty, which provided for the establishment of an International Commission whose office it was to decide and adjudicate upon all matters that might form the subject of international disagreement. But the Senate refused to give its ratification to the Treaty, and for the time being the grandiose purpose of its promoters fell to the ground. But the mantle of Elijah passed from Administration to Administration until, on April 4th, 1908, there was concluded between the two countries an Arbitration Treaty covering the settlement by consent of a variety of thorny questions. It is on this document, inconclusive and incomplete though it was, that the present instrument is framed.

Boldly agreeing to the principle that no possible cause of international complaint should remain outside the jurisdiction of an arbitral tribunal, the High Contracting Parties have determined to submit all questions of difference which it may be found impossible in future to settle by diplomacy. With the object of putting this principle into practice it has been decided to establish a joint High Commission of Inquiry, "to which, upon the request of either party, there shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the parties . . . before such controversy is submitted to arbitration." This Joint Commission is to be constituted by each nation designating three of its nationals to act, and it is further provided that the Commission shall be authorised to examine into and report upon "particular questions or matters referred to it for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts and defining the issues presented in such questions." The essential clause of the document—the clause which embodies the whole principle of compulsory arbitration—stipulates that the question whether an international difference shall be subject to arbitration may be submitted to the Commission, and if all, or all but one, of the members of Commission agree to report that such difference comes within the scope of the Treaty, it shall be referred to arbitration. And here we find the cause of objection upon which a section of the Upper Chamber bases its opposition. It is contended that by delegating such powers to a few individuals, nominees of the President, the traditional and constitutional functions of the Senate would be grievously violated. Moreover, the opponents of the treaty maintain that if similar treaties are concluded with Oriental countries, it would be difficult, if not altogether impossible, to exclude from their operation the vexed and complicated question of Asiatic immigration. Similar complaint is made in regard to the Monroe doctrine.

It is an axiom of world-wide acceptance that the foreign policy of a country, whether that country be governed on monarchical or democratic principles, is best left in the hands of a trusted leader of the State, and no official enjoys a greater freedom from Parliamentary interference than a Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It would seem, therefore, that where questions affecting national interests and national honour are involved, they are much safer left to the consideration and adjustment of a few men of proved administrative ability and of proved integrity, than submitted to a body in which party aims are always coming into conflict. Nothing could have been more unfortunate in the interests of the Treaty than the accidental presence in Washington of Admiral Togo, for it gave the President an opportunity—which he would seem to have improved upon somewhat unnecessarily—of exercising that generous courtesy for which he is famed. At a moment when the signatures to the Treaty were scarcely dry, before even it had been submitted to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, Mr. Taft, eulogising the Japanese monarch as a royal statesman having broad, humanitarian views, saw fit to invite Japan to become a member of the select coterie of nations who have agreed to settle their differences by means of arbitrations. Naturally the opponents in the Upper Chamber whose fundamental objection to the Treaty is, as I have stated, based on constitutional grounds, immediately seized upon the incident as showing additional cause why the principle of compulsory arbitration should not be put into practice. Their argument is specious; but it is extremely doubtful whether they themselves are convinced of its soundness. For it is altogether improbable that the American members of a Commission of Inquiry, such as under the new Treaty it is proposed to institute, would ever consent to submit to arbitration any question relating either to Asiatic immigration or the Monroe Doctrine.

The opposition of the Senate, as expressed by the recommendations of the Foreign Relations Committee, has taken the form of an emasculatory amendment, which robs the Treaty of that vital clause providing for the application of the principle of compulsory arbitration. In this mutilated guise it will never pass into law, for the President has the right, and in such a case would not hesitate to exercise it, to withhold his consent from any International Treaty. But this stiff-necked attitude on the part of a section of the Upper Chamber cannot in the long run prevail against the national will of the great Republic.

MOTORING

ONE of the notable features of the present season has been the rehabilitation of the electric vehicle as the ideal town carriage for fashionable society. The tendency in this direction was most marked at the Coronation, when many of the smart and elegant broughams of the Electromobile Company were to be seen about town with the Royal Arms fitted to them. The occupants of these were guests of the King, by whose command "Electromobiles" were retained for use throughout the festivities. Among the distinguished users of these luxurious carriages during the Coronation period were Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein and Mr. C. P. Taft, brother of the President of the United States, both of whom expressed their entire satisfaction. On Coronation Day some thirty peers and peeresses were driven to the Abbey in "Electromobiles"—a rather interesting fact when one remembers that this is the first Coronation at which mechanically-propelled vehicles have been permitted to be used.

When the Automobile Association announced its intention to purchase 10,000 ruby reflex lights, and present them free of charge to as many individual cyclists as chose to apply for them, the offer was received in many cycling quarters with a certain amount of suspicion. The average cyclist could not understand such apparent generosity on the part of an organisation of motorists whom he has come to regard as his natural enemy, and was disposed to fight shy of acceptance. Probably he thought as the motorist himself thought when the proposal to build special motor-roads had been duly assimilated—namely, that the use of them would become compulsory and lead to further restrictive legislation. Common sense, however, combined with the natural desire to get something for nothing, has prevailed, and we now understand that, although the announcement was only made a month ago, over 10,000 applications for the lights have already been received. The list is therefore now closed, and the lights are being sent out as fast as delivery can be obtained. Care is being taken that the applications are dealt with strictly in the order received, and those applicants whose requests have arrived too late will be notified to that effect.

As a matter of fact the action of the Committee of the A.A. in incurring this considerable expense on behalf of cyclists is not entirely disinterested, nor do they pretend that it is. The members themselves would have a right to protest against the allocation of any portion of their subscriptions for such purely altruistic purposes. The fact is that the non-carrying of a rear light by cyclists after dark constitutes a serious source of inconvenience and danger both to motorist and cyclist; and although the danger more particularly attaches to the latter, the average motorist is not obsessed by any desire to run him down. He is, however, entitled to expect that the cyclist himself shall do something in the direction of self-protection, and when the risk of accident can be so largely minimised by the simple precaution of carrying such a useful and inexpensive device as the ruby disc, there is nothing unreasonable in expecting that this shall be done. The A.A. and M.U. is therefore to be congratulated on the offer and its acceptance. It is to be hoped that it will initiate a better understanding between these two important classes of road-users.

As evidence of the great advances that have been made in motor-car construction during the last year or two, even in vehicles of quite moderate price, the experience of a private owner of a 14-16h.p. Belsize is worth recording. In a communication to a technical contemporary this gentleman states that he purchased his car in the early part of this year, and up to the present has driven it over 7,000 miles. Although without any previous experience in motor-driving, he had only had it three weeks when he did the whole of the Lake District, many of the daily runs ranging from 150 to 200 miles. The roads over which a large portion of the running has taken place include some of the roughest and most hilly in the country. On top gear the driver found the car to have a range of speed of six to forty-five miles per hour, and the petrol consumption to average twenty-three to twenty-four miles to the gallon. Throughout the 7,000 miles he has had no trouble whatever with engine, clutch, or carburettor, or, in fact, with anything in connection with the car, except, of course, the tyres. Altogether, he is so satisfied with his first experience of car-ownership, and with the workmanship of the North-Country firm, that he states his intention of acquiring for next season a six-cylinder car of the same make.

In view of the very considerable saving the motorist can effect by purchasing his lubricants in bulk, it is rather surprising that so many continue to buy it in the small cans. The labour involved in the packing of such small quantities, the cost of the cans, and the expense of distribution combine practically to double the cost of the oil by the time it reaches the consumer. The economical way is to buy the oil in drums or barrels—the latter preferably for those who have plenty of storage room. From a pamphlet entitled "Motor Lubrication," issued by the London Motor Garage Co., of Wardour Street, W., we see that this firm has for many years been supplying its Charron clients with lubricating oil of guaranteed high quality at 2s. per gallon in five-gallon drums, or 1s. 6d. per gallon in casks. This represents a saving of 50 to 76 per cent. on the prices paid when bought by the single gallon.

Whilst something like finality appears to have been reached in the matter of speed so far as the motor-car is concerned, fresh records are continually being established by the mechanically-propelled two-wheeler. On Saturday last, at Celtic Park, Martin beat the world's record for 2½h.p. machines by covering five miles from a standing start in 5min. 30secs. On the same occasion he established fresh Scottish records for one and three miles respectively. "Continental" tyres, which have been so conspicuous in racing successes this season, were used.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

WE have been drenched with misfortune, and the flood of misery still runs strongly. Just as we thought that the Strike in London had ended, the workmen all over the country began fresh agitation. This is not the place to discuss the rights and wrongs of the Labour Party. A capitalist views the matter from one side of the hedge, the workmen from the other. The struggle must go on until the end of time; it is just as much a law of Nature as is the "survival of the fittest." Like many of Nature's laws it is peculiarly disagreeable. The cause of all the trouble is, of course, the extraordinary rise in the cost of living, which has occurred all over the world during the past five years. Wages have risen, but they have not risen in proportion to the advance of the price of commodities. Strikes appear to be the only method yet discovered whereby wages and the cost of living can be brought into agreement. The capitalist naturally views a rise in wages with distrust, for wages once put up are difficult to reduce, and it is much more difficult than it looks to advance the price to the customer. Traders all over the country have been marking up prices for some time past; but an advance in selling prices is regulated by competition. Probably the hot weather is also responsible for much of the unrest. Workmen hesitate to strike in bitter winter weather; they find it better to loaf about idle on a hot summer's day.

The Stock Exchange takes the Labour troubles seriously. Not so much because it is keen upon economics as because the House has been filled with tales of trouble amongst the members. Many lenders of money absolutely refused to advance at the settlement just concluded, and three firms have failed over the account. Yet the fall in Home Rails has not been serious, and except in Americans the differences to be paid are really unimportant. But many firms have been seriously incommoded by the failure of the public to take up new issues. Underwriters are up to their necks in securities they cannot sell and upon which the banks will not lend.

The position has been definitely cleared by the liquidation of the past few months. Stocks that were in weak hands have now gone into the portfolios of the great banking houses, who can and will hold until the market revives. I look forward to a renewed activity in the autumn, for speculation never remains dormant for any extended period, and the multitude of bears in every market makes for great strength.

CONSOLS have been steady, and the Government broker has been buying, presumably for the Post Office. It seems hopeless to expect any help from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Lloyd George was an admirable man in his last post—too good for his colleagues, who with devilish instinct felt that he must fail as Chancellor of the Exchequer. And fail he did. His two Bills, the Old Age Pensions and the Insurance Bill, will cost the country forty millions a year within a few years, and he will go down to posterity as one of the worst Chancellors England has ever had. Yet he might have left a great name had he been in Mr. Winston Churchill's place to-day, for he is a marvellous mediator and peacemaker.

FOREIGNERS have been the steadiest market in the House. This is the one gleam of sunshine in a stormy week. The great Paris banks have been supporting Russians, and the price has actually risen. These big banks are closely connected with the Quai D'Orsay, and they would have sold every Russian bond in their safes if the diplomatists had even hinted at danger. We all know that Germany does not want war, and will not fight until she is ready, but what we did not quite know was the attitude France might adopt. This the market tells us.

HOME RAILS.—The strike trouble is very annoying, both as regards its effect upon trade and its bearing upon the railway companies. A long strike will utterly destroy trade, but a short strike has less effect than people imagine. I think it will be found that the railways will get over their difficulties at less cost than was at first anticipated. I am sure of one thing, that investors have never had such a chance of buying 5 per cent. gilt-edged stocks as they have had this week. North Easterns have actually been purchasable at 128, and the dividend is $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western, and Great Western have all been far too low in price, and must recover. English people, who are of a careful turn of mind, know quite well that you cannot secure a 5 per cent. yield upon any really sound and safe security, and they will therefore take advantage of the slump to buy. All the dealers are short, for the strikes have scared them.

YANKES.—The American market has been slumping steadily under a vigorous attack by important people in Wall Street. The bankers have now tried to stop the selling. They have seen a chance of buying cheap shares, and they have not missed their opportunity. The principal stock to be banged has been Unions. Frick has resigned. The story goes that he tried to force the Board to pay a higher dividend, and resigned in disgust. But I can find no confirmation of this. The Union Pacific melon will have to be cut some day, but not until the Preference shareholders have been settled with. In the meantime, houses like Kuhn, Loeb and Co. always buy Unions when they fall below 175. The traffics have not been good of late, and the actual revenue from their investments has fallen over a million dollars, yet the Union Pacific earns more than 14 per cent. on its common stock. The tales about the bad harvest appear to be exaggerated. But what is not exaggerated is the uneasiness caused by the continued political attacks. The Banking system of the United States is the most atrocious in the world, yet Congress is now examining into the crimes of the so-called "Money Trust." The National, City National, and one or two more banks, are said to manipulate money in the States. But the real trouble is that they cannot manipulate it enough. There are 20,000 Banks in America, and they are managed under laws that literally compel panics.

RUBBER is a shade off colour. The public declines to buy rubber shares at their present prices, and uses a great deal of common sense in the matter. The raw rubber market cannot rise, for the Brazilian Banks hold 8,000 tons, upon which they have lent money, which they cannot sell. We are officially informed that in a few years the Malay will turn out 65,000 tons of rubber in a year! This does not look like a rise in rubber. Yet the Brazilian banks are most confident, and declare that they can finance the new crop and hold the price. If they attempt such mad games they will end in bankruptcy. That is quite clear. I foresee a gradual dwindling away in values until the good shares yield a reasonable return. The Anglo-Dutch, which came out with such a flourish, pay a 3 per cent dividend. But this is more than we expected.

OIL.—Some of the brokers who have been allowing their clients to gamble in oil have been very hard hit, and they have made serious losses. Not only have the quotations been against them, but the market actually dried up, and would take no more shares. Maikop appears to be at its dying gasp, the result of floating without enough working capital. Shell and Spies have also been weak, but seem moderately cheap to-day. But the oil market is quite demoralised, and we may see even lower levels, for with the exception of the Shell, Burmah, and California crowds, none of the other oil people have any money.

KAFFIRS.—The market looks a shade better. But that is all that can be said. Too much importance must not be placed on the closing down of the Jubilee—an old worked-out show, whose shares stand nominally at 5s., or the value of the plant. The July figures are a record, but we must not forget that the gold reserves have been depleted to make this record. The real trouble in the Transvaal is labour. Given ample labour we might even get a four-million output. The magnates now see that the proper policy is to gut the mine as quickly as possible and as profitably also. Stopping widths are being reduced—only rich ore sent to the mill; good labour and machinery are no longer wasted upon 5-dirt rock. We must, therefore, in future take 10 per cent. at least from the life of the mines.

RHODESIANS have been flat. No agreement has been come to amongst the magnates, and Mr. Mabson's startling and really serious article in last week's Statist will have done no good to the market. We all know quite well the facts, but here we get an experienced editor just home from the country pointing out the dangers of the system the Rhodesian magnates have introduced, and telling us that the prospects he has seen will not bear huge capitals. Every one should read the current issue of the Statist. It requires a man of courage to write as Mr. Mabson writes; courage is scarce in the City, and goes unrewarded.

EGYPT.—The weather has changed. The worm has disappeared before the hot, dry winds. The experts say that the crop will hardly show a 10 per cent. decrease. The danger of Boll-worm still exists, and we cannot shout until we are out of the wood, but, given fine, dry weather until the end of September, we should get a crop of seven million cantars. The news is good and every one hopes that it will remain good, for a bad cotton crop would have made Lord Kitchener's task ten times more difficult.

MISCELLANEOUS market has been dull, for many brokers, scenting danger, have closed up weak accounts. Hudson Bays, Cements, Marconis have been feeble. Calico Printers' preference shares seem under-priced, for the report shows a steady increase in trade. Even the ordinary are a reasonable gamble.

CORRESPONDENCE

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The very intelligent and open-minded article on "Spelling Reform" which appears in your issue of August 5th is only one—though a conspicuous one—among many symptoms of the recent spread of enlightenment on this important subject. As there has been no opportunity of submitting the article to the Committee of the Simplified Spelling Society, I cannot write officially in its name; but most of "J. R.'s" views are exactly those expressed in the various publications of the Society. As your correspondent, however, seems to write rather from inward illumination than from a knowledge of what is actually being done towards a solution of the problem, you will perhaps allow me to supplement his article in one or two important particulars.

"J. R." deals ably and, so far as his space allowed, conclusively, with the two stock arguments of conservatism, which may be called the etymological and the æsthetic fallacies. These fallacies are, to all intents and purposes, dead, though their ghosts continue to walk now and then in the newspapers, when some wiseacre is moved to enlighten the world on a matter on which he is entirely ignorant, and as to which he has all the great linguistic authorities, from Max Müller, Professor Skeat, and Sir James Murray downwards, absolutely and emphatically against him. "J. R.," in fact, has arrived at what I venture to call the incontrovertible truth of the matter—namely, that there is no valid defence for our chaotic spelling, and that conservatism would do well to give up the theoretical battle, and simply entrench itself in the assertion of the extreme difficulty of devising any practical and acceptable method of reform.

That is the difficulty—a very real one—which this Society and the American Simplified Spelling Board are now facing with a fixed resolution of overcoming it. A conference of delegates of the two Societies, summoned for that purpose, will meet in London on the 4th of next month. I shall have pleasure in sending you in a few days a list of the members of this Conference. In the meantime, I should like to point out that after several years' study of the problem, and practical efforts in the direction of reform, we are able to take up a definite position on one or two points which "J. R." leaves somewhat in the vague.

None of us, I think it safe to say, are "advocates of a purely phonetic system"—that is, of the adoption of an alphabet including a large number of new characters, and capable of reproducing with scientific accuracy the finest shades of pronunciation. This is neither practically possible nor theoretically desirable. For one thing, such an alphabet could be handled only by trained phoneticians; and though the study of phonetics is spreading very rapidly, we can scarcely look forward to a time when the whole English-speaking world shall have mastered that fascinating science. An accurately phonetic alphabet, then, may be regarded as wholly outside the sphere of practical politics. And here I may note, in parenthesis, one of the few actual errors into which "J. R." is betrayed. He says that the present method of spelling, in contradistinction to a phonetic system, "is capable of expressing not only the sounds of standard English, but also the finest shades and subtleties of local dialect." This is a very curious misconception. A phonetic alphabet which could not express these shades and subtleties would be obviously defective; whereas our present alphabet, in so far as it can express them at all, can do so only by means of a system of conventionally accepted modifications (diagraphs, umlauts, &c.) which render it for the purpose in view phonetic.

On the other hand, practical experience does not bear out "J. R.'s" suggestion that the only plan "at once feasible and desirable" is to "reject forthwith all anomalous spellings which have no archæological foundation, and to adopt in their place the spellings dictated by true etymology." No doubt this is in itself desirable, though the amount of simplification thus effected would be so very slight as to be scarcely worth the trouble involved in even the smallest change. But desirable or no, it is not feasible, for the simple reason that conservatism rebels against the smallest change quite as stubbornly as against the greatest. The objection to any change springs from a purely instinctive sense of discomfort which has no rational basis and cannot be overcome by any process of reasoning. The very people who take their stand on the so-called etymological argument are found in practice to be quite as much opposed to simplifications which correct false etymologies as to those which seem to obscure true ones. Sporadic changes, in short, however scholarly and elegant, awaken just as much wrath as systematic simplification, and have no great practical utility to commend them.

What, it may be asked, do I mean by "systematic simplification," if a scientific phonetic alphabet be ruled out? I mean a system which, utilising the letters of the existing alphabet (possibly with the aid of diacritical marks, though to this I am personally opposed) shall assign to each sound its characteristic symbol (single letter or digraph), and shall possess almost all the merits, with none of the disadvantages, of a phonetic alphabet. It is no easy matter to devise such a system, but we have made a certain advance towards solving the problem, and we have very good hopes of shortly arriving at a complete, practical, and eventually acceptable solution. "Eventually acceptable," I say, for we are far from imagining that it will be received with jubilation, and instantly adopted by the whole English-speaking world. But we are not without our plans for the work of propaganda; and if, as we believe, we can put forward a system which any intelligent man can master in half an hour, which will shorten by a whole year (on an average) the time which children have now to expend on learning to spell, and which will make the acquisition of English (both spoken and written) incomparably easier to the foreigner, we are confident that the practical sense of the nation and the English-speaking world will not be slow in rallying to our side. It is very probable, as "J. R." suggests, that the literary class will be the last to follow suit. But the literary class, fortunately, will have no power to stand up against a reform which will, we believe, commend itself to reasonable men as a substantial benefaction to all future generations of English-speaking people.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

WILLIAM ARCHER, Secretary.

JUSTICE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you allow me to utter a protest against the sweeping denunciations re the strike?

The chief trouble of the writer "W. L. R." appears to be the inconvenience caused through the strike. But that is beside the point. The public would not mind a little inconvenience if thereby the strikers obtained a living wage. With the strikers it is either to continue to live under their present conditions or of bettering their conditions.

"W. L. R." states that agitators have persuaded workmen who earn a "comfortable wage" to come out on strike—not for their own benefit, but in sympathy with the strikers, I suppose he means. But in the present strike can he give a single instance of any one section of the strikers who are earning a "comfortable wage"? I am sure he will fail.

Previous to the awards did the seamen, the stevedore, the dockers, the coalie, or the carmen get a "comfortable wage"? Is it a "fancied grievance" on their part?

They could not arrange their grievances with "a little common sense" unless the common sense of the masters went to the length of granting them a living wage.

He also bewails the fact that the "old and mutually profitable relationship between employers and employees is practically at an end." But, surely, if that ever existed, it died at the birth of the limited liability companies. Pleasant and profitable indeed—to whom? Not the employee. Which reminds me. During the Coronation festivities a large firm were very anxious to deliver their goods in time for the holidays. They promised their employees a present for the extra work—in some cases day and night. They got the work done well to time. Now for the present. A number of these men were discharged last week owing to slackness: that was their present.

If only employers would pay their workmen a living wage there would not be any question of unpleasantness between master and man. Treat them as living men, not machines. The days of the Thomas Pinch class of workmen have long since passed away.

He is also very wroth with Mr. Churchill in not taking more drastic action. Calling out the soldiers, I suppose. Mr. Churchill did right in not doing so. London is neither Tony-pandy nor Cardiff. Call out the soldiers, and that would be the spark which would set the whole capital into a revolution, the consequences of which are too awful to contemplate. Finally, he condemns the men for attempting to improve their conditions. Yes, how dare they grumble at their lot! They have good wages, houses, food, and clothes, and plenty of time to enjoy the fruits of their labour.

But, unfortunately, they do not think so; hence the strike to improve those conditions. And—they have been successful. I fail to see how "his last state is bound to be worse than the first." At any rate, by the success of this strike the workers now know that it is by organised effort alone that any success can be obtained, and they are not likely to forget it. Their strength lies in labour, and labour only. "Omni Vincit Labor."

I was very sorry to see such an obviously one-sided article in THE ACADEMY. The whole Press have admitted that the men's claims are just. They disagree as to the strikers' methods, that is all. I trust the next time he writes upon labour troubles he will descend to realities and write of things as they are and not from the lofty heights of an academic point of view.—I remain, yours sincerely,

VIVIAN C. CROWTHER.

August 12, 1911.

P.S.—But perhaps it is "W. L. R." who is "coddled."

[We shall be pleased to hear other opinions on this important subject, and will reply to them in due course.—ED. THE ACADEMY.]

AN INTOLERABLE MISCREANCY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The case for the "No Surrender" peers has been put strongly by several writers, but by no writer quite strongly enough. The fact is, we are in the midst of two revolutions—one inherent in the Parliament Bill, and the other in the astounding employment of a supposititious prerogative of the Crown—the latter the graver revolution of the two. Hence, apart from the acceptance of the Veto Bill, the supreme point of the present crisis is this—that if that exercise of the prerogative is submitted to and acquiesced in, the reign of freedom in this country may be said to be over. What is the formula that has hitherto been presented at our heads? It is the formula that the Crown has power to create peers to end a deadlock between the two Houses. There has been no deadlock between the two Houses. Hence the formula has been amended to the remarkable dictum that the Crown has power to prevent an anticipated deadlock before it has arrived.

The formula as amended confers immeasurable powers upon the Throne, which are best illustrated by the almost gratuitous ease with which the formula has been applied upon this occasion. It might have been thought that at least the crisis might have been allowed to come to a head—that the impasse might have been an accomplished fact. But Mr. Asquith might first even have resigned before this tremendous expedient was resorted to, if only to satisfy the formal preliminaries of a gigantic new departure, if only to bring home to the general public that there was a genuine impossibility of solving the situation without some abnormal intervention. It might also have been thought that only an utterly irreconcilable attitude on the part of the House of Lords could have redeemed such a coercion, and that the indecent haste wherewith the whole of this unspeakably grave matter has been rushed in less than two years would have received no recognition from above.

However, the formula being now widely accepted (and among others accepted by Lord Lansdowne), it bears with it certain retrospective and prospective deductions.

Retrospectively it means this: That all the time we were congratulating ourselves on the possession of the House of Lords as part of the bedrock of our Constitution and as its impregnable bulwark, it never rested on any more stable basis than this—that any Radical leader coming into office had only to bring in a Bill for its abolition to call on the Crown to create Peers to overwhelm it, and there was an end of its existence. So that the House of Lords, so far from being founded upon a rock, was not even founded upon sand—it was founded upon straw. This is the grotesque conclusion the acceptance of the formula entails. This conclusion Lord Lansdowne is bound to accept, and yet, convinced as he therefore must have been in his own mind that the House of Lords hung upon air, he nevertheless impelled it in 1909 to the violently provocative act of throwing out the Budget.

So far retrospectively; but prospectively it is obvious that this weapon of the Crown, hitherto dimly outlined in the background as a possible hardly acknowledged expedient to be exercised perhaps once in two centuries to bridge some hopeless gulf of difference between the two parties, after all the possibilities of a protracted struggle had been exhausted, has now been resorted to in the face of no such obtusity of conditions and no such interval of contention. Hence it has now taken its place in the recognised everyday armoury of any subversive ministry and confined to the side of subversion, for amid all the unctuous homilies on the right of their case our opponents never tire of expounding, one conjures up the wild outbreak of fury and abuse that would have been expended on the Crown if the Tory party for its own ends had revived any similar submerged mediæval implement. As it is, by its aid the miserable residuum of phantom inefficacy still left to the House of Lords can at any moment be shorn away, and there is no single one of our cherished institutions the life of which is, from an insurance point of view, worth six months' purchase.

"STATE INSURANCE FROM THE WORKMAN'S POINT OF VIEW"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have just read your article as above, which I approve.

The strange thing to me is that no one has taken up the case of the Domestic Servant's Insurance. The amount demanded is far more than any probable outlay on sickness could possibly come to, and to handicap a poor girl getting £12, say, a year with so much to pay seems very hard.

Can you explain why no one has referred to it in Parliament? I presume it is because as a class they have no one to interest themselves. Can you do anything?—Yours truly,

R. EDWARDS.

SIR,—Mr. Frank Harris's article on Fabre is interesting, but he is scarcely correct in saying that the scientist "was only discovered by the wise men in Paris the other day." Fabre was elected a correspondent of the French Academy of Sciences in 1887—seventeen years before Metchnikoff and twenty-three years before Lord Avebury, who are both in the same section (Anatomy and Zoology) as Fabre.—I am, &c.,

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE discussion of the conditions of the railway strike settlement in Parliament on Tuesday evening last was the occasion of some exceptionally straight talking. Much to the surprise of the Labour Party, there are limits to the foolhardiness of a Socialistically-inclined Government, and we can imagine that the Government, on its part, has been equally astonished—has had its eyes opened, in fact—by the virulent and utter nonsense which these precious "Labour Leaders" have emitted. "You have no right, in order to prevent a few shop-windows from being smashed," said Mr. Keir Hardie, "to run the risk of shooting scores of innocent people. . . . Men have been shot down, murdered by the Government in the interest of the capitalist system." Much more topsy-turvy logic to the same effect was vented by the same splenetic lips; the law had been violated, the railway companies favoured, &c. &c.; and finally, the prophet in Mr. Hardie arose, and said that in the event of another strike and the use of troops, "not only the railwaymen but practically every organised trade in Great Britain will stop work until your soldiers are back to barracks." For once Mr. Lloyd George kept his head; he demanded an explanation, and receiving mere subterfuges, gave the member for Merthyr a dressing down which he will not forget in a hurry; "contemptible," "one-sided," "grossly inaccurate" were the terms he used—and used rightly—when dealing with his whipped opponent; and again, referring to Mr. Hardie's attempt to wriggle free, "there is no word," he said, "within the category of parliamentary language which can describe it." We see here signs of hope. When the Labour Party and the Socialist Government, theoretically and formerly arm-in-arm and wreathed with complacent smiles, take to snarling at each other, the critics—whatever be their political complexion—may well stand aside and exchange significant nods, remembering, perchance, certain wise words concerning "a house divided against itself."

The sensation caused in art circles by the report on Tuesday last that Leonardo da Vinci's world-famous masterpiece, "La Gioconda," had been stolen from the Louvre, was slightly lessened by the Paris correspondent of the Pall-Mall Gazette, who wrote to the effect that quite possibly the picture had been "removed" as a piece of newspaper enterprise. The art treasures of France seem to be very inadequately guarded, and if general attention is called to the lack of watchfulness on the part of those responsible for the safe keeping of such invaluable possessions some good may be done, although the purloining of a da Vinci, even though it be but temporary, appears to be a rather drastic method of advocating reform. Imagine the fate of the enthusiast who should be caught pocketing, as it were, our "Venus" of Velazquez, or hiding the gems of the Tate Gallery as a means of protesting against their scanty protection! He would have short shrift, whether he were a newspaper sensationalist or not. By the time these words are printed the vanished painting may have found its way back while the custodians of the Louvre are napping, and in any case we imagine that, however artfully or artlessly one of our own national pictures might be abstracted and concealed, it would be a very difficult matter to get past the inquisitive glare—and the muscular grip—of the distantly polite, blue-clad gentlemen who lean over the turnstiles of the building in Trafalgar-square.

The Wednesday Review of India for July 26th contains a comprehensive and thoughtful article by the Hon. Pandit Malaviya, B.A., LL.B., on "The Hindu University of Benares: Why it is wanted and what it aims at." The proposal to form such a centre dates back to 1904, and the scheme has been discussed year after year ever since, until in 1910, when an organised endeavour seemed within sight, the death of King Edward VII. caused another postponement. As a residential and teaching University, contrasted with the five "examining Universities" at present in existence, seems distinctly necessary, the project is meeting with strong support, and it is to be hoped that the difficulties of language and varying vernaculars will be judiciously overcome. Another Indian Review which reaches us, The Parsi, has in its issue for July 30th a good unsigned contribution dealing with the labour problem in India, and a two-column review of Walter Headlam's translation of the "Agamemnon." In the previous number an essay on "The Pleasures of Pessimism" easily takes the literary honours, although it is difficult to agree with all the writer's statements—such as the assertion that "cheerfulness is not a state of mind that has any relation to contentment," or his suggestion that "the most pessimistic sayings we have are frequently the most cheerful." As a piece of special pleading, however, for pessimism as a "genial and mellow art" the article is very pretty. A lengthy essay on Thackeray is interesting, but as it is a reproduction from the Times Literary Supplement, the report of the Calcutta "Thackeray Centenary Dinner" which introduces it is the only part which is new to us. The photographs of the Coronation in this issue are excellently reproduced.

WHEN TIME NODS

Now is the hour when Summer's siren song
 Woos helpless homage to her perfumed sway ;
 When tired Time ceases from his anvil-play,
 And lays him down awhile to dream among
 The nodding flowers, till shrewd Fate comes along
 On tireless feet, and hastens him away
 To forge the chains that fettered yesterday,
 And for to-morrow's hopes will prove too strong.

Yet grant him but this hour, and in its space
 Himself shall minister his wrong's repair ;
 For when, long hence, he vaunts his tyrannies,
 His mocking slaves shall twit him to his face
 That once he lay among the poppies there,
 Threading their bonds with dreamland memories.

ASPIRATION

Thou art so near to God that I must be Near unto Him if I am near to thee.

Thou art so pure, this sin-stained life of mine,
 Touched by thine own, must needs become divine.

Thou art so true, the faithlessness of men
 Fades from my heart, and earth grows good again.

So sweet, so pure, so true thy life doth shine ;
 Thou art so wonderful—and thou art mine.

BERWICK SAYERS.

DUCE TEMPUS EGET

UNFORTUNATELY there is at the present moment an absolute lack of leaders in the two great political parties. In these days at least no man can be a political leader who is devoid of magnetism. The thesis was no doubt true of former epochs, but it did not attract attention to itself, because on both sides such a man has never hitherto been wanting, and indeed many alternative men have been available for choice. Now it is otherwise. On the Opposition benches are able Parliamentarians, and effective platform speakers, but not a single individuality who appeals forcibly to the public imagination. The man in the street, in whom political power now resides, is mildly amused by their permutations and combinations, but it never strikes him that the Opposition front bench man is essentially removed from the ordinary top-hatted gentleman of amiable manners who can be met in early June in Bond-street or the Row. This gentleman can, it is true, simulate a certain amount of political activity and make speeches which occasionally arouse lethargic applause or ripples of anæmic laughter. What of the Government ?

On the Government benches there is only one man who really impresses the people and compels their admiration. That man is of course Mr. Lloyd George. The very circumstance that he arouses passionate condemnation or cordial approval is a sure tribute to the position which he has earned for himself. He is a leader, and a leader of the people, and yet it would be exceeding the bounds of truth to suggest that he is a trusted leader. He compels allegiance, but he does not inspire confidence. How can he do so ? His record is too fresh in remembrance, it is not hallowed by memories, or mellowed by proofs of principle. No man can with certainty predict from day to day on which side of a controversy the Chancellor will range himself. The element of uncertainty no doubt gives birth to interest, but it throws grave suspicion upon character. Could Mr. Lloyd George have emerged from oblivion fully equipped with his present powers and have been discovered seated on the Opposition benches, the Tory party need not have looked further for a leader.

The recent industrial upheaval and civil commotion have emphasised the hurt to the State when leaders of commanding influence, of magnetism and of established character are wanting. Ministers who had been in the habit of using inflammatory and irresponsible language in the belief that they were committing no greater crime than unduly influencing votes, suddenly found themselves confronted with the fruits of their teaching. The irony of fate exacted a rapid retribution. Mr. Churchill, who had flouted the authority of the Courts, and has done his utmost to bring law and order into disrepute, suddenly found himself in the position of being forced to champion that which he had derided and defamed. The Chancellor who, as electioneerer, had descended to adulation of the mob, and slander of all the responsible classes, stood aghast when the creation of his doctrine faced him in thunderous actuality. Hesitation was inevitable ; both Ministers were appalled by the embodiment of the spectres they had invoked. To their credit, both rallied, and both discharged their obvious duties in the midst of crisis.

Mistaken praise has however been awarded to these Ministers, and especially to Mr. Lloyd George in connection with the collapse of the Railway Strike. Both it is true, showed commendable resolution, and Mr. Lloyd George useful—if feverish—activity. The Strike however collapsed, because Mr. Thomas, Mr. Williams and others who blazoned themselves forth as leaders, found themselves woefully short of followers. The London and South Western men, to their lasting credit, refused solidarity with men who had been hurried into an illegal strike. They announced that the terms of their employment were fair, and their employers just ; they were loyal to their work, loyal to the industrial and commercial welfare of their country, and to their duty to the needs of the populations which their system serves—directly or indirectly. Other Southern lines adopted in a modified form a policy of resistance to the worthy Mr. Thomas and important Mr. Williams.

Mr. Philip Snowden, writing in a weighty and temperate tone in the Christian Commonwealth, lifts the veil :—

I do not know what motives induced the men's leaders to accept the terms of settlement, whether it was because they were afraid that they would not be able to carry on the strike successfully.

The railway men themselves brought the strike to a close when they let it be seen that the boastings and vapourings of loud-mouthed agitators left them serene and impervious to pressure, which they detested. If there were leaders—the leaders were the railway men themselves who stood steadfast in justice and in fair play. Do not let us be deluded that the result was due to a leader—and that leader—Mr. Lloyd George.

CECIL COWPER.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE "CURE" HUMBUG—I.

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

THE disgusting, vulgar, but nevertheless common habits of over-eating and over-drinking cannot be defended on hygienic grounds, but they undoubtedly play a very important part in the development of wealth and prosperity throughout all classes of the community. It would be extremely difficult in one short article to trace all the ramifications by which over-indulgence in the good things of life disseminates money through every civilised community, and therefore I propose to restrict myself to one phase of this good which cometh out of evil, and to show that a rebellious and dyspeptic interior is the greatest of all pioneer forces in the exploitation of new lands, new sources of wealth. The month of August is sacred to the god of Cure. We read in the history of Rome, and also of Greece, of eminent men, Emperors, statesmen, and the wealthy, hastening during the hot season to obtain the benefit of Sulphur Springs, and to drink the waters which were known even to the medical science of those days to be valuable antidotes to the devastations of excess. Up to quite recent times only the favoured few had it in their power to effect a cure. But now all is changed; the stomach has become very democratic, like the rest of the world, and the middle and lower classes have just awoken to the fact that they also have as much right to "cures" as they have to vote in common with their superiors who tried so long to withhold this great privilege. All classes now devote the month of August to recuperating from the effects of the debauches of the previous eleven months. The King goes to a cure; the nobility and the rich go to cures; the middle classes hasten away to the less fashionable resorts on the Continent or risk the deadly ennui of casinoless Harrogate; the miner in the North hastens to Blackpool or to another of Lancashire's thriving seaside towns to disport himself in the briny and to forget for a season his disagreeable labours underground.

Now this great movement means money spent all round. The railways profit by it; so also do the steamships; the hotels make fortunes and so do the shops, and the thousand-and-one individuals who cater for the needs and requirements of the traveller at home and abroad. The discovery of a goldmine is not of greater value at the present day than the discovery of a bubbling spring possessing a disagreeable odour and a still more disagreeable taste. The diviner and his rod search Europe for such sickly streams, and once a source has been discovered the path of the promoter is clear. Firstly, he must build a little hotel, and by careful advertising attract a few wandering couples to his hostelry. He must pay his visitors the most careful attention, and make them feel that they are not mere ciphers but welcome guests. One day he must suggest that they should try a drink out of the little spring, which comes bubbling so naturally from the soil, and at the same time he should add a few words, in an offhand manner, on the wonderful curative qualities it possesses. They try it; they dislike it sufficiently to feel it must be good for them. The foundation-stone of success has been laid, the "Cure" has been started, and once set rolling, it sweeps all before it like an avalanche tearing down a mountain-side. The few honeymoon couples or lonely writers who visited the "new cure" the first year pass on their way, carrying with them the happiest recollections and promising to return the next summer. They spread the news among their friends and acquaintances: "How cheap it is!" "How wonderful the waters are!" "What a nice manager!" "What beautiful excursions in the neighbourhood!" are a few of the panegyrics they utter.

Meanwhile, the proprietor has not been idle. He must get into touch with the medical profession. He hastens to Paris or to London with samples of the water from his "source." He offers the doctor an interest in the concern. The samples of the water analysed under such conditions show the most remarkable salubrious qualities. From henceforth every patient is recommended a "cure" at this "new and hitherto unknown resort." Hundreds hasten to the spot. The proprietor cannot meet the rush. He hires any old buildings which can possibly be made habitable, and houses his guests as best he may. He promises others that the following year they will find several new hotels, with every luxury and convenience. Meanwhile his clientèle drink the waters and are well satisfied, but many complain that they would also like to undergo a course of baths, for which there are at present no facilities, and also that the evenings hang rather heavily on their hands. The proprietor chuckles, apologises, and promises further reforms for the following year. A sturdy Anglo-Saxon declares a golf-course to be essential. The proprietor scours the surrounding country for a suitable site. One is quickly selected; Braid, Vardon, or Massey is telegraphed for and lays it out; all through the winter gangs of peasants earn good wages digging bunkers, laying down fresh turf, and diverting streams. The second season passes. Humbugbad has become still better known. Immediately his duties release him the proprietor hastens to Paris. He sees men well known in finance, and lays his schemes before them. They are quickly examined, and still more quickly approved. A company is formed. A huge hotel is designed, and work commences at once. Several smaller hotels are also set in hand. A beautiful casino is next constructed, with a café, a dancing-hall, a roulette-room, and a little inner sanctuary of sanctuaries, where it is the hope and nightly prayer of the proprietor and promoters that they may one day see "baccarat" and "chemin de fer" being played.

The Minister of the Interior is now approached. His friends are liberally supplied with shares in the new concern. At first he is adamant, declares he does not approve of the extension of gambling, and avers that enough such resorts, if not too many, are already licensed in France. The promoters do not despair. The Minister of the Interior finds that whenever he goes out for a night in society one of his best friends always mentions the wonderful salubrious qualities of the waters of Humbugbad. All his lady-friends apparently have shares in it, and they all impress the fact upon him that only a licence to gamble is needed to ensure its success. The Minister is again officially approached. This time he yields; the licence is granted and the success of Humbugbad is assured. During the third summer thousands flock to the "Cure." The big hotel which has cost so much to lay out has already paid a big dividend on the borrowed money. The wonderful baths—the very latest thing in up-to-date cleanliness and comfort—are full morning and afternoon. The little

"source" which formerly flowed so naturally and gracefully from Mother Earth has been trapped, and over its head a marble pavilion now rises, while its taps are handled by attractive little actresses, who, with marvellous dexterity, fill and hand cup after cup of precious water from this life-restoring fount. The Casino has turned out an enormous success. Thousands wander round the band, which discourses sweet music of all countries impartially. The roulette-room is filled afternoon and night, and every evening the crowd which gathers in the "Club Privée" round the baccarat-tables increases in size. The one table has given place to two, the two to three, and finally the three to four, and thousands of pounds change hands nightly.

FLAUBERT AND HIS LETTERS—II.

BY FRANK HARRIS

THERE are five volumes of Flaubert's letters. The first letter was written on the 31st of December, 1830, when Flaubert was only nine years of age. In this letter—full of misspellings—the child talks of writing comedies and dreams. At thirteen or fourteen he declares his hatred of grocermen and traders, who think of nothing but making money and living comfortably; the heart of them, he says, oscillating between the two poles of shop and stomach. At fifteen, hearing that a dramatic censorship was to be established, and the liberty of the Press in so far curtailed, he cries against the institution as an outrage on the conscience of men of letters; but never mind, he goes on, "let us devote ourselves to our art, which is greater than peoples, greater than censors, greater than kings. . . ." And as he was at ten and at fifteen he was at forty and sixty—his heart given to letters and to nothing else. I can recall no similar instance of life-long devotion to literature!

A large part of this first volume is taken up with descriptions of his travels in Egypt and the Near East when he was twenty-eight. The impression made upon him by the desert bore fruit later in "Salammbô." But after this first volume the rest of his life—from 1850 to 1880—is practically without incident, other than the ordinary incidents of a literary life. And yet these volumes have a movement of their own and his life a crescendo of interest which is simply fascinating to a student of the spirit. There is in them a steady development of feeling and intelligence, a growth of mind and heart which is extraordinary.

Flaubert had the root of the matter in him very early. At thirty-two we find him writing to Madame X. about style. "Boileau and Hugo have got it," he says, "whereas Voltaire and Chateaubriand are only mediocrities, and Lamartine worthless. Style," he adds, "is the very heart's blood of thought; none of the schools know anything about it; professors are only imbecile pedants who parrot what they have learned—for they have no love in them, and love is the secret of the soul, without which one can understand nothing."

In this same letter he remarks that he has been reading a fragment of Michelet which pleases him. In it there is a satisfactory judgment on Robespierre. "This man," says Michelet, was "in himself a government, and for that reason all persons with the governing faculty in them love him."

Flaubert continues: "It is true; mediocrity loves order and rule; I hate it, I am against it, against all restrictions, against every caste, every hierarchy, every corporation, and against the dead level, too, and the sheep virtues—my very soul is filled with hatred of them all, a hatred that enables me to understand the martyr spirit."

And here is another side of him. He tells Madame X that he has been four hours without writing a phrase, or rather that he has written a hundred and blotted them all out. "The hardest thing in the world," he cries, "is to describe a common situation and to render perfectly an ordinary trivial conversation. For an artist it is diabolically difficult to give a picture of mediocrity."

I turn, in their order, to these newly published letters of Flaubert to a Mdlle. Bosquet, for they are all written between 1854 and 1869, from the time he was thirty-two till he was forty-eight. Mdlle. Bosquet was evidently one of the Madame Bovarys of his life, a sort of provincial muse, who wrote novels that were not too bad so long as she lived near Flaubert, but as soon as she went to Paris all talent is lost in pretence and literary snobbishness.

These letters to Mdlle. Bosquet stop short of passion, and therefore throw no new light on Flaubert's temperament; yet they are tender, and because of their tenderness they prevent Flaubert from letting himself go, and are therefore not illuminating.

I prefer to take up the two old volumes of letters which cover the period from 1854 to 1880, the last year of his life. With all their faults—and Flaubert was rather proud of his whimsies and humours—they are the most interesting letters I know, for they are full of literary talk, and Flaubert as a critic of literature is among the very greatest, ranking with Goethe and Coleridge, far above Sainte-Beuve and the best of those who make criticism a profession. The difference between Flaubert and Sainte-Beuve is that Sainte-Beuve praises all the mediocrities and underrates all the great creative spirits of his time—Balzac, Hugo, Baudelaire, and Flaubert himself; whereas Flaubert treats mediocrities with a becoming irreverence, while picking out and praising every man of talent of his time with the inevitable surety of kinship.

The list of those he was among the first to honour affords sufficient proof of his generosity. Of course he saw Victor Hugo and Georges Sand fairly from the beginning; he admired Hugo's "La Légende des Siècles" enthusiastically; but could not pretend to like "Les Misérables;" Georges Sand, on the other hand, he praises continually, though one feels a certain discrimination in spite of his fear of hurting his chère bon maître. But Renan, Gautier, Tourguénief, Daudet, Zola, Guy de Maupassant, Jules Lemaitre, the Goncourts—all the masters he recognised at once and hailed as stars, and his words about them now, after forty years, stand as if cut in marble. He writes to Renan describing the "enthusiasm" he felt on reading his "Prayer on the Acropolis." He has read it over and over again, he says, till he almost knows it by heart, and he concludes: "I don't believe there's a more beautiful page in all French literature."

Here recommends all his friends to read Tourguénief's "Virgin Soil," and calls the "Abandonnée" a masterpiece—"Tourguénief? Voilà un homme!" Zola, too, he champions again and again; "parts of 'L'Assommoir,'" he declares, "are magnificent; a great, broad river of narration full of fine things: Zola is a lusty fellow, who'll go far."

In 1880 he read "Nana" and wrote to Zola praising it: the end of the book, he asserts, is grandiose, worthy of Michelangelo. A lady friend writes to him that "'Nana' is dirty." "Read the 'Divorce' of Dumas," he answers, "that is common if you like and ignoble. 'Nana' has marvellous things in it and the end is a great epic. Zola's work is colossal. The giant may have dirty feet; but who cares?" I call this masterly criticism.

Flaubert praises Daudet's "Jack" and Maupassant's "Boule de Suif"—sentiment and sensuality—with the same unerring certitude. Jules Lemaitre pays him a visit, and he at once recommends him and finds a perfect word for him, "Un vrai lettré."

Some one has said that there is no such proof of mediocrity as continual moderation in praise. I have just bathed myself in this enthusiasm of Flaubert, as in a warm and perfumed bath. Yet of course his critical judgment has its limitations:—

I have just been reading the correspondence of Balzac (he writes). He was a fine fellow, and one could have loved him, but how obsessed he was with the thought of money, and how small was his love of art! He never speaks of art, never once. He longs for fame, but not for the beautiful. Then he was a Catholic, a legitimist, a landed proprietor, and he would like to have been a Member of the Chamber and of the Academy: it is his ignorance which appals me; he was provincial to the marrow of his bones; he even admires riches and luxury and Walter Scott. He was assuredly a big man, a prodigious fellow, but not in the first class, I think.

In spite of all his shortcomings Balzac is not only in the first class, but perhaps the only Frenchman to be found in it.

Flaubert is a very severe critic of his own work. In a letter to M. Pichat of the Revue de Paris, who is publishing "Madame Bovary," and who asks for permission to cut out this and that page, Flaubert replies: "Not one word more. What you have already cut has only hurt the book and impoverished it. . . . The brutal element in 'Madame Bovary' is in the conception and not on the surface, and no alteration of this or that passage will white-wash the negro."

It is his artistic conscience I admire in Flaubert. Whether he likes people or dislikes them, he will say the truth about them as he sees it. He puts in the shadows as well as the lights. He loves Gautier, thinks him a great poet, forces him down the throat of Zola and Tourguénief, tells them they know nothing of French literature if they don't see the beauty of Gautier's prose, yet he has to add that Gautier was broken-hearted because he was not admitted to the Academy. Flaubert thunders against this modesty; "we all need more self-esteem," is his comment.

Flaubert is intensely interesting to me because he was the first to grasp and understand the new priesthood of art. He wrote to Maupassant in 1876, "Those who are called to be artists, and who take up the high career have no right to live like other men. The artist's first vow must be poverty, or at least the resolve not to write for money. He must forego all reward, even praise and honour. As he rises higher and higher he will be hated more and more, and will inevitably become more and more lonely. His life must be a life of self-denying labour; his work demands a martyr's self-sacrifice."

I love him because he is conscious of his high mission as a creator, and lives up to his belief. Even when he is mistaken his mistakes are honest. "No, no," he writes to Ernest Feydeau, "you must never use common locutions, ready-made phrases (phrases toutes faites). I would be skinned alive rather than use them. The weak pages of your book should be better written than any of the others." This is his way of saying what Keats said to Shelley, "Fill all the rifts with gold." Flaubert's hatred of ready-made phrases is excessive. When an artist is depicting ordinary men and women he should put nothing but ready-made phrases into their mouths. Flaubert's hatred of common tags of speech limited his palette. But listen to him when he writes about art; the words deserve to be relieved out in letters of pure gold over the lintel of every school of art in the world. "The hands of the artist," he says, "must be white and calm; he must know nothing of base concessions;" and again, "The artist must be on strain constantly to bring himself into closer intimacy with God. He must divest himself of all hope of reward, of every shade of personal interest, determined merely to become greater and wiser, to love more strongly, to feel more intensely, to understand more completely."

On the eve of his death Socrates begged some musician or other to teach him an air on the lyre.

"What good will it be to you," questioned the musician, "since you are going to die so soon?"

"To know it before dying," replied Socrates.

"One of the noblest moralities ever uttered," cries Flaubert. "I would rather have written that than have taken a city." Heine and Flaubert are to me the two high priests of modern art; their effigies stand side by side in the porch of the Temple.

STATE INSURANCE IN GERMANY—I.

GERMAN State insurance, which, as a compulsory institution, dates back to 1884, has been gradually extended so as to include provision against accidents, invalidity, and old age. The whole legislation on the subject has been consolidated into the law of 1911. Though important modifications were introduced by this recent legislation, any attempt to describe exhaustively the system would prove not only wearisome to the reader, but difficult of accomplishment. I propose, therefore, to give a short account of the system in two of its three branches, confining myself to questions which arise both in Germany and here under our proposed system of insurance.

SICK INSURANCE.

The new law, which for the first time embraces agricultural labourers, foresters, small employers, casual labourers, &c., may be said to be of universal application to persons having an income not exceeding £100 per annum. The sick insurance is organised into various kinds of clubs. These include (1) Local, (2) Factory, (3) Country (Landeskrankenkassen), (4) Guild, (5) Mining, (6) Admitted Friendly Societies. These clubs will not in future be permitted to compete with one another (as was the case hitherto), and a minimum standard of membership will thus be assured. This minimum membership is 250 for local and country and 150 for factory clubs. Should this membership not be attained, after due delay the club having the deficiency will be merged in a larger body. It is hoped that the disappearance of the smaller and weaker organisations will ensure the prosperity, influence, and efficiency of the larger bodies. The Friendly Societies may act as sick clubs if their membership exceeds 1,000. They are entitled to refuse admission to candidates on account of age or ill-health. For the first time, employers are compelled to pay their share (one-third) of contributions to the Society. The absence of this provision gave a preference in obtaining employment to members of these Societies, as their employer, of course, avoided all sick insurance contributions.

Benefits are of two kinds—minimum and additional.

The minimum benefits include:—

1. Sick benefit from the third day's illness if the patient is incapable of earning (for a maximum period of twenty-six weeks).
2. Medical benefit, medicine, and the use of appliances.
3. Maternity allowance for a period of eight weeks, granted to every woman member of six months' standing.

4. Burial money equal in amount to twenty times the deceased's daily wages.

5. Free keep and treatment in hospital in lieu of medical and sick benefit: in this case the dependents, if any, of the patient receive half this sick pay as maintenance allowance.

The sick and maternity benefits amount to half the average daily wage of that class of insured persons for whom the club is formed, but such wage must in no case be reckoned as exceeding 5s. per diem. The club statutes can, however, graduate the average pay according to different rates up to 6s. per diem, and can fix the real earnings of the individual at 6s. per diem.

The additional benefits are numerous. They include:—

1. Grant of sick benefit for the first three days.
2. Grant of sick benefit for Sundays and holidays and free medical benefit for the family of the insured man.
3. Grant of pocket-money to a patient in hospital to a maximum amount of one-quarter of his pay (half such pay if unmarried) and an increased maintenance allowance to his dependents of one-half his daily pay.
4. Increase of the sick benefit to three-quarters of the patient's pay and of the burial money to forty times the daily pay, or to a minimum of £2 10s.
5. Use of further appliances.
6. Grant of half burial money on the death of wife or child of the insured person.
7. A pregnancy allowance for six weeks, medical attendance during pregnancy, and the services of a midwife to a female member of six months' standing.
8. Grant of the same benefits to the wife of an insured member.
9. Treatment in a convalescent home for a maximum period of one year from the termination of the patient's illness.
10. A grant of money up to a fixed maximum towards the purchase of appliances.
11. Provision of sick diet.
12. A grant to mothers nursing their children of a nursing allowance equal to half the sick benefit for a maximum period of twelve weeks.

The funds of the sick clubs are provided by masters and men in the proportion of one and two thirds respectively. The amount of the employee's contribution is deducted weekly by the employer and paid in directly to the club together with his own contribution. The club's statutes can graduate the contributions by professions, and can fix the employer's contribution at a higher rate for certain establishments where the risk of illness is high. This, it is hoped, will prove efficacious as a preventive measure against illness. It is now introduced for the first time as an alternative to requiring small employers unconditionally to set up factory clubs. When a club is formed, contributions may not exceed $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the wages unless the grant of minimum benefits cannot otherwise be effected. They may only be raised beyond this limit for other purposes with the assent of both masters and men. If a 6 per cent. contribution does not cover the minimum requirements, the local authority will, in future, have to provide the balance. Agricultural labourers may be exempted on the demand of their employer, the latter being bound in case of illness to give them benefits equal to those provided by the sick-club, and entirely at his expense. With the assent of the authorities the country club can also give "extended sick treatment" to its members in lieu of granting sick and medical benefit. This means, of course, universal compulsory hospital treatment, and is expected to prove a deterrent to malingering. The provisions including servants, casual labourers, &c., are complicated. The English reader may be interested to hear that, in the case of illness among domestic servants the master can deduct the amount of the sick benefit from the latter's wages.

Germany has not been exempt from her "doctor question" and the same difficulties which face us here have been raised there in a very acute form. No agreement has been reached, and every attempt to secure a modus vivendi between the clubs and the medical profession has failed of success. But it may be said that in localities where the free choice of doctor system can be introduced the club-doctor system is being gradually displaced. It may further be remarked that, although the sum expended on medical benefit is steadily increasing (in the year 1908 medical benefit accounted for a sum exceeding $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions sterling), the remuneration of the doctors has by no means been placed on a satisfactory basis. From the doctor difficulty the question of malingering cannot be dissociated—it is bound to appear in any system of State insurance, and it is used, of course, both here and in Germany as a great argument against the free choice of doctor system.

INVALIDITY INSURANCE

Insurance against invalidity and old age was introduced by the law of 1899, and has in turn received serious modification both in the amending law of 1899 and the consolidation law of 1911 when widow and orphan insurance was included. The funds for this class of insurance are raised by equal contributions on the part of both masters and men, the State adding a sum which varies according to the kind of pension involved. Practically all workmen above sixteen in receipt of wages or salaries not exceeding £100 per annum are compulsorily included. Certain categories of persons not in receipt of more than £150 per annum are entitled to insure themselves voluntarily up to the age of forty.

The following conditions must be observed as a necessary preliminary to obtaining pensions. A waiting time of 200 weeks is imposed on compulsorily insured persons. Those persons retain the privilege of this diminished waiting time who have already paid 100 contributions under compulsion. Purely voluntary insurers, on the other hand, must undergo a waiting time of 500 weeks. In order to maintain the claim for a pension, after the waiting period has elapsed twenty contributions must have been paid during the two immediately preceding years. Voluntary insurers must pay forty contributions within the same period unless they have already subscribed sixty payments under compulsion. If a compulsory or voluntary insurer renews his insurance when over sixty years of age he can only establish his claim if he has paid 1,000 contributions prior to the lapse of his original claim, or, being over forty years of age, if he has already paid five hundred contributions. These necessary limitations being made clear, next week we shall proceed to consider the different kinds of pension and the contributions thereby entailed.

LORD KITCHENER

By "SUDANI."

WHEN first Lord Kitchener's name was mentioned in connection with the post in Egypt rendered vacant by the painful illness of the late Sir Eldon Gorst, not a few among the popular Field-Marshal's admirers were of opinion that the appointment was hardly worthy his acceptance. It was held that whatever it may have been in a past time, the tutorship of Egypt is not to-day of adequate importance to claim the undivided energies of a soldier still at the meridian of life, whose career of strenuous achievement is a long record of brilliant successes sternly won. And at first sight the contention is not unnatural.

Lord Kitchener, at the age of sixty-one, has attained the position of a Field-Marshal of His Majesty's Forces; he has reclaimed from barbarism and restored to civilised administration a vast tract of Africa; he has brought to an honourable peace a long and disastrous war; he has rearranged and brought up to date the defences of our great Indian Empire; he has won on several occasions the thanks of his country and of its rulers, with the additional further gratification of a peerage and of financial awards severally of £30,000 and £50,000; and now, having vacated but recently his command-in-chief in India—the greatest and perhaps the most onerous that can be given to a British soldier—his retirement to Egypt in what is claimed to be a purely civil capacity appears, on the surface, almost as an abnegation of the exalted goal he has ever had in view.

Lord Kitchener's career has been an unbroken record of steadfast, unremitting toil of the sternest description, a tale of unflinching devotion to the work of his life pursued in the teeth of all obstacles that man, Nature, and the elements could place in his path. He is a man without leisures or pleasures, without passions or hobbies, without recreations, or need of them. He has a brain that works with clock-like precision, and a will-force joined to an accuracy of intention and a recognition of limit that resembles the unerring, calculated action of the Nasmyth hammer—that force which drives irresistibly to its given end with uniform equality, and which stops instantly when that end is attained. The element of luck has never had a place in Lord Kitchener's soldier career. Everything that he has achieved, every victory he has gained, every difficulty he has patiently overcome, has owed nothing to aught save mathematical calculation of natural sequences coupled with meticulous preparation for each impending issue. Of course, he is pre-eminently a soldier, but a soldier of this age—the age of scientific and machine-made war. It is questionable whether in a former period of bluff onset and the crude hurling of massed forces against an army or a fortress he would have won his signal triumphs.

It is perhaps strange that so many misconceptions should have found place in print of a man so much written about and so much in the public view as the new Field-Marshal Consul-General. Take, for instance, one small item among many. Ever since Lord Kitchener first became prominent, in the 'nineties, the Press, and through the Press the public, has cherished a pleasing fiction as to certain attributes of his personal appearance which are wholly at variance with actuality. In any account of Lord Kitchener a marked reference will be found to his keen, cold, piercing, steely eyes. Now this description cannot be pleasing to its subject, for throughout the whole of his military career Lord Kitchener's eyesight has been a matter of deep concern to him, and during a considerable portion of his earlier years of service he was obsessed with apprehension lest his career as a soldier should be prematurely cut short by reason of his defective vision. Lord Kitchener joined the Royal Engineers in 1891, but he had already had a taste of soldiering, for in the great war of 1870 he served for a time as a volunteer under the French flag; and it was during an action in which he took part in that campaign that a splinter from a shell injured, if it did not permanently destroy, the sight of one eye. For years the result of this wound was a cause of anxiety to the gallant soldier, who was in constant dread lest the sight of the other eye should become impaired. But the public, long wedded to its opinion as to the steely brilliance of the General's orbs, certainly will not now be divorced from it.

On one occasion—it was in the Sudan—this writer was riding, with members of the staff, behind Lord Kitchener, when the latter turned to his aide-de-camp with a question. "Who," he asked, "is that dirty, ragged-looking officer over there?" It was the A.D.C.'s opportunity, and, of course, he took it. "That, Sir," he said politely, "is your brother." The General was not disconcerted. "Oh," he said lightly, "of course, I ought to have known Wally; he always wears those red things on his collar in the wrong place."

Of course, Lord Kitchener made the Sudan as we know it to-day; but equally, of course, the Sudan made Kitchener. Indeed, his subsequent triumphs, his patient wearing out of the enemy in South Africa, were but the outcome of his long Sudan experiences and the development of the policy of no hurry that he had carefully thought out during many years of dealing with the Dervishes. Kitchener, it may be said, had in his soul the determination to reconquer the Sudan and to dominate the immense horde of fanatical Arabs and tribesmen ranged against the Egyptian authority from so far back as 1885, when, after the failure of the Gordon relief expedition, we withdrew our forces and those of Egypt and abandoned the whole country south of the second Nile Cataract to the misrule of the Khalifa and his Emirs.

One may even go so far as to say that had Kitchener been given his way, the martyrdom of Gordon, the Fall of Khartum, and the massacre of its populace might well have been averted. In the spring and summer of 1884, when Gordon was alive in Khartum and the swelling Mahdist hordes were still at some distance from the Sudan capital, Lord Kitchener, a major in the young Egyptian Army formed by Sir Evelyn Wood, had his headquarters at Korosko on the Nile. There he was engaged with a Bimbashi colleague—Sir Leslie Rundle, now Governor of Malta—in organising a force of native levies drawn from the great desert tribe of Ababdeh, half of which was loyal to Egypt, whose chief, Hussein Pasha Khalifa, was Governor of Berber. The official and ostensible object of this force of irregulars was to keep in touch with the brave general who had obstinately constituted himself a prisoner in Khartum; but Lord Kitchener's instruction was to make a raid on that citadel and to bring General Gordon away nolens volens. It is more than probable that Gordon had a shrewd suspicion as to the young Caimakam's real intentions, and that this accounted for the constant abuse and bitter derision of Kitchener that filled his correspondence and his diaries.

But the project came to nothing, owing mainly to the vacillations and delays of the authorities which controlled operations in Egypt from Downing Street. Kitchener was ready to move, but the order came not. Berber fell in May; yet still the people at home held their hands. Dongola was invested by a great horde of fanatical Arabs flushed with success, and Dongola's Albanian commander, Sir Mustapha Gawar, was left, despite Kitchener's appeals, to work out his own salvation. He succeeded, and earned, as a characteristic reward, two orders from Her Majesty's Government of that day. The first was the K.C.M.G., the second that of Exile to Cairo.

To such a man as the ex-Commander-in-Chief of India, the forced inaction thrust upon him at so vital a moment must have been in the last degree galling; yet Kitchener never suffered aught of his heart-bitterness to find expression in words. In the long burning evenings in the huddled camp on the Nile bank he would instead elaborate somewhat dreamily a private scheme that he fancied for the subjugation and dominion of the Sudan savages.

"Give me," he would say, "a sum of £20,000 and a staff of highly-skilled electricians and I will guarantee to build up and maintain Empire throughout the Sudan. Where I would establish my capital I will not say, but it would not be at Khartum," and here he went on to explain how he would rule the Sudan people primarily through their ignorance and their superstition. He would conquer fanaticism by mysticism. He outlined a capital to which access should always be free and unguarded, and in its centre he placed in imagination a palace whose many doors should at all times be open, and whose entrances should be wholly unprotected by visible sentries. Himself was to be the unseen ruler within the palace, whom, though apparently approach was easy, no man would ever see. "There," he would say, "come in my electricians. All the doors will be open, all the corridors empty; but to any but the few initiated one step beyond a given point would entail instant and incomprehensible death." He did not, as he allowed, attempt to discuss the moralities of such a form of rule, urging that the Sudan was not ripe for civilised methods. This was unquestionably true, for even after fourteen years of such hideous suffering as not even the Congo tribes have experienced the Khalifa could still find a hundred thousand faithful fanatics to resist our redemption of their country and defend his rule of blood and torture. Howbeit, thus Lord Kitchener in meditative mood in 1884. But time brings changes. Next January, doubtless, he will be present in Khartum at the consecration of the Sudan Cathedral, whose first architect, of course, he was.

Lord Kitchener's methods during the years in which he was engaged in the actual reconquest of the Sudan typify the whole mental trend of the man, the organiser and the soldier. For years he had devoted infinite study to the question, and from the first (even before he became Sirdar of the Egyptian Army) he had determined that, when the great task came to be carried out, no other Power should be associated with England in it. The Italians, it will be remembered, cherished pretensions for some time, but these vanished, amid disaster and spent cartridges, at their great defeat at Adowa early in 1896. From the very first Kitchener's policy had been formed. He had no intention of forcing the issue. He knew always that the Sudan could only be conquered by machinery, and that the first-needed machinery was a railway. The recurrent failures of the Gordon Expedition had made patent to him how alone the weary deserts and long, waterless marches of the Sudan could be overcome, and, working always for his end, when in March, 1896, there came out from London that astonishing telegram which ordered Kitchener—before even the Khedive had been informed—to advance on Akasheh (the most impossible goal ever yet held out to an expedition), he had already his whole plan for the three years' campaign ready prepared, his route mapped out, and his bill of costs accurately estimated.

Though that sudden order to advance in the Sudan did not catch Lord Kitchener napping, it certainly found him asleep. The now famous telegram reached Cairo after midnight. Kitchener—a bachelor—lived alone in a small house near the English Club where his aide-de-camp (now Sir J. Watson Pasha, a high official in the Khedive's service), to whom the missive was carried, was playing a final game of billiards. The A.D.C. took the telegram to his chief, against whose bedroom window he threw pebbles until the future conqueror of Khartum and Commander-in-Chief of India came down in pyjamas and opened the door. And then, it is said, the joyful mandate perused, Sirdar and A.D.C. danced a wild fandango around the hall until such time as they could master their emotions.

At the time, no doubt, the mighty task of reconquering the Sudan was not in the minds of the framers of that message. But to Lord Kitchener the word to go was all-sufficient. He had been given the thin end of the wedge to insert and he did not stay his hand until he had driven it home.

To-day he returns to Egypt in a civil capacity. Has he again got hold of a wedge the thin end of which to insert, and if so whither will he drive it?

REVIEWS

DRAMA AND DRAMATISTS

Modern Dramatists. By ASHLEY DUKES. (Frank Palmer. 5s. net.)

THERE are not wanting many evidences that a strong feeling for the Renaissance is afoot. There is, for example, the movement outside drama. Men of letters who have hitherto had their interest confined to the novel and to poetry are turning to the dramatic form with considerable speculative interest. This does not only mean that novelists have taken to the dramatisation of their novels; nor that some novelists have so wearied their readers with their novels that some manner of change has been demanded of them; nor that other novelists have been lured into making the most of their fame to allocate to themselves some of the stupendous profits that they have seen workers in the dramatic field appropriate to their luckier pockets. It is in itself something very disinterested. The old forms have wearied, both by their diffuseness and by their satiety. On the other hand, there has been the revival within the dramatic field. Dramatists have themselves desired to make of their art something more satisfactory than the machine-made product of Sardou or the sentimental and artificial puffiness of Robertson. Even in circles where a literary taste might least be suspected there has come about a distaste with a drama that has no ambition, however remote, to be literature. We have lately had the avowal from a prominent critic that drama, even as drama, is doomed unless there is a substantial incursion to the ranks of dramatists of craftsmen whose first and primary desire it is to make literature first and drama afterwards.

Perhaps, however, an even more emphatic sign is that certain critics have seen fit of late to cast their eyes around with a desire to "report progress." Of these not the least worthy, both in equipment of knowledge and in earnestness of desire, is Mr. Ashley Dukes. One should not, possibly, expect too much of an independent contribution from such a book as this. Books are but limited things, and an author must take his decision as to what his intention is to be. Nevertheless one is disappointed at first with the lack of independent criticism: one feels that in the past there has been too much looking at the achievement of others, and too little occupation with ideals, first principles, and proper ambitions. For example, it is a purely arbitrary assertion to say that poetic drama is a thing of the past. It may be right, and it may be wrong; but, right or wrong, the fact remains that the assertion as hitherto made has not been a reasoned thing, but an arbitrary dictum. If a critic who made such an assertion were to be asked why poetic drama was a thing of the past, he would not argue the root principles of drama, and thus seek to deduce from matters that are not difficult of discovery; he would merely content himself with mentioning the name "Ibsen." That has been the prime fault of criticism hitherto; it has burked difficult examinations in favour of historical exemplars. And this is not only the fault of this present book; it is its avowed and definitive scope.

From a certain standpoint it is quite necessary to find fault with a point of view in a critic. In Art the tacit or overt point of view must be accepted or rejected with its achievement. There can be no medium course. But in criticism a point of view is much. In the present matter, for instance, we are being called upon to look at the immediate dramatic situation in the light of the past achievement of noteworthy dramatists; whereas we suspect Mr. Ashley Dukes is really interested in the future of drama, which may very likely date rather from an older and conceivably a healthier stock. Mr. Dukes himself feels this. In a significant sentence he says:—"Ibsen marked not only the beginning, but the close, of a period." Elsewhere he says, speaking of D'Annunzio:—

"He has his place in the European chain, not far removed from Maeterlinck and Hofmannsthal. Recall for a moment the quality which distinguishes these two dramatists (together, perhaps, with Tchekhov) from all the authors of their time. It is their revolt, conscious or unconscious, against the bourgeois theatre—that theatre which is concerned mainly with the social conditions of a period filled with moral indignation and designed to replace convention by an ethical standard."

It is easy to catch a certain healthy and personal leaning in this: but compare it with the sentence on Ibsen, who was incomparably the thing that Hofmannsthal, Maeterlinck and D'Annunzio set aside, and attain their greatness in setting aside. Carefully thought over, such a comparison leads to the conclusion that the bulk of the dramatists who occupy the attention of this volume, most of them with Ibsen for master, are of no more interest for future drama than specimens in a museum; which may be a mortifying conclusion from the standpoint of the past, but may also be a most inspiring conclusion from the point of view of the future. And it is here that one would so much have desired the leading questions of a personal criticism of these portents of the time. One would like to have seen them placed beside what Mr. Dukes considers the vital principles of great drama.

In other words, Mr. Dukes has undertaken to distinguish his book by the same fault that characterises the dramatists of whom he treats: even as they, he chooses to compile rather than to create. There is a difference, of course; in the majority of cases their compilations are done indifferent well, whereas his are always readable, and often stimulate the thought to embrace wider and more imaginative vistas. Such is the criticism of Galsworthy's "Justice": "One feels that it is inhuman, barbaric, detestable; but never that it is tragic. It arouses anger and pity, not inspiration. And inspiration is the test of tragedy." That is illuminating because it is true, in spite of the fact that "barbaric" is an ill-chosen word. Such is the whole of the criticism on Granville Barker, which in its very fairness (or seeming unfairness) to his subject fastens with sure attention on the essential weakness that underlies it, and ruins it, for all Shaw's protestations of its eternal value.

It is when one comes to examine the scope of this book that one realises its true value. In strict truth, there is no other book like it; and there are perhaps few other critics of drama who would be equipped with the apparatus necessary to the writing of such a book. In succeeding chapters the different nations are taken in turn; and their leading dramatists are handled shortly, though with sufficient detail to give their total achievement and its characteristics. In an opening chapter Mr. Dukes declares what he means by the word modern as applied to dramatists. To declare his distinction in a few words, it is sufficient to say that he would include such a writer as Shaw, were he good or bad of his kind, on principle, and exclude such a writer as Pinero on the same grounds. Proceeding on this plan, he passes in review the dramatic achievement of such nations as Scandinavia, Germany, England, Austria, Russia, France, Belgium and Holland, and Italy. With the majority of the national exemplars he has seen fit to choose we have in the main very little reason to quarrel, though we would certainly take exception to Alfred Capus and Brieux as either apt or desirable in their character as Gallic representatives. Moreover, in a highly valuable Appendix Mr. Dukes has given a complete list of plays beneath the name of each of his chosen dramatists, which makes his book doubly valuable for the student. But we would like to ask, in conclusion, what has Ireland done that Mr. Dukes should add to her numerous grievances? Neither she nor her eminent representatives are given a place in his category of dramatic greatness. Seeing that in some of the very nations that Mr. Dukes is deeply concerned with the doings of Ireland in drama are considered as of more moment than most modern portents, this is especially unfair. Yet this is not all. Mr. Dukes does indeed mention "The Playboy" once, though only then by way of illustration. This is his comment on it:—"In his 'Playboy of the Western World' Mr. J. N. Synge satirised bitterly the effect of even a self-styled giant upon a race of pigmies." Well, well: this is the first time that we saw the Playboy in that light; and, with all respect for Mr. Dukes, we devoutly pray, in a not too confident hope of sanity, that it may be the last.

SOME people are pessimistic about the fancied decline of church-going, but whatever may be alleged on this count, there is no diminution in the output of books on religion, nor in the widespread interest shown in theology, more especially in Christian evidences and the so-called Higher Criticism. In this field Mr. Archer-Shepherd has already appeared as a "Higher Critic" from the positive side. For the work before us he does not claim originality, but, in following the usual lines of defence, he presents theory, fact, and criticism in clear and succinct form. It is remarkable how little advance has been made in half a century on either side in dealing with the Resurrection. Negative criticism is still divided against itself in respect of many of its own theories, while defenders of the Faith must yet maintain the only standpoint, that the Resurrection is an historical fact, and therefore must simply offer again the theses of, say, Westcott and Milligan. As Professor Mahaffy once observed, it was the dogmatic preaching of the Resurrection which converted the world. We may add that were this teaching to cease to be absolute, Christianity as a positive force would be doomed.

"Modern Views of the Bible" runs upon parallel lines, but it is specially written to give spiritual help to those who have an intellectual sympathy with Modernism, but who are troubled with very natural misgivings about its trend. They feel that the older views about the Bible can no longer be upheld, but they have no mind to part with positive Faith. Such people, and they are many, should find great help from this book, which is admirably calculated to allay unnecessary doubts, and which deals in a really able manner with the deeper spiritual truths and principles which underlie Biblical narrative; even though Mr. Ellis goes further than may be necessary in his estimate of the human limitations of our Lord's knowledge, as when he writes:—"We may accept the position that our Lord held the views of His disciples about His return, and shared with them in their mistake."

"The Problem of Deuteronomy" is a close treatise, in which the author essays the difficult task of refuting all the higher critics, from De Wette to Cheyne and Driver, as to the probable date of the book. His examination of the internal evidence leads him to uphold the Mosaic authorship and altogether to reject the seventh century theory. Whatever opinion may be held as to his success, we cannot agree that "the case for the truth and inspiration of Deuteronomy stands or falls with that for its Mosaic origin." At the same time, Mr. Griffiths presents a good case for an earlier origin than the seventh century, say, in the time of Solomon, which would fit in with Professor Edouard Naville's remarkable theory (which he does not notice) that the Book of the Law discovered in Josiah's reign was a cuneiform papyrus buried in the foundations of Solomon's Temple. Such a view might possibly agree with a partial Mosaic origin for this complex book.

"Messianic Interpretation" consists of some essays on the Apocalyptic aspect of our Lord's teaching; one about the medical language of St. Luke, and an interesting discussion of the newly-recovered letter of St. Irenæus. The first essay (the Macbride Sermon at Oxford) considers the Jewish and Christian conflicting ideas of the Messiah, "Jesus or Christ," and this subject is ably followed up in the second, on the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity; while in the third, the Eschatology of St. Paul, we are given a clever though short examination of the ultimate outcome, our Lord's position as Judge of the world, denied absolutely in most of the "Lives of Jesus" which still pour from the Press in Germany. Canon Knowling exhibits throughout a discriminating scholarship and an intimate knowledge of modern German criticism. His work is a really useful addition to the literature of Christian defence.

"Christian Thought to the Reformation" is a well-written summary of the varying phases of Christian doctrine and philosophy from the standpoint of one who does not believe in what he calls a "rigid Church," and to whom the idea of "the Faith once for all delivered to the Saints" would be as unintelligible as the view held by many that the so-called "Dark Ages," notwithstanding much pagan superstition, were still the ages of a simple and devoted faith. Even from one who is separated from the visible Catholic Church it is curious to find the Apostles' Creed estimated merely as a symbol which formed an advantageous asset for the Roman Church. St. Augustine is described as "the greatest of Christian philosophers," but the writer naïvely adds, "His teaching we may reject."

On the other hand, we are not surprised that the author holds the view that the Catholic victory over Montanism "riveted upon the Church the very fetters of traditionalism and authority against which the Montanists had made their protest," and that, with regard to the special gifts to the Twelve Apostles, and the "Apostolic" office of the Bishops, "the Church has been misled ever since." It is difficult to see why the Church should not "emphasise historical Christianity." But some light is thrown on the writer's idea of development by a passage in the Preface:—"True Christianity is not to be found by going back to some ill-defined period of antiquity, the beliefs and practices of which it is now almost impossible to reconstruct; but by the incorporation into itself of the ever-enlarging knowledge, the ever-expanding horizons of life." Such vague generalities are a poor substitute for the historic faith.

Cecil Bourke was for fifteen years Archdeacon of Buckingham. Mr. Harvey Gem has compiled a short memoir of his good life and work, adding some selections from his spiritual addresses and sermons. Books like this suggest the reflection that, although controversy cannot be avoided, the best and truest form of Church defence is to be found in Church-work inspired by earnestness and devotion.

"The Onward Cry" is a collection of sermons, or rather, we should be inclined to say, dignified essays on the higher ideals of life, somewhat after the manner of Robertson of Brighton, though scarcely possessing that famous preacher's downright force. Smoothly roll on in pleasant diction the cultured paragraphs of the literary theologian.

STEVENSON'S LETTERS—I.

The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Edited by SIDNEY COLVIN. Four Volumes. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net each.)

WHEN a few months ago we devoted an article to Stevenson's work in general we made but casual reference to his correspondence in view of this promised new edition. We may say at once that we find it wholly satisfactory. It includes the "Letters to his Family and Friends," the "Vailima Letters," and a hundred and fifty new letters, the whole arranged in a single chronological series. We feel, as we felt when the original volumes were published, that Sir Sidney Colvin has performed his editorial task with admirable judgment and discretion; while the new form, which makes it difficult for us not to keep one of these pretty little volumes permanently in our pocket, shows a nice appreciation of the attitude of mind of Stevenson's admirers towards the posthumous collection wherein the author undoubtedly drew his own portrait in fullest detail.

In the case of an artist so conscientious and so painstaking as Stevenson it seems at first sight paradoxical that his most significant contribution to literature should prove to be the letters which he wrote in hours of relaxation; but to us it is quite clear that if Stevenson had not laboured as he did over his more ambitious work—if, for instance, he had not taken six months to write the essay called "Ordered South"—he would never have achieved the ease of expression that makes his correspondence delightful. His oft-quoted aphorism, "In moments of effort one learns to do the easy things that people like," was truer than he knew. The easiest things that he did were his letters, and they are the part of his work that we like best. We are willing to go even farther, and say that the Vailima letters, which he wrote, at all events in part, with some view to future publication, are the least satisfactory in the collection. It seems as though he had a mistrust of his own personality that prevented him from expressing it frankly to the public. It was only to his friends that he was willing to play the enchanting chatterbox; to the world in general he wished to appear as the dignified man of letters, and even, after the manner of too many of our contemporary artists, as the serious politician. The part he played in the affairs of Samoa may or may not have been justified at the moment, but from our point of view it was so much time wasted, and the "Foot-note to History," the letters to the Times, and the bulk of the Vailima letters are now valueless, while the careless notes that he scribbled to his friends have revealed him as ranking with the very best of English letter-writers.

Though it would be a little cruel to Stevenson to measure him as an artist with such a giant as Flaubert, a curious parallel can be drawn between the two writers. Both were artists with what we hold to be an exaggerated regard for style, in the narrower sense of the word; both sought to construct books out of carefully-perfected sentences, instead of encouraging the reader to regard the book as a whole, and forget the words with which it was written; both, to use Mr. Frank Harris's phrase, let themselves go in their letters, and painted themselves to the life.

And there the parallel ceases, for Flaubert, as Mr. Harris has said, shows himself as "a prodigious big and kindly fellow, worthy to stand side by side with the greatest," while Stevenson emerges as a man of common stature, a man of small virtues and small vices, a man with all the doubts and hesitations and timid self-questionings that form the moral and intellectual equipment of ordinary men. We hasten to add that, to our mind, this does not make his correspondence less interesting or significant. It is inevitable that our literature should be largely written by supermen; but the study of their lives is hardly helpful to those who lack the comfortable certitudes of genius. The giants compel our admiration; but it is the pigmies, the Lambs and the Stevensons, who secure our love. So we permitted ourselves to smile at the critic who, in reviewing Stevenson's letters in the pages of a weekly contemporary, was at pains to draw up a list of the minor human weaknesses and frailties therein revealed, and triumphantly labelled this piece of devil's advocacy "An Aspect of Stevenson." So, indeed, it was, and not an unimportant aspect either, but the writer should not have called Stevenson inhuman because he was sometimes thoughtless, often egoistical, and always fond of money, for these are among the common failings of men; nor do we think that Stevenson's eagerness to confess his weaknesses to his friends deserves our censure.

From a literary point of view the letters are remarkable, not only for the graceful ease with which they are written, but also for the variety of moods which they represent. They range from the light-hearted triflings of a high-spirited schoolboy to the utterances of heart of a Scotchman concerned for his soul. Moreover, as a critic has well pointed out, Stevenson had that subtlest art of the ideal correspondent which lies in not only expressing the mood of the moment, but in expressing it in terms of the person to whom the letter is addressed, so that from many of these letters we derive a pleasant sense of the characters of Stevenson's many friends. Stevenson, doubtless, wrote letters to please himself; but he did not, like many letter-writers, write them to himself. These thirteen hundred pages do not afflict us with the monotony of a long-drawn-out soliloquy; the other speakers are there, though we cannot hear their voices.

And apart from their reflection of the writer's personality and of the personalities of his friends, the letters deal with an amazing variety of topics. Stevenson was a passionate observer of the life about him, and whether he is at Edinburgh or Monterey, Menton or Samoa, he is always eager to fix his impressions in words. The literary criticisms with which his letters are lavishly sown are always individual, and certainly as a critic he erred on the pleasant side of appreciation. Sometimes he was shrewd enough—witness his well-known judgment on "Cashel Byron's Profession," which Time and Mr. Bernard Shaw have proved to be only too well founded. Another of his literary criticisms deserves mention. Three times, he wrote to Mr. Yeats, he had fallen in emotional slavery under the spell of lyric poetry—first to Swinburne's poems and ballads, secondly to Meredith's

"Love in a Valley," and thirdly to Mr. Yeats's "Lake Isle of Innisfree." No one who knows that exquisite little poem will deem the compliment excessive.

Considerations of space compel us to postpone our examination of some of the more important of these letters to a further article.

SHEFFIELD AND ITS LITERATURE

A Bibliography of Sheffield and Vicinity. (Section I. to the end of 1700.) By W. T. FREEMANTLE. (Pawson and Brailsford, Sheffield. 10s. 6d.)

SHEFFIELD is essentially one of those modern centres of population which owe their importance to the marvellous industrial progress which this country showed during the last century. But it must not be thought that its importance depends entirely on nineteenth-century development. In the year 1801 its population already exceeded 45,000, and the reputation of the town for the forging of steel can be traced back as far as the fourteenth century, from the references to be found in Chaucer. The Cutlers Company itself dates from the reign of James I. Sheffield-plate, which still easily holds the field against all competitors, is just a century younger than the renowned Company of Cutlers. The town, formed by the aggregation of a number of workers in iron around the baronial castle, goes back to the period of the earliest of the Plantagenets, but even earlier than that, before the advent of an industry, Sheffield, then known as Escafeld, was as the capital of Hallamshire a place of some importance.

Sheffield is thus a city with a history, and also, it may be added, with a literature of its own. Of this latter fact one can have no doubt after only a casual perusal of Mr. Freemantle's remarkably well-compiled volume. There is no need to mention that his work was a labour of love, for his affection for it is breathed out on every page. The care with which he has rummaged out all books which have any connection, through either their subject or their author, with the city for which he has such an obvious liking, the thorough manner in which he transcribes the title-pages of these volumes, his valuable notes, all bespeak the ardent bibliographer. Mr. Freemantle is, moreover, a pioneer in the work, for, as he points out, there is no book of a similar nature dealing with the district of which Sheffield is the centre.

One of the most interesting personalities, and also one of the most prominent that appears in this volume, is Nevill Simmons, bookseller and publisher of Sheffield, of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, to the elucidation of the mystery of whose relationship to other booksellers of the same name in London and elsewhere Mr. Freemantle devotes the greater portion of his appendix. Nevill Simmons has already been the subject of a brochure by Mr. Giles Hester. Mr. Freemantle, however, supplements Mr. Hester's information, and by a series of ingenious suggestions he certainly establishes some connection between Simmons and Richard Baxter's publisher of the same name who has been traced in Kidderminster and London, as well as with other members of the profession who flourished during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Mr. Hester's account of the Nevill Simmons of Sheffield dates from 1692, the year in which he suggests that he settled in that city. Mr. Freemantle has, however, delved much deeper since the publication of the brochure of his predecessor in 1893, and he has found evidence of the presence of this noted bookseller in his town at least five years earlier. He has, however, not yet abandoned the search, and he hopes to throw still further light on this personage who has absorbed so much of his attention.

The best known authors who appear in the Bibliography, which concludes with the year 1700—later years are to be dealt with in succeeding volumes—are Hobbs, of Leviathan fame, although the identification might well be overlooked if we rely on Mr. Freemantle's biographical note alone, to whom nine items connected with Sheffield and district are attributed; the employers of Hobbs, viz., the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle—of the works of the former five items are given, and of those of the latter eight; and Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, who came of a local family and is supposed to have been buried near Rotherham. There are a large number of items concerning him, the most pathetic being a letter to his wife dated from the Tower of London, of the original print of which a facsimile is reproduced. So touching does it read that we cannot refrain from reprinting the text:—

Sweet Harte. It is long since I writt unto you, for I am here in such a trouble as gives me little or noe respetto. The Chardge is now cum inn, and I am now able I prayse god to tell you, that I conceive ther is nothing capitall, and for the rest I knowe at the worse his Majy will pardon all without hurting my fortune, and then wee shall be happy by gods grace. Therefore comfortt your self for I trust thes cloudes will away, and that wee shall have faire weather afterwarde. Farewell. Your loving husbände. Strafford.
Tower of London 4 Feb 1640.

Unfortunately Strafford was all too optimistic.

HERE, THERE, AND EVERYWHERE

Talk of the Town. By MRS. JOHN LANE. (John Lane. 6s.)

MRS. JOHN LANE has for some time been known as an author who, by her lively wit and satire, as well as by the grace and charm of her description, has given many an hour's pleasant recreation to the reading public. Keen observation, a clear understanding, and general kindness are to be detected in nearly all the essays which form the present interesting volume. Whether she treats of "The Tyranny of the Past," "The Camel at Home," "The Gutter Sphinx," or "The Toast Master," Mrs. Lane manages, somehow or other, to find a way of bringing her good-natured ridicule to bear sympathetically upon her subject. She does not try to catch our passing fancy by presenting that which is best first, for, in our opinion, the two articles which go to fill up the earlier pages are by no means the best wares in the basket. For instance, in "The Tyranny of Clothes" there is an account—short, it is true, but even the bare mention of it is tiring, because it has been repeated so often—of that time-honoured old negro who, we suppose, in order to win the admiration of his gaping neighbours, arrayed himself in the top-hat of a bygone generation.

In "The New Fashion in Heroes" Mrs. Lane divests herself for a few moments of the sandals of her hilarity and mirth and enters a little way into the temple of human pain and suffering. She pleads for a better recognition for the hero who has done nothing which, judged by the world's standard, can be called heroic—for the man who is never "in greater danger than the going to and from business . . . twice a day" (although probably in the present stirring times even he may be regarded as more of a hero than usual). This, of course, is part of the unrecognised, and probably very often unthought-of, tragedy of life. We are rather apt to look upon people who perform certain acts which we do not consider particularly elevating or exalting, as being incapable of pursuing or even of wishing to pursue any more congenial task. Who is there who does not know the quiet, staid, gentle, eldest daughter of a family, who is always looked upon as a fixture in the home? That she should ever have had thoughts or aspirations beyond the trivial round of mending, making, and generally attending to other people's wants does not dawn upon the minds of many people. It may be that she likes pretty things quite as much as her younger sisters, and that it is not from choice that she is clothed according to the fashions of previous years, that her shoes are not of the shape prescribed by the Cubans, Americans, or the Court of Louis XIV., or that the stocking visible above the "useful" shoe traces no witching pattern, curve, or twist. The wife, whose love-dream ended almost with the Marriage Service, but who loyally, silently, and bravely performs her now dreary tasks without swerving one iota from her allegiance, although all the time there is a dull, leaden pain somewhere behind it all which refuses to go away; the man, who takes to his home one whom he had waited for so long, expecting to find a loyal companion and friend—who proves to be neither the one nor the other, and, now that the mask can be dropped, rather a stumbling-block in the way of his material and spiritual progress, caring for nothing but admiration and empty frivolity—these all have their part and lot in that long procession of heroes. Presenting a brave front to the world, they come blamelessly, and in many cases still hopefully, through their great tribulation, all the time caring much, very much, for the better part, which they watch others enjoy but about which they can only dream.

Thus must we consign the "Talk of the Town" to take its place side by side with "The Champagne Standard" and "According to Maria," trusting that at no very distant date an equally fresh and delightful volume may be written by the same pen.

INDIAN MISSIONS

Thirty-four Years in Poona City: being the History of the Panch Howds Poona City Mission, India. By the REV. FATHER ELWIN, S.S.J.E. Illustrated. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.)

THERE were missions and missionaries in Southern India for centuries before the Parliamentary Statute of 1813 legalised their presence in the country, and provided for the creation of a limited ecclesiastical establishment. The several Christian religions and sects, and various European nations, have all contributed their quotas, and vied with each other in the dissemination of the Faith. The names of St. Francis Xavier, Ziegenbalg, Schultze, Swartz, Carey, Henry Martyn, Dr. Duff, are household words in mission annals. It must be admitted that the methods of missionaries, their attitude towards secular affairs, and their quarrels, have before now greatly exercised successive Governments. But by this time their relations with the civil power on the one hand, and the country religions on the other, have been practically determined, and friction seldom arises.

One of the best of the larger missions on the Bombay side is that which was established in Poona city as the Panch Howds (Five Tanks) Poona City Mission, in 1877, by Bishop Mylne, of Bombay. This little work is a plain history, by one of the staff, of its extension and labours, of the opposition encountered, of the losses experienced, and the difficulties surmounted. No better place could have been selected for missionary enterprise than Poona. Its geographical situation is excellent; it was once the capital of the Maratha dominion; it is still a Brahmin stronghold, and a focus of latter-day sedition; there is probably no city, except Benares, where idolatry can be seen more openly practised. As great military commanders strike at the heart of the enemy's position, so the mission was wisely located in the centre of Brahminical heathendom. But this fact in itself facilitated initial opposition, which had to be overcome. We need not follow the author in his full account of the mission's commencement and history, the co-operation of Sisters from Wantage, the clerical staff, the erection of a capacious church and other buildings, the hospital accommodation, the assistance received from England, the favourable attitude of the natives in many cases, the evangelistic work in the city and adjacent villages, the visitations of famine and plague and their consequences, the street-preaching and its difficulties successfully met, the dispensaries, the industrial work and education provided, the numerous schools and hostels for girls and boys, the hill-retreats—all now supported and furthered by the Missionary Association of St. Mary and St. John.

A marvellous bit of testimony to missionary work is quoted from a speech of a distinguished Hindu Judge of the Bombay High Court, delivered to a Christian audience, when he said only last year:—

The process of the conversion of India to Christ is not going on as rapidly as you hope, or in exactly the manner that you hope; but, nevertheless, I say that India is being converted. The ideas that lie at the heart of the Gospel of Christ are slowly but surely permeating every part of Hindu society, and modifying every phase of Hindu thought. And this process must go on so long as those who preach this Gospel seek above all things to commend it, not so much by what they say, as by what they do, and by the way in which they live.

Any one who cares to understand how missionary work is conducted in India will like to have his attention drawn to this little book, which tells its story simply and clearly, without too many statistics.

SHORTER REVIEWS

SCOTTISH HISTORY

The Awakening of Scotland: a History from 1747 to 1797.
By WILLIAM L. MATHIESON. (J. MacLehose and Sons, Glasgow. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. MATHIESON is already well known as an able and original writer on Scottish history by his former works, "Politics and Religion in Scotland" (1550-1695) and "Scotland and the Union" (1695-1747).

In this book he continues his study and research, and with great discrimination delineates the peculiar and remarkable development of Scotland in the eighteenth century, which, as he says, "owes much of its interest to the awakening of industry, and to the brilliant though expensive victory won by liberalism in the Church. But the change from stagnation to the full current of life was no less remarkable in the political than in the industrial sphere; and here perhaps the significance of the period is not so generally understood." Here we may observe that difficulty has been removed from the path of the careful student by the writer's bold and clear perspective of history.

The first three chapters lie mainly in the political field: "Scotland at Westminster," the American War, and the Political Awakening. During the eighteenth century there was much jealousy, rancour and animosity between English and Scotch, which were specially manifested in political life.

Some idea of the general feeling may be gathered from lines quoted from the "Prophecy of Famine":—

Considered as the refuse of mankind,
A mass till the last moment left behind,
Which frugal Nature doubted as it lay,
Whether to stamp with life or throw away;
Which form'd in haste, was planted in this nook,
But never entered in creation's book;
Branded as traitors who, for love of gold,
Would sell their God as once their king they sold.

But after the American War, Scotland, "profoundly affected by the French Revolution," awakened to new ideas of democracy, which asserted themselves in a spirit of liberty and independence which demanded and obtained a fuller recognition of right. How this spirit was dominated by the economic forces which transformed the industrial life of the country is admirably traced by the author in his concluding chapter, while the large part played by ecclesiastical politics (as ever in Scotland) and the growth of the movement towards Liberalism are both minutely portrayed. Moderatism, before it gained any sort of supremacy, had a long and severe struggle with the intolerant fanaticism of an hereditary Calvinism. One very curious move in the game is noted—the promotion of a liberal end by altogether illiberal means, as when the Moderates showed "no compunction in using patronage to crush popular prejudice and passion." How far Scotland has really advanced in the true principles of toleration and liberalism in religion is a point on which opinions may widely differ, and we shall look with interest for a history of the nineteenth century from the untiring pen of this talented writer.

Nietzsche et les Théories Biologiques Contemporaines. By CLAIRE RICHTER. ("Mercure de France," Paris. 3fr. 50c.)

NIETZSCHE is a name to conjure with, especially in France. He is one of the few philosophers who have enjoyed something approaching to wide popularity, and we may almost say that he has deserved it. He has splashed the canvas of philosophy with great daubs of sanguine colour, and he has varied his expositions with the poetical rhapsodisings of an Eastern prophet. To discover a method in his at times unquestionable madness is a task that has attracted a host of writers. Mme. Richter has found a useful clue to the labyrinth. Nietzsche was, it seems, in his early years, and during the period of his earlier writings, very inadequately equipped in the matter of Natural Science for his generalisings. He recognised the defect and laboured to remedy it, but his lack of special training rendered it difficult for him to assimilate perfectly all that the modern thinkers had to teach. It seems doubtful even whether he ever read Darwin, of whom he constitutes himself the exponent and the critic; in any case, he thoroughly misrepresented him. One of Mme. Richter's tasks is to prove that Nietzsche has been only influenced in a secondary degree by the English biologist. She is also concerned to show that it is to Lamarck rather than to Darwin that he owes a starting-point for his ideas. The curious contradictions in Nietzsche's later writings are ascribed to the encroachments of insanity; of course, the great difficulty with this peculiar thinker is to know where the line between his sanity and his ravings is to be drawn. Dr. Nordau, for instance, draws it very early; Mme. Richter places the borderland quite late in his career, and even at that stage manages to disentangle some shreds of his original purpose from the wreckage of his intellect. For us Nietzsche is an inspired neurotic, whose worship of strength is but a symptom of weakness, a phenomenon for which we may find parallels every day in politics and the Press. And yet his influence for good or ill is so palpable and enormous that a sound, pithy, and clear critique, such as this of Mme. Richter, should have a great value for readers over-anxious about the future of the race.

William Ford Stanley: his Life and Work. Edited by RICHARD INWARDS, F.R.A.S. (Crosby Lockwood and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE first five chapters of this most interesting little book are autobiography, and have been left almost untouched. From them we can gather much information regarding the strong character, perseverance, and courage of one whose name is now known all over the world in connection with scientific instruments and accurate mechanical devices. William Ford Stanley was born in 1829, and died in 1909, and for many years carried on his business in a little shop in Great Turnstile, Holborn. He started it at the age of twenty-five, with a capital of £100. A modest success followed him almost from the beginning, since his name became a hall-mark for fine and skilful workmanship; and of late years Norwood and the district have had reason to be grateful for his generosity and interest. For a long period of his youth, however, he had a really hard time, and it is fascinating to read of his determination and his methodical way of grappling with difficulties. Stanley was one of those men who can work to a system. During the five years of his life at Buntingford, where he did all kinds of metal-working, and the odd artistic jobs of a country town, he took for study a separate subject each year, the first twelvemonth being occupied with Architecture and Theology. "In this manner I studied the English language, then Astronomy, and Geology. I adhered to this plan of study all my life." Such a man was bound in time to make his mark.

Mr. Inwards continues the story of this busy career, and adds tabulated information with regard to Stanley's literary work and many inventions, so that, as a record of a pioneer in certain branches of industry requiring mathematical exactness and special knowledge, the book is of value to a wider circle than would otherwise have been the case.

Maryland under the Commonwealth. ("University Studies in Historical and Political Science." Series XXIX. No. 1.) By BERNARD STEINER. (The Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, U.S.A.)

THE present monograph is a piece of quiet, sound historical work, with that large treatment that is often to be found in American historians who have soaked themselves in the style of their respective periods. It is concerned with the struggles of Lord Baltimore to keep possession of his hereditary province, which was threatened with absorption by Virginia, while the Puritans tried to do away with the toleration which he maintained in favour of his co-religionaries, the Roman Catholics. The position was an anomalous one, Baltimore's patriarchal Government suddenly finding itself under the orders of a regicide and republican Parliament. It is curious to read of the defence made in a pamphlet, "that a Monarchical Government, subordinate to a Commonwealth, is consistent with it, as is seen by the King's tributary to Rome and by the lords of manors in England." A more practical and universal reason that would have found favour with Mr. Barrie's "Admirable Crichton" is that England is one place and Maryland another, and that what may be bad for the one is necessary to the other. A battle was fought, though matters had become so complicated that it would be none too easy to say under what flags the respective combatants were fighting. Baltimore lost his province for a moment, but patience, policy, and the favour of the Protector finally restored it to him.

Bell's Simplified Classics:—I. Caesar's Invasions of Britain. (Extracted from "De Bello Gallico," Lib. IV., V.) II. Livy's Kings of Rome. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary, by S. E. Winbolt, M.A. Illustrated. (G. Bell and Sons. 1s. 6d. each.)

SHOULD Latin be taught in our schools is a question which has been agitating the world of preceptors and the public generally for a considerable time past, and there are many who have shown themselves in favour of the withdrawal of the study of the dead languages from our scholastic curriculum. Several eminent scholars, including Professor E. V. Arnold, believe, however, that a simplified Latin will be the salvation of that ancient language as an ordinary school subject, and, acting upon this conception, and the expression of opinion published by the Classical Association, Messrs. Bell and Sons are issuing this helpful series of "Simplified Classics" intended for use in a pupil's second, or possibly third, year of Latin. Apart from their educational value, these booklets will also prove of interest to every pupil with an inquiring mind. They are handy in size, printed in good, legible type, and, in addition to the many elucidatory Notes, the text is made still clearer by the aid of some useful maps and several apposite illustrations.

WE have now received the June number of the monthly magazine Peru To-day. The style of this publication alone affords sufficient evidence of the commercial and intellectual progress of this important Republic of South America. The subject-matter is, naturally enough, confined for the greater part to the industrial progress of the country, and the text has the advantage of being illustrated by a number of admirable photographs.

To those unacquainted with the conditions of the Republic the June number of this magazine cannot fail to prove a mine of knowledge, since the majority of its pages are designed to impart information to Europeans and to foreigners non-resident in the country. Thus we are given a short and very concise account of the various industries of the land, ranging from mining and the guano-fields to the growth of cotton, rubber, coffee, fruit, tobacco, and agriculture in general.

A few interesting paragraphs are devoted to the manufacture of Panama hats, the only headgear in the world in the purchase of which mere man is permitted to enjoy an extravagance comparable with that indulged in by women. The industry is a thriving one in Peru, although it should be noted that the greater part of the straw employed for the purpose is not grown within the country itself, but is imported from Ecuador.

Nevertheless, however thriving, the commerce in Panama hats is, of course, not to be compared in importance with such industries as that of cotton, the production of which in 1909 exceeded £1,200,000 in value. The rubber industry, moreover, is now a thriving one in Peru, and on this subject there is much in the magazine that is of exceptional interest. Some very frank comments are made on the labour question in the rubber district:—

They are mainly a satisfied lot of natives, but in some of the distant concessions Indians have been forced to work, and even taken from their native villages and transported against their will to places where labour is scarce, and there have been authenticated reports of inhuman treatment which the Government, aided by the "Pro-Indigena," or indigenous protection league, is working to eradicate. The region is so vast and means of communication so inadequate that universal control is all but impossible.

The publication is distinctly instructive, and, in view of the notable progress of Peru, should appeal to a large public in this country.

FICTION

MR. WELLS AND THE SHORT STORY

The Country of the Blind, and Other Stories. By H. G. WELLS. (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)

THE short story, placing on record a mood, an idea, an incident, is one of the most difficult forms of literature, and the English masters of the art can be counted on the fingers of one hand. Fantastic ideas, curious incidents, memorable moods arrive in plenty, and superficially it might seem easy, given a certain intimacy with language and its rules, to "write them up" for the edification or amusement of others. But the magic is as elusive as a moonbeam. The art which can make the most improbable events seem natural and inevitable is the rarest of possessions; the skill which can select just the happy touch, the convincing phrase, that shall turn to thrilling wonder what would in the hands of a bungler have been a mere absurdity, is attained by few. When, as in the case of Mr. H. G. Wells, this art and skill are combined with an imagination that is simply uncanny in its scope and liveliness, all the conditions are present for the production of masterpieces. And that some of the stories in this collection are worthy of being so ranked no one can deny. "There was a time," says Mr. Wells in his fascinating introduction, "when life bubbled with short stories:"—

They were always coming to the surface of my mind. . . . I found that, taking almost anything as a starting-point, and letting my thoughts play about it, there would presently come out of the darkness, in a manner quite inexplicable, some absurd or vivid little incident more or less relevant to that initial nucleus. Little men in canoes upon sunlit oceans would come floating out of nothingness, incubating the eggs of prehistoric monsters unawares; violent conflicts would break out amidst the flower-beds of suburban gardens; I would discover I was peering into remote and mysterious worlds ruled by an order logical indeed, but other than our common sanity.

Many pages of this book seem to prove these words indubitably; the author peers into half a dozen different worlds, terrible, fantastic, comic, and often in our own sober world finds a kaleidoscopic shifting of the scene that leaves the reader amazed—as in the story of "The Man Who Could Work Miracles." Mr. Fotheringay, a clerk and a very ordinary person, suddenly discovers that his will-power is of "a particularly rare and pungent quality" which enables him to upset the laws of gravity and of Nature. Step by step he proceeds until, emulating Joshua, he desires the earth to stand still. "Jest stop rotating, will you?" he exclaims, in the "Kipps" manner. But, having forgotten the movables on the earth's surface and the atmosphere, his modest request results in a catastrophe.

Take, again, "The Country of the Blind"—a country where the inhabitants have been blind for many generations and possess mere rudimentary eyes. Into this land a man slips by means of an avalanche—a man with all his faculties acute, and, remembering the proverb that "in the country of the blind the one-eyed man is king," he forecasts for himself a good time as ruler. But, on the contrary, he discovers that the Blind People regard him as a fool who speaks meaningless words when he endeavours to tell them about sight, about the stars and heavens and mountains; and their sense of hearing is so acutely developed that they have him practically at their mercy. Several times, in reading this book, we have been reminded of Mr. Kipling's work in the same field. "A Dream of Armageddon" and "The Door in the Wall" are in parts reminiscent of "The Brushwood Boy;" "Armageddon," too, brings to memory "The Finest Story in the World," although in Mr. Wells' plot the hero has lived and died, as it were, in the future, while "Charlie Mears," Mr. Kipling's bank clerk of literary aspirations, had been a Greek galley-slave.

There are thirty-three stories in the volume, and they are all good; some, especially those which should not be read late at night, are of a fearful fascination. "The Empire of the Ants," which, with four others, is reprinted for the first time, is one of the grimmest conceptions we have read for a long period; this, again, calls up in its introductory passages "Judson and the Empire." In both stories we have a small gunboat creeping up a tropical river; but the horror of Wells is on a larger scale than the humour of Kipling in this case. It is a relief to turn to the pages written in lighter vein, where the author's fancy plays like a lambent flame round ordinary things. "The Jilting of Jane," "The Purple Pileus," "The New Accelerator," "The Truth about Pyecraft," and "The Magic Shop" are pleasantly contrasted with the creepiness of many of the stories; and in "Miss Winchelsea's Heart" Mr. Wells has written a whimsical little love-tale which glows softly as a pearl amid the somewhat hard brilliance of cleverly-faceted, clear-cut gems. Miss Winchelsea, a teacher of some pretensions to intellect, on a glorious tour to Rome with two companions, lost her heart to a pleasant young man who read poetry in the train, looked after her luggage, and made himself unobtrusively agreeable. But, alas! just as affairs were progressing nicely and revelations of sympathetic tastes were being made on both sides, and Miss Winchelsea is imagining a pretty little home "with white shelves of high-class books," and reproductions of Rossetti and Burne-Jones, a friend of the young man addresses him as "Snooks:"—

The name struck Miss Winchelsea like a blow in the face. . . . A sort of mental paralysis was upon her. . . . All that afternoon she lived the life of a heroine under the indescribable outrage of that name—chatting, observing, with "Snooks" gnawing at her heart. From the moment that it first rang upon her ears the dream of her happiness was prostrate in the dust. All the refinement she had figured was ruined and defaced by that cognomen's unavoidable vulgarity. What was that refined little home to her now, spite of autotypes, Morris papers, and bureaus? Athwart it, in letters of fire, ran an incredible inscription: "Mrs. Snooks. . . ."

"It is impossible," she muttered; "impossible!"

Of how she chilled to him, and he, transferring his affections to her companion, cleverly developed his patronymic until it became "Sevenoaks" and aristocratic, we need not tell. Enough to say that the story is an admirable example of Mr. Wells' best descriptive and humorous manner.

The whole book is aptly termed "a miscellany of inventions" by its author in his prefatory essay, and he urges that it should be dipped into again and again rather than "read severely through." We have read straight through, recognising here and there an old friend, and thoroughly enjoyed the process—a fairly sharp test. On his own ground Mr. Wells is master. There is nothing here of psychological interest and accumulative terror to match Mr. Henry James' "The Beast in the Jungle," nor is there anything to equal Conrad's "Typhoon," but there are stories which neither of these could write, and as examples of skill in the art of the conte they must be considered unsurpassed.

A NOVEL OF CORNWALL

The Horseshoe. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

IN "The Horseshoe" Mrs. Fred Reynolds has written a very carefully thought-out story of Cornish life, although the plot—that of the elegant young man from town who disturbs the hearts of the local fair—is by no means new. "Lorry" Grainger, somewhat contemptible and weak of character, is finely contrasted with the sturdy fishing community of the village near Land's End, and the two girls with whose lives he becomes entangled—Maggie Penrose, full-bosomed, coarse, loquacious, eager, and Cassin her cousin, slim, shy, reticent—form excellent foils to one another. Maggie is sensuous, artless, and at times fierce in her love-making—so much so, in fact, that she completely disgusts both the susceptible stranger and the young fisherman, Andrew Thomas. Cassin's personality, on the other hand, appeals to them both, and that portion of the book which deals with the rebuffs of Grainger in his pertinacious wooing is capitally told. The two irritated and jealous men, in course of time, come to open war, and blows are exchanged. Soon afterwards Grainger, "showing off" in front of the girls with a new gun, has the misfortune to shoot his rival, and affairs become complicated owing to Maggie's furious declaration that the deed was purposeful and malicious. All ends well for Andrew and Cassin, but Maggie, disdainful of the limited village existence, and disillusioned with regard to the "lucky" horseshoe which she stole from her cousin, sets off for London to live her own life.

Because Mrs. Reynolds has given us so good a story, we must indicate some faults the avoidance of which would have strengthened her work considerably. The paragraphing of the book is often wretched; it is far too much cut up, as in this instance from page 162:—

A hearty, good-tempered girl anyone might have thought.
Yet black hatred held possession of Maggie's heart.

Hatred of Cassin.

In spite of what she had said, she loved Andrew as never before.

She meant to have him too.

This is the method of the penny novelette, and prejudices the effect of the story. Many pages suffer from this blemish, which neither publisher nor author should have permitted. The composition occasionally is heavy. Maggie, restless and discontent, "had no intention of giving her idle fingers work to do; unless, indeed, drumming them upon the window-ledge could be considered in that light." "These were lustily greeted by the query, 'Any coals, George?—Billie?—or Thomas?' as the case might be." "A third person, had such been privileged to be present. . . ." These phrases will illustrate our point; but, curiously, when severity and restraint are absolutely essential, as in the excellently-conceived situation (p. 121) where Maggie, flouted by Grainger, reviles him, and then, in a revulsion of feeling, calls him back, an attempt at ease and lightness spoils the whole thing:—

Lorry, even if he heard her call, was little likely to come back. He was only too glad to get away. He felt sick, physically sick, cruelly ill-used. Such things the girl had said! Oh! oh!—for once he wanted his mother.

What a devil of a dog, to be sure!

This is extremely amateurish, and a very great pity, for on the previous pages the scene is nearly flawless. As to the dialect, with many years' close knowledge of Cornwall, its ways, and its people, we must decline to accept it as possessing much verisimilitude. It is not much use writing phrases such as the following:—

"It isn't dark keeps of she 'up to.'"

"I do suppose it belongs to be a change."

A Cornish man or woman would be more likely to say, "A change be comen, sure enough;" but, however correct they may be, they convey nothing to the reader who has not lived in the West Country, and dialect laboriously reproduced makes readers impatient. And, surely, there was no need to explain in a footnote that the "parish lantern" means the moon?

We have noted these drawbacks to the author's work at some length simply because it is worth while to do so. Few authors can convey the charm of Cornwall well. Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch can do it; Mr. Hugh Walpole did it exquisitely in "The Wooden Horse;" Mrs. Fred Reynolds has done it in many parts of this book; and if in future work she will exercise a little drastic self-criticism, those of her readers who know and love the county will be better pleased, while those on whom the magic spell has not yet fallen will more nearly comprehend its possibilities.

The Pink Shop. By FERGUS HUME. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

THE Pink Shop lay somewhat conspicuously, being painted pink, in a narrow lane off the High Street, Kensington, and was the abode of Madame Coralie, who beautified Society ladies. It was got up in the Oriental style with—Arabesque fancies, interspersed with poetic sentences from the poems of Sadi, Hafiz, and Omar Khayyám, written in flowery Turkish script. Broad divans of pink silk filled in various alcoves, masked by pierced horseshoe arches of thin white-painted wood. In the centre bubbled a tiny fountain from a basin of snowy marble.

This ensemble Mr. Fergus Hume considers "looked very much like an ordinary drawing-room." Obviously the difference from an ordinary drawing-room was very slight, but just enough to make the Pink Shop an ideal place for a quiet murder. So the murder took place, and as the police gave it up after one guess, most of the other characters in the story took up the question, especially the daughter of the murdered lady, her fiancé, and a lady detective. They asked everyone they could think of whether they had committed the crime, but being baffled by denials, did not know what to make of it. But when the beautifier's husband was accused he said he only wanted to steal the diamonds, and added further that the lady in question was not dead at all. Thereupon Madame Coralie confessed that she was the murdered lady, and that the lady who was really murdered was Madame Coralie, and that she, the lady who was not murdered, had murdered her. The company seemed to think this in rather bad taste, so she disappeared in a convenient fog, and went to the seaside. There she found her husband on the pier with still another lady. Embracing him she plunged with him into the sea. Both drowned, and only two thousand a year was left for the daughter, who was really someone else's daughter. Thereupon the daughter and her husband (she had been married in the meantime) booked their passages to Australia. It is an artless tale, and we have only to find fault with the price and the binding. The former should have been a penny, and the latter shiny paper with a coloured picture of the corpse on the front.

Tom Stapleton, the Boy Scout. By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON.
(Blackie and Son. 3s. 6d.)

If any writer of boys' books may lay claim to rival Henty as well in the quantity and variety of his output as in the unflagging zest of relating adventure and the judicious combination of excitement and morality, it is Captain Brereton. He knows all the difficulties of juvenile fiction, and overcomes them with unfailing skill. It requires no little dexterity, for example, to make youngsters of fourteen and fifteen rival the deeds of muscular heroes without too great improbability, and this is a necessity of all boys' books. In this volume, which is dedicated by permission to Sir Robert Baden-Powell, and becomes as a consequence in some measure an official saga of the Boy Scouts, Captain Brereton relates the doings of the Slimington Scouts in following a pair of criminals through the countryside, and another pair right across the Atlantic Ocean. Two of them, Tom Stapleton and his chum, have a violent encounter with the quarry in a stable loft at night, and more than hold their own. Later on the Scouts succeed where the police have failed in tracking a motor-car across England by the marks of its tyres. Such deeds are of the right stuff, and not less sweet for being a trifle unlikely. Tom, who is an Eton boy and the ward of the local squire, is the object of several attempts at kidnapping and murder because he stands between his father's half-brother and a considerable fortune. The villains succeed in casting him into mid-Atlantic, but he reappears serenely on an iceberg, where the ship has grounded almost as if by appointment. The culprits escape for the moment, but are tracked to the neighbourhood of Winnipeg, and there is an exciting chase to the finish. A good deal of the technical side of boy-scouting is here shown, and helps to make a thoroughly good yarn still more interesting.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

LE GYMNASE

THOSE who a century and a half ago loitered in the old cemetery adjoining the Église Bonnenouvelle would have been vastly surprised if one had told them that in after-years a playhouse, destined to become one of the leading theatres of the French capital, would be erected on the same site. The instability of all things is well known, especially in France where, according to the celebrated axiom, "Tout passe, tout lasse, tout casse." Thus it happened that in 1820 the Gymnase-Dramatique opened its doors for the first time. But, as vaudevilles were already represented on the boards of six Parisian theatres, it was deemed preferable to have recourse to a stratagem in order that the authorisation granted to the new theatre should not appear too palpably a privilege. It was accordingly decided that the Gymnase should be allowed to open on the express stipulation that only single acts of a play were performed there, and that these should be interpreted by young students of the Conservatoire.

Such an exaction on the part of the Théâtre Français was not considered particularly extraordinary, for it had always used and abused its many prerogatives. We see that in the eighteenth century it had even the power of depriving other theatres of plays thought interesting for its own use, whilst under similar circumstances it calmly appropriated those actors whose talents were deemed sufficiently mature to grace the first stage of France. The conditions thus exacted caused the Gymnase to become a sort of "rehearsal theatre," where budding geniuses were allowed to flutter mildly before spreading their wings to undertake the great flight towards the dazzling heights of the Opéra Comique and the Comédie Française. It thus formed one of the favourite resorts of Parisian girlhood of that period; the sedate jeunes filles of the time went there accompanied by their mothers, and listened religiously to the romantic "tirades" declaimed by the juvenile actors. It is even amusing to note how very far the Gymnase has strayed from its original programme, for it is to-day one of the French stages on which the most ultra-modern plays are represented.

The management of the Gymnase soon neglected, however, to observe the regulation concerning the portions of plays presented, and substituted complete comedies in place of the mutilated samples at first given. The real inauguration of the theatre took place when "La Visite à la Campagne," a comic opera in two acts, and a comedy entitled "La Maison en Loterie," preceded by a prologue signed Eugène Scribe, were produced. This is the first occasion that the name of that well-known dramatic author appears on the playbills of the Gymnase, although from that time forth most of his plays faced "les feux de la rampe" on the stage of that playhouse. He even signed a contract with the management of the Gymnase, according to which he was forbidden to write for any other theatre. Scribe's plays proved the making of the Gymnase, for, although many modern writers now affect to mock and adversely criticise him, he still remains for all that a great dramatist. He possessed especially the faculty of knowing thoroughly the taste of the period, which was an epoch of transition between two forms of government of the most different types. Brazier, who was certainly one of the best authorities on theatrical matters of that time, says, speaking of Scribe:—

Scribe a bien compris son temps; il a parfaitement senti qu'il se plaçait entre deux aristocraties, la vieille et la nouvelle; il a compris surtout que nous n'étions plus dans l'âge d'or, mais dans l'âge de l'or; il a voulu avoir pour lui tout ce qui possédait, mais il ne fallait heurter personne. Il a dû se dire: "Si je flatte les idées du temps passé aux dépens de celles du temps actuel, je n'aurai qu'un public. En les confondant, j'en aurai deux." Et alors il a refait la société moderne avec tous les éléments de l'ancienne. . . . Il a, dans ses ouvrages tout sacrifié à l'argent, l'idole du siècle. . . . Les plus jolis ouvrages de M. Scribe sont tous parsemés d'or et d'argent.

Scribe's plays drew to the Gymnase all the theatre-going public of the best classes, so that the prosperity of the new playhouse provoked much discontent, and numerous attempts were made to check its good fortune. The management, however, took a happy initiative which assured its success for some time to come. Madame la Duchesse de Berry received an humble petition, signed by the management of the Gymnase, asking her to deign to patronise their unworthy theatre, stating that they ventured to address her this solicitation as she had graciously seemed pleased by the acting of the little Léontine Fay, who had been playing for some time at the Gymnase, after having met with immense success in Germany. Her Royal Highness condescended to grant her patronage, and the 8th of September, 1824, the Gymnase took officially the title of "Théâtre de Son Altesse Royale, Madame la Duchesse de Berry." But, as that name was considered rather lengthy, it was shortened to "Théâtre de Madame," by which denomination it was more generally known. Thus protected, the Gymnase ranked directly after the larger playhouses, coming "after the Odéon."

From that time its vogue continued to increase steadily, and this is hardly surprising, as the actors and actresses forming part of its troupe were amongst the best of their time. To mention only one, we will cite Virginie Déjazet—the wonderful Déjazet—who created a real school amongst comedians, and who remains indisputably the most exquisite “disease” of the last century.

The Gymnase had reached the zenith of its prosperity when a play signed “Scribe and Rougemont” compromised momentarily its success. The play itself, be it said, obtained a real triumph; never had the house rung with such thunders of applause. Both authors had rivalised with each other in wit, and each word drew blood. But the subject was far too audacious, being a bitter and satirical criticism of French society under the ancien régime. Madame la Duchesse de Berry, hearing of its obnoxious tendency, manifested her extreme discontent by withdrawing her patronage. The management was so distressed by this painful incident, that, after lengthy negotiations, her Royal Highness consented to continue to extend her protection to her favourite theatre on the express understanding that similar productions should never again be represented. The Gymnase was thus restored to favour.

This was not the only time that Scribe, subtle as he was, had seen one of his plays attacked. Even he, the favourite of the public, had occasionally incurred the displeasure of his audiences. For in a comedy called “Le Combat des Montagnes,” which he wrote in collaboration with M. Dupin, he had sketched the character of a young and extremely pretentious shopman, whom he had named Calicot—term which has ever since remained proverbial to designate personages of that type; and one night, a crowd of young men belonging to the category they believed insulted caused the curtain to be lowered by their objectionable whistling and shrieking. They even went so far as to threaten the manager if he had the audacity of continuing to represent the comedy. But the police soon intervened, and the cabal ended by being the best possible advertisement for M. Scribe.

The new vogue of the Gymnase was fated to be momentarily broken by the advent of the Revolution of July, which obliged Madame la Duchesse de Berry to flee, and forced the Théâtre de Madame to re-assume its former modest name. For a time its destiny seemed compromised, as Scribe, not content with the successes obtained by his plays “Le Mariage de Raison,” “Le Diplomate,” “Avant, Pendant et Après,” became ambitious of still greater triumphs. He ceased to write exclusively for the Gymnase; but the manager, being a practical man, engaged other writers, such as Melesville and Bayard, whose plays, “Michel Perrin” and “Le Gamin de Paris,” achieved enormous success. The latter play especially drew full houses during the Revolution of July, when Bouffé interpreted the part he had created. It is of this actor that Brazier declares:—

Bouffé était le comédien le plus fin, le plus nuancé, le plus parfait, le plus amusant, le plus comédien de tous les comédiens, l'homme qui jouait un rôle comme Molière l'aurait créé, l'acteur de la raison, l'acteur de la folie, l'acteur des larmes. Bouffé en veste, portant casquette et col débraillé, jouant à la toupie sur la scène du Marivaux moderne, criant, chantant, sautant, se débattant, tirant la langue aux passants. C'est “Le Gamin de Paris” qui, sous le bon plaisir de Bouffé, a contribué à la Révolution du Gymnase en 1835, comme le vrai gamin a pu revendiquer sa petite part dans le grand drame insurrectionnel de 1830.

In 1844 the management passed into the hands of Montigny, an ex-actor, known especially as being the author of a grotesque drama, “Amazampa ou la Découverte du Quinquina;” but as a manager he proved himself extremely capable, and engaged for his theatre some marvellous actors, amongst whom Geffroy, one of the greatest artists who ever appeared on a French stage. It is about him that the following amusing anecdote is narrated:—

An actor, named Firmin, who had the misfortune of having a very bad memory, was acting in a new play the part of Camille Desmoulins. The personality of Fouquier Tinville was represented by Geffroy, and in this particular scene he was supposed to refuse the condemned man the right of defending himself. Camille Desmoulins (Firmin) then used to exclaim vehemently:—“Ah! you miserable scoundrel, monster of a . . . !” He could not remember the name he ought to pronounce! He tried vainly to do so—repeated the words—but the name did not for all that recur to him. The prompter, being young and inexperienced, and far more interested in the expression of Geffroy's physiognomy than in the M.S. of the play, awoke suddenly to the gravity of the situation. In his agitation he threw wildly to Firmin the name of Geffroy, which Firmin, in his distress, repeated unconsciously:—“Ah! you miserable scoundrel, monster of a Geffroy!”

Needless to say that the most pathetic situation of the play was thus greeted with a long and hearty peal of laughter.

In 1845 the Gymnase welcomed a new recruit in the person of Rose Chéri, who became later Madame Montigny. She played for the first time in “La Belle et la Bête,” and, although making her début in the rôle of an ingénue, which she acted with a delightfully naive candour, she soon acquired much celebrity by her personifications of the characters of great amoureuses. It was Rose Chéri who assured the success of “Le Gendre de Monsieur Poirier” and “Le Demi-Monde,” plays which now both form part of the répertoire of the Comédie Française. For, a fact curious to note, the Gymnase has ever been a sort of trial-scene for the “Théâtre de Molière.” Scribe's position at the Gymnase in the early 'thirties was later occupied by Emile Augier, Alexandre Dumas fils, and Victorien Sardou. For henceforth the Gymnase completely abandoned its former standard of plays; it no longer presented innocuous productions for the edification of “young persons” so dear to the hearts of many well-intentioned though misguided people. It now either staged works based on social or psychological theses, in which the situations were subtly analysed and dissected, or comedies in which satire and wit abounded. After the prodigious success of “Le Demi-Monde,” Dumas fils next triumphed with “Le Fils Naturel,” in 1858, whilst two years later Victorien Sardou, the master-dramatist, scored his first real recognition by the public with “Pattes de Mouche.” The Gymnase next produced in rapid succession “Don Quichotte” and “Les Bons Villageois;” at the first night of the latter the enthusiasm of the audience knew no limits, and Sardou's name was announced amidst frenzied acclamations. Somewhat later the whilom Théâtre de Madame was to know nights of turbulence and discussion when “Les Idées de Madame Aubray,” by Dumas fils, was represented, for the audacity of the theme, exposed and defended, shocked many persons. The chief protagonists of this fine work were Porel, the now eminent director of the Vaudeville, and the beautiful Mme. Pasca.

The Gymnase has witnessed the débuts of many of the leading actors and actresses of our time, amongst whom we must not omit to mention Lucien Guitry, whose fame is universally recognised, and whose marvellous creations are innumerable. It was also on the stage of the Gymnase that Mme. Simone appeared for the first time in public in “Le Détour,” by Bernstein; whilst it was also at this house that she rose to celebrity in “Le Retour de Jérusalem,” by Maurice Donnay, a curious and highly developed psychological study of the differences existing between the characters of Jews and Christians. For some years past the Gymnase has been scoring triumphs with the delightful comedies by Flers and Caillavet, most of which have been translated into English. They are the essence of Parisianism—light, amusing, witty, and yet containing in their apparent light-heartedness a very sound and deep philosophy of life. "Papa," the latest work of these charming authors, is at present valiantly rounding the Cape of Fortune.

As will have been seen, the history of the Gymnase is not so curious or complex as that of some of the other old theatres of Paris, and yet in many respects it presents a more serious interest, as being the stage on which many of the greatest actors of the last century assured the success of some of the most renowned chefs d'œuvre. It has not either been dedicated to one particular kind of play like so many of its rivals of the capital; it has staged indistinctively comedies, dramas, and even farces, thus remaining by the very variety of its productions one of the truest incarnations of the Parisian tone and spirit.

MARC LOGÉ.

THE NEWEST CHORALISM

WE frequently hear the question put as to where the modern composer of orchestral music is leading us; but not so frequently by any means do we hear such a question as to the trend of choral music. Yet choral music is passing through a revolution as vital, and in its way as striking, as that through which the orchestra and its music is passing. The developments of choral-singing brought about by the wonderful technique of choirs under such trainers as Henry Coward, A. S. Vogt, and Siegfried Ochs have aroused a new and keener interest on the part of the public in the manner of rendering standard works, and of composers in the possibilities of new effects and new methods of expression. This has been the case particularly in England, where choral music fills the place which in Germany is occupied by the orchestra. Sir Edward Elgar was the first to realise this fully, and in "The Dream of Gerontius" he indicated some of the lines on which the development is taking place. He was closely followed by Professor Bantock in "Omar Khayyám," Rutland Boughton in "Midnight," Frederick Delius in "Sea Drift," and many others whose work, if less striking, is nevertheless helping forward the cause of the higher and more detailed choral singing. What are the actual possibilities of the human voice with regard to varied and contrasted tone quality is a question that has been strongly debated by the theorists, but as a rule the experiments of composers have been confined to the method of using the voices rather than to the quality of the voices themselves. Almost too great a realisation of the limitations of their material has kept their experiments within certain bounds, and, while the contrast between voices nominally as well actually of a different timbre and the descriptive force of verbal and tonal onomatopœia have been utilised, the varied characteristics of voices nominally the same have not attracted the attention they deserve.

Now, however, Professor Granville Bantock has come forward with two short works in which he has made use of these varied characteristics. The words he has chosen for his experiments are two choral odes from Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon," which admirably suit their purpose. One commencing "Before the beginning of years" he has set for mixed voices in twenty parts, and the other, "We have seen thee, O Love, thou art fair," for female voices in twelve parts, both without instrumental accompaniment. Some of the ideas as to the selection and division of the voices are suggested rather than expressed, and the composer certainly has made possible much more than the written music actually achieves. With first-rate choruses under conductors of the same standing effects as yet unheard will be obtained. In the former and longer of the two odes the voice-parts are grouped into five choirs, but as two are for female voices only, and two for male voices, the effect is practically that of three choirs of mixed voices. Of these three choirs one in six parts is to consist presumably (for it is not indicated) of robust voices, another in eight parts of light voices of flexible and expressive character, and the third in six parts for voices of the mixed quality of an ordinary chorus. "Not less than ten voices to each part" is the stipulation of the composer, and the requirement is the smallest possible to get a proper effect. It is also little short of the largest, for with many more the distinctive characteristics of the individual choirs might easily be lost. Further effects are obtained by contrasted expression and contrasted rhythm; such, for instance, occurring where the words "with weeping" are sung to sustained, dolorous notes at the same time as the words "with laughter" are sung to light, staccato accents. The total result is something quite new in the range of vocal effects, which should lead to further and even more exact definitions of vocal tone qualities. It will never be within the capabilities of inferior choirs to sing such works, but the study of them should do much to strengthen the improvement that the last decade has seen in choral-singing.

Apart from their experimental and technical sides, the two settings are pleasing little works, accentuating and enforcing the meaning of the words and aiding the appreciation of their rhythm. Their importance is not to be judged by their size, for since "Omar Khayyám" Professor Bantock has issued nothing more striking or meritorious than these.

"FALSE REFINEMENTS"

"THERE are some abuses among us," wrote Jonathan Swift to Isaac Bickerstaff, Esquire, "of great consequence, the reformation of which is probably your province. These are the deplorable ignorance that for some time hath reigned among our English writers, the great depravity of our taste, and the continual corruption of our style. . . . These two evils, ignorance and want of taste, have produced a third; I mean the continual corruption of our English tongue which, without some timely remedy, will suffer more by the false refinements of twenty years past than it hath been improved in the foregoing hundred."

Is there any period since English was written freely at which exactly the same words might not have been used with as much justice—and the same futility? Swift's experience is not of the sort to encourage self-appointed guardians of the language to write in the same uncompromising tone of the "false refinements" of modern style or to prophesy with the same sureness its final corruption. Only Swift himself could do proper justice to the completeness of the failure of his protest. The truth of the matter is that much which to the purist seems "corruption" deserves no stronger a word than change. Of the words against which Swift raised his bitter complaint nearly all have long since this passed into the language and hold there a well-established position. But have they enriched or corrupted it? Swift himself might hesitate to say "corrupted" now.

"The war," says he—for he was writing about the time of the "war of the Spanish Succession"—"has introduced abundance of polysyllables which will never be able to live many more campaigns." Then he gives a list of these unhappy words foredoomed to quick destruction. They are—"speculations," "operations," "preliminaries," "ambassadors," "pallisades," "communication," "circumvallation," "battalions." It was an unfortunate prophecy. They have all survived, though one of them at the cost of a single letter—a small price to pay for the distinction of becoming a part of the English language—and seven of the eight have been promoted from their special office, and have passed into the current speech.

Nor was Swift more successful in his protest against certain other words, "invented by some pretty fellows," which were "struggling for the vogue" against his bitter opposition. The victory rests with them; they have struggled successfully. "Sham," "banter," "mob," "bubble," "bully," and so forth—they are all in the vogue. Swift's ire in particular was roused—for Swift was always thoughtful for the dignity and purity of the Church—against the fashion of employing such terms as these in sermons. Because of that fashion, or in spite of it, the words have survived. Indeed, only one of the phrases against which he makes protest has proved weakly, the phrase "country put," and that though it has the authority of Addison behind it.

Against another form of "false refinement," however, Swift did raise his voice with a greater measure of success. That is to say, for one reason or another this particular "false refinement" has passed away. It was an unscientific anticipation of phonetic spelling. The "pretty fellows" of Swift's day sought to give a conversational sprightliness to their letters by writing the words as they spoke them. And they spoke them as badly as we speak them to-day.

"I couldn't get the things you sent for all about town—I thot to ha come down myself, and then I'd h' brot 'um; but I ha'nt don't, and I believe I can't do 't," and so forth.

Such is Swift's example of the "present polite way of writing." The trick has passed. It survives only with a few words such as can't and don't. But with these, unhappily the contractions seem in a fair way to become permanent. Mr. Shaw has already dropped the apostrophe. It may be that he is laying up much trouble in the future for German philologists. One would like to anticipate their theories on the relation between the two cants. Doubtless, if occasion is given them, they will produce something as ingeniously perverted as the German scholar's essay on the pretty housemaid's cry of "Lor do adun, Mr. Weller," in "Pickwick," which expression he found, after elaborate research, to be of Persian origin. That story is an awful warning to dramatists and novelists who attempt, sometimes laboriously, as does Mr. Shaw with the character of Drinkwater in "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," to represent the perversions of pronunciation in daily speech. In this matter Shakespeare showed the properer instinct. In the first few speeches which he gives to Fluellen he indicates roughly how, in his opinion, a Welshman would have spoken. The rest he leaves to the actor. One would like to see the novelist trust his readers in the same way. For it is well wherever possible to keep the written language free from the tricks of passing fashion in the spoken language. "If a man of wit," says Swift, "who died forty years ago, were to rise from the grave on purpose, how would he be able to read this letter? And after he had got through that difficulty, how would he be able to understand it?"

Swift's failure may well deter us from hastily proscribing new words. It is an unprofitable business. We must show an easy tolerance even to those of foreign extraction, and trust to a certain natural vigour which every language seems to have, a mysterious power, comparable only with the instinct of animals in their choice of food, by which it assimilates what is suited to it, and after a time rejects the rest. But there are other directions in which protest may be made to greater advantage.

Mr. Chesterton has written in one of his essays of the high danger to the language of the burden of dead metaphors and dead words—metaphors and words, that is, which are used in a colourless way, often, indeed, in an incorrect way, because the force of their origin and associations has been forgotten. That is profoundly true, but, curiously enough, we have to fear at the same time the contrary danger. It is becoming increasingly difficult for the language to enrich itself with any new phrases. A clever simile, let us say, in a political speech is at once caught up by half the newspapers in the kingdom. It is flung about, used and misused; quoted by some, stolen by others; sensitive people at once abandon it, and it is flung aside. For it has been circulated so freely even before it has had time to harden in the mould, that it loses at once all trace of its stamp. It is dead of senile decay before it is out of the cradle. It might have remained in the language as a living phrase; it is killed so quickly that in all probability it will not remain even as a dead phrase.

Many readers, and certainly all writers, will confess to having their own private Index of proscribed words and phrases. Much which such an Index contains will have been capriciously chosen; but there will be also a certain number of phrases, admirable in themselves, which are proscribed, and properly so, only because they have become too common and popular. It is a not infrequent and a melancholy experience to come suddenly, in a book of an earlier time, upon a phrase which is there in its original vigour, but has since been worried to death.

This burdensome use of clichés is one of the results of hurried writing; but there is another "false refinement" of modern style, coming from the same source, which is a heavier danger to the language. It is easier to say a thing quickly, as every one knows, in two words than in one, and in furiously hurried writing it is simplest to use nothing but superlatives. Thus unnecessary epithets and adverbs are piled one upon another. Few nouns or verbs are permitted to go about nowadays unattended. They must all have at least one adjective or adverb in their train. And so we are losing the fine, natural terseness of English speech. No language is richer in strong, short words. But they are rarely permitted to stand in their own strength. Their natural force is destroyed, for they are never left unqualified. "Excellent" has already lost its superlative force. Even reputable people will countenance the use of "very" before it. How long will it be before "unique," by the same process, has sunk to the position of a mere synonym of "strange"? So it is with many other words. The double superlative is the chief "false refinement" of our day, the real danger of voluminous and hurried writing, and a greater than the hasty introduction of new words because its effect is permanent. A superlative once robbed of its superlative force will never regain it.

There are two words which might well be expunged from the language, the words "very" and "somewhat." They do more harm to it than any dozen of foreign polysyllables together. They are the natural allies of every careless writer who may select his adjectives as loosely as he will, and with the help of these words raise them or reduce them to the strength required, and by the same token they are the determined foes of clear thought and precise speech. Nor is that all. "Very," useless enough in itself, has enlisted a battalion of other words to do occasional duty for it. And when "dreadfully" and "awfully," and "fearfully," and "terribly," and "horribly" have passed definitely into the written speech as mere synonyms of "very," have become colourless words whose whole duty is to give a spurious emphasis, the language will be doubly cursed; it will be the poorer for the want of those words in their natural sense, and the more verbose for their use where they are not required.

There are two reforms which might well be made in the interests of good English. The first, to be recommended to the Exchequer, is a small tax on adverbs. The second is for the Board of Education to enforce. It is that part of the daily lesson in English composition should consist of reading two or three columns of a newspaper, reports of political speeches by preference, and cutting out all the superfluous adjectives and adverbs. Thus the rising generation might be taught an economy in speech which its elders lack.

AN HISTORIC COUNTY TOWN

THERE is charm in a backwater which the hurrying stream of a river lacks. Under the fierce rays of a sun—for the nonce tropical—what is more delightful than to pull the bows of one's boat out of the surging current and laze under a canopy of fresh foliage in waters almost as still as those of a lake? To loiter thus appeals to us when the end of the busy season draws near and the dominant note in our minds is that of the futility and pettiness of its fussy demands. When a man comes back, like a giant refreshed, from a yachting cruise, from days of tramping over moors, from mountain-climbing, or such other holiday recreation as specially appeals to him, he is apt to be impatient of the charms of the backwater. A clean, sharp pull with the current of the river for or against him is more to his fancy.

Of the same charm are our backwater towns. Until a few years ago the county town of Sussex was such. Now it is being borne along the modern stream, and thus losing some of its old-time insularity. In days not far distant every man who came to stay in Lewes from beyond a circuit of say ten miles reckoned from the Castle was a "foreigner," until he had been under observation a quarter of a century or so. During this period of apprenticeship it sufficed if the native-born vouchsafed him a nod or passed a gruff time of day with him. This was the tone of the man in the street, but of course there was always a large cultured minority with whom unfeigned hospitality to the stranger within the gates of the town was a first principle.

There are few spots in England so favoured in natural situation or with which history has had more commerce than the town of Lewes. Here you are in the very heart and core of Saxon England. The wide, silent spaces of the Downs lie all around, even as they did when King Alfred wandered a fugitive amongst them. Man's tillage and surface scratchings on their "broad backs" are almost as transient as cat-paw foam flecks on the all-girdling sea.

Climb to the crest of Mount Harry and you cross the battlefield of Lewes, a spot sacred to the liberties of England. Tennyson knew this countryside well—at the Bay Tree Inn, Seaford, he wrote his "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington"—and yet in his lines on "The Third of February, 1852" he penned this extraordinary lapse:—

And you, my Lords, you make the people muse
In doubt if you be of our Barons' breed—
Where those your sires who fought at Lewes."

At Lewes the Barons of England overthrew an intolerable tyranny. The lineal descendants of Simon de Montfort, the popular hero of that struggle, are happily still with us. It must not be forgotten that he was a powerful noble and brother-in-law of the King. He fought with a gaunt army of half-starved men behind him. There is no argument against an empty stomach. Magna Charta had been wrung from the unwilling King John by a former generation of Barons. In 1258 a Council was held between the King and his Barons at Oxford, and in October of that year the Oxford Statutes were proclaimed in Latin, French, and English. This fact alone made the proclamation memorable, for no State paper had ever before been promulgated in the English tongue. It soon became obvious that the people were to be duped by a specious misuse of language. In 1261, during the absence in France of Simon de Montfort, King Henry threw off his disguise and abrogated the Statutes. Civil war was the result. The Earl of Warren held Lewes Castle for the King, and in 1264 the opposing forces met. De Montfort and his small force, made up mostly of tatterdemalions, had to pick their way through the vast forests which at the time covered the Weald. Henry, with seasoned soldiers, had advanced from Seaford across the Downs. The forces headed by De Montfort and the Barons passed the night before the battle in vigil and prayer, and each soldier bore on breast and back a white cross. They clambered up the downside near Coombe Place, and struck across the crest of the hill toward the town of Lewes, where the Royalist forces lay. Now occurred one of those incidents which show how strangely men's standards have changed. De Montfort's advance-guards in the grey dawn came upon the enemy and could have easily overcome them, had "such villainie" been permissible under the rules of the game. But the laws of chivalry forbade. The foe had to be informed ere an attack could fairly be made upon them. Each side therefore manoeuvred and marshalled its forces.

The King, whose base was Lewes Castle, marched up from Southover. De Montfort's disposition of his troops proves him to have had a keen, soldierly eye for tactical advantage. The details of the fight are to modern ideas quaint in the extreme. The King advanced behind the royal banner, on which was emblazoned a "dragon full austere." He shouted as he came, "Simon, je vous défie." Prince Edward's fiery attack from the royal right scattered De Montfort's left wing, and with the impetuosity of youth the Prince pursued his flying enemy along the Coombe to the north of the town. De Montfort instantly seized his advantage. He swung his right wing upon the centre and left of the foe. The result was that after a fierce contest the Royalists broke and fled. The King, badly wounded, was borne off the field and narrowly escaped capture, and, as Charles Kingsley used to say with gusto, "then began a murder grim and great." The royal forces still held the castle, and to this Prince Edward cut his way on his return from victorious pursuit in the afternoon. During that troubled night, however, a body of seasoned royal troops fled from Lewes Castle to Pevensey Castle and thence to France. De Montfort, who appears to have been in advance of his age in humanity as well as in fighting skill, called an armistice. As a result the invested castle was ultimately surrendered, and Prince Edward and his cousin Prince Henry were delivered up as hostages to the Barons' forces. The Mise of Lewes, which followed, led to the summons to Parliament of knights, citizens and burgesses. It laid the foundation of our Parliamentary system. Truly the whirligig of Time brings in his revenges. The castle, perched high on a chalky knoll, still dominates the town. How often have travellers by railway remarked on the mediæval aspect of the town and the likeness of the castle to some stronghold on the Rhine!

The bones of William the Conqueror's daughter, Gundrada, and her lord, the Earl of Warren, were unearthed at the time of the making of the railway. Under the shadow of the castle, in 1077, sprang up the Priory. Its foundation-charter, after the manner of such documents, calls down "anger, wrath, vengeance and everlasting curses" on all such as should seek to invalidate its rights. In March, 1538, John Portmari, who had been deputed to destroy this ancient church, wrote to Lord Cromwell, the King's Vicar-General: "Now we ar pluckyng down an hygher vaute, borne up by fower thicke and grose pillars xiiij fote fro syde to syde abowt in circumference xlv fote." He says, moreover, that the Prior had been brought over to the side of the destroyers, "my Lord of Norfolk's Grace promysing him to have all the goods of the monastery and one halfe the dettes."

On the high chalk ridges which overhung the wide tidal estuary, now the Ouse, and were themselves flanked by vast, impenetrable forests, the Romans threw up earthworks. These were the strongholds of other dominant races who in their turn held sway. Perhaps Phœnician craft have landed swarthy pirates on the bases of these hills. At the summit of Firls Beacon, a few miles away, is an old earthwork having an orientation held to indicate a cult of Oriental worshippers of dim antiquity. The crest of Mount Caburn is ringed with huge earthworks, whose origin probably goes far beyond Roman times. In Edward the Confessor's day, so "Doomsday" tells us, the King had 127 burgesses in Lewes, vassals who could be lawfully sent overseas to fight his battles. The same document records that the seller and buyer of a horse had each to pay to the Mayor one penny, those of an ox one-halfpenny, and those of a man fourpence.

It would be easy to gossip on about this old-world quarter of England if we had the space. Monuments of masterful Elizabethans are to be found in most of its many churches. Perhaps the epitaph of the Earl of Warren and of Alicia his Countess, who died at the Priory in 1255, may not inappropriately sum up its strange, eventful history:—

Vous qe pazez on bouche close
Priez pur cely ke cy repose
En vie come vous estis jadis fu
Et vous tiel serretz come je su.

LONELINESS

IF you were to ask a child what he meant by loneliness he would probably say, "Being alone." Then if you were unwise you would say, "Yes, I know; but what else does it mean?" And if you were exceedingly stupid you would fetch the dictionary and read aloud something about "A state of solitude, hence lone, lonely, alone," for it is the mark of the perfect fool that he regards children as ignorant until they have been educated.

The truth is that the definitions of children usually have an illuminating quality denied to dictionaries. Or, to put it in another way, intelligent children are naturally gifted in the art, whereas dictionaries restrict themselves to the science of definition. The description of loneliness is an instance. It requires intuition and imagination to recognise the value of the child's definition. It is a matter of sympathy and appreciation. But the dictionary announces a fact which no argument can withstand. It calls for the direct negation or assent of reason.

To a self-conscious person, be he nine or ninety, being alone does not necessarily imply loneliness; but to the child, who is a child by virtue of the fact that he has not yet attained to self-consciousness, there is perhaps no definition equally true. A child alone, with his attention unabsorbed in some occupation, is always lonely. To find some resistance to the outgoing of his little spirit he will fly to anybody or anything. A coalman is not too ugly nor a telegraph-post too unresponsive. It is this gregariousness, this instinctive fear of loneliness which makes children exercise their fancies so wonderfully that a ragbag may become a royal wardrobe or a broken chair an Atlantic liner. Incidentally it is this which makes the amateur lover of children grow utterly weary after the first hour of their company.

A child has no reserve, and truly he expects none. His little mansion stands wide open to every passer-by. Wipe your boots, and though you be the poorest beggar in the land he will show you over from basement to roof (he has no cellars), even inviting you to spend the night if you so much as show your pleasure. You may really be a most undesirable person—children are royally entertaining the most objectionable people every day—but if you have a kind heart here is one who is always ready to esteem it above coronets. Companionship is all he asks, and if you deny it he will surround himself with the people of his imagination, and make the very furniture companionable that his house may be full.

Or perhaps it would be truer to say that a child is the only destitute thing in the world. Without a sign of fear, he comes into the land of grown-up folk and with perfect naïveté proceeds to the inspection of their homes. He will spend as much strength in this work in one day as would weary a grown-up soul in a year. Good, bad, and indifferent, he passes sound judgment without equivocation. Show him welcome and he will lay all the jewels of his nature before you without a qualm, and if, like the basest of thieves, you try to filch one of them he will look at you with wonderment for a moment, but never question your right nor contend his loss.

Conscious as distinct from instinctive choice he has yet to learn. He has yet to discover that heart and mind can fall out. Alas, that he should ever find it possible! For the passage leading to maturity is a narrow isthmus strewn with wreckage. Alas, that he should so often make of instinct and of will the Scylla and Charybdis of his life!

The spirit of a child has no natural protecting boundaries. Left to himself he will take the moon into his hands and fill his pockets with stars as with marbles. And so he asks constant companionship to prevent his little ego from being dispersed to the four winds of heaven. He asks for boundaries as for sanity's sake we ask for limits in an infinite world. But these boundaries, like our own, must be wide or narrow according to his growth and capacity. The boundaries of last year will not do for this, and herein lies the whole art of retaining a child's confidence; if you make them too narrow he will become fretful like a spirit in prison. That is the meaning of a spirit child. If you make them too wide for his age or capacity he will suffer not merely the pain but the sheer terror of loneliness. There are parents so humane and so wise that year by year they move these boundaries back as a retreating army moves at night, until at last with the coming of self-consciousness he all unwittingly makes his own. Then the child that was becomes with equal gain to parent and to child the companion of age. Happy the man who has reached maturity unhampered by his bounds.

As we grow older loneliness ceases to be defined by being alone. It then becomes a question of the depth of self-consciousness. A healthy, well-grown soul may spend a whole day in solitude without ever experiencing the sense of loneliness. Self-consciousness, like a provident housewife, will have stores within himself—knowledge, and a multitude of past experiences, and with these he may be well employed and building the world of his imagination. The saints, though they valued solitude far more highly than we do, were not lonely men and women. But neither, it may be objected, is the constant reveller. Unhappily never since childhood has he attained the height where loneliness is possible. If he is not overwhelmed by the tide it is because he is constantly fleeing in fear of it. Let him stop for one moment and he will be drowned in loneliness.

The greatest misery of loneliness most often comes with adolescence. Outwardly it makes no show. Its victim has yet to know the arts of self-pity and indulgence. He cuts a brave figure with a heart like lead, wondering if he is going to spend the remaining years of his life in a kind of living death. It is the time when character waits its mould and self-consciousness still hovers on the brink. The bounds of childhood are gone, the self-determined bounds wait to be defined, and in the interim personality itself seems almost a myth. Doubts, fears, insane presentiments cloud the sky or surround the wayfarer like mist before dawn. The pitiable tragedy of Hamlet was that he had almost climbed out of such a slough of misery when the ghost of his father pulled him back into it. Such a state cannot long be endured, and Nature with her great providence has provided that this above all other times is the season when Love wakes the lonely soul and makes him king of the world. It is like that moment of silence in a concert when the whole orchestra waits the chord that shall usher in the fuller harmony. When it is passed would the emotion be so full, would the sense of gratitude be so great but for that instant when we suffered an agony of silence?

It is unhappy to think that for want of confidence in life, confidence in ourselves, and mistrust of one another much loneliness is needlessly endured. We will allow whole years to elapse before we discover that the friend we have been unconsciously seeking all the while happens to be living next door. We shroud ourselves in a cloud of reserve lest by any chance what is most excellent within might suffer rebuff. Like attracts like, and this is neither generous nor wise. Happily signs are not wanting that the fashion of such a day is passing away.

Perhaps some of the worst tragedies of loneliness are being suffered at this hour, for it is an age of rapid transition, and when the traffic of the world moves quickly the accompaniments of Juggernaut are hard to avoid. Never before has the mind of the "young person" been so awakened to possibilities. Never have such tremendous efforts been made by every educative means to give youth so wide a horizon. Thus the average well-educated girl has developed a capacity for companionship undreamt of by her mother. And to what end? In a thousand instances to be restrained and shut in to loneliness by every means that craven-hearted convention can devise. Taught to regard the world as a garden, they are required, under the hideous but well-meaning rule of parents, steeped in Victorian idealism, to learn also that nothing but the storming of the family garrison by some knight-errant will ever win for them other enfranchisement than liberty to command the household servants and to play the part of studied ennui at every social function of the house. Delicate, sensitive, yet ardent natures, words cannot paint the torture of their loneliness.

At the period of middle life most people are too busy to be lonely. Busy with the "busyness" of routine, or with that wasteful restlessness Wordsworth had in mind when he wrote—many a man has been bored into loneliness by just such a moment as inspired Wordsworth to that sonnet. Many a man spends the best years of his life in a kind of point-to-point race. His whole existence becomes one series of appointments, which he keeps with the regularity of a cogwheel. If he miss one there is the inevitable knocking. If the machinery stops, loneliness falls like the vacant silence in an engine-room. The man who lives in crowds carries his life like a cup for the lips of every tippler. The cup runs dry, and, lacking that reverie which is the joy of all retirement, is not refilled. When it does it cracks, and men put stones into it and rattle it to keep away crows.

The world is too much with us,

Of course "busyness" is not confined to the man of affairs with what is grotesquely miscalled his "well-ordered" life. His wife, with her household duties, her suzerainty over a world in miniature, often falls a victim to it. Actions which were once the expression of her care, her fortitude, her zest, or her love, become uninformed habits—joyless, apathetic things done for their own sake, or worshipped in the place of what they once expressed.

We do not speak a paradox when we say it is wise to cultivate solitude for fear of loneliness. Solitude is a rich, benign guest, the sweet and luscious autumn of the mind. Loneliness is a poor hungry ghost, an unwelcomed visitant at an empty board.

Old people are often needlessly commiserated for their loneliness. It has been said by some cynic that we spend the first half of our lives anticipating to-morrow, and the second half trying to recall yesterday. If we allow such a statement the modest quantity of truth common to cynicism, even so loneliness should not be the portion of old age. Doubtless there are moments when, in a flash of vision, old faces are upcalled and old scenes visualised with such clearness that the present stands in abeyance. When such visions fade as swiftly as they came, a sense of coldness, of isolation, and of great loneliness must ensue, even as it came to Mytyl and Tytyl in "The Blue Bird." But wise age knows with greater assurance than youth that it was for no material end that mortal friendship was enjoyed, nor aught else which falls to our lot in a material world. Neither is it for want of wisdom that he refrains from seeking fresh fields to conquer. It is his to survey with appreciation and enjoyment those territories which the past has made most really his own. The door of his house stands no longer open, but, though the house be empty save for himself, what things his old guests came to bestow remain. The freight of his soul is a heavy cargo. Let him pull down the blind and sit by the fire in solitude without loneliness. He of all men may cheerfully wait the call of Death as of one who will unload his hold and refurbish his tattered sails. He who has journeyed to the walls of the world can say with the authority that is without pride—

The battering of stubborn sense
This clay can understand;
Out of the great unknown Immense
I came to take my stand,
That I might learn at Time's expense
Eternity's command.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

THE past week has been a period of absorbing interest to the students of world politics. Much in the same way as with the destinies of family and community, there are moments in the grand affairs of nations when the detached observer can unravel the long and tangled skein of seemingly inconsequent incident and event and expose the end of definite purpose. To do so, however, it is necessary to emphasise that the quality of detachment is essential. If we take the history of the past week we shall find that this quality has, for the most part, been lacking wherever positive opinion has been permitted to express itself in print.

The signing of the Russo-German Agreement has once more brought into the light of day two great purposes, which form the principal factors in world dynamics. These two purposes, it seems hardly necessary to say, are expressed in the policy of Germany, with the somewhat dubious support of her satellites, on the one hand, and of England, France, and Russia on the other. The ultimate irreconcilability which characterises the aims of the two groups makes it a difficult matter, even when such apparently satisfactory compromises as the recently concluded Agreement are effected, to deal with the problem, as it were, in compartments. When the difficulty is accentuated by the intrusion of partisan tendencies, truth is most likely to be conspicuous by its absence. Should this dictum be questioned, it is only necessary to refer to the comments of the German Press in order to establish its legality. But, first of all, perhaps, it would be as well to examine briefly not only the terms of the actual understanding arrived at, but also the raison d'être behind that understanding. When the Russo-Persian agreement prohibiting foreign railway enterprise within the Shah's territories terminated last year Germany was faced with the possibility of a Russian line extending to Teheran from the North—a possibility which, had it been allowed to materialise, would have threatened the economic value of the proposed Baghdad route. At the same time it was realised by Russian statesmen that Germany had at last a free hand to seek for railway concessions beyond the Turkish frontier, and it was not lost sight of that this "thin-end-of-the-wedge" privilege might conceivably bring her European neighbour's means of communication to within dangerously strategic proximity to the borders of the Tsar's dominions. Moreover, Russia had always been labouring under the disadvantage of having failed to secure German recognition of that special position occupied by her in Northern Persia, and defined clearly by the 1907 Agreement with Great Britain.

Such, then, were in the main the underlying motives which prompted the now historic meeting of the Emperors at Potsdam some ten months ago, and surely no one will deny that they constituted sufficient basis for negotiation. And now, to turn to the question of mutual concessions and advantages under the agreement, we find first of all that the preamble—the primary and essential clause in all international compacts determining the spirit in which the letter, as subsequently set forth, is to be interpreted—makes absolutely no mention of matters appertaining to the political relations of the two Empires. For the rest Russia has pledged herself to take the necessary steps towards building, within a stipulated time, a railway link between Khanakin and Teheran when the main Baghdad trunk-line shall have been completed under German auspices to the latter point. Apart from the somewhat unnecessary assurance that she need expect no opposition on the part of Russia to the construction of the Baghdad Railway Germany gains little else. As quid pro quo Russia has obtained that long-looked-for recognition of her paramount political interests in Northern Persia (inferentially this recognition must be interpreted as embracing the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907), thus affording her substantial relief from the potential menace of German aggression upon her frontiers in that particular part of the world. Surely, therefore, nothing was more natural than that these two Powers should have sought to come to an agreement over questions which, as we have indicated, were calculated, sooner or later, to raise a barrier between them.

The Potsdam Agreement, now for the first time made known to the world in the form of an international treaty, is remarkable chiefly for its clearly-defined limitations. In other words, it is a simple document which he who runs may read, and nothing in the nature of arrière pensée lurks behind any of its clauses. And yet an attempt is made to prove that this instrument was framed for the express purpose of drawing Russia away from her partners in the Triple Entente. It is even suggested that Germany timed the conclusion of the negotiations so as to bring pressure to bear upon France in the dispute now being waged between the two Governments. Moreover, a report, emanating from Vienna, is being widely circulated to the effect that, simultaneously with the published treaty, a secret understanding has been arrived at whereby the high contracting parties mutually agree to abstain from joining any combination directed against either the one or the other. While the history of the past few years leaves no room for doubt that in seeking to come to an understanding with Russia German statesmen surreptitiously endeavoured to impair the vitality of the Triple Entente, there is literally no ground for the supposition that this compact has in reality been weakened in the slightest degree. The facts are indisputable. Throughout the whole course of the negotiations, not excepting the final stages, Russia has kept her partners fully and frankly informed, and time after time responsible statesmen both in England and France have emphatically declared their complete concurrence with her action. No serious student of international affairs requires convincing that it would be impossible for Russia to play a dual part.

The day has not yet come for the friend and the ally of France to step resolutely across that narrow border which divides moral support from active assistance. But it is not inconceivable that positive co-operation between the three Powers may be necessary in the near future. At the present moment the outlook in Europe is dark and threatening. The optimistic tone of official utterances from Berlin and Paris is merely symptomatic of the extreme gravity of the situation. These utterances convey but one impression—that of excessive protestation; for they must be considered side by side with two utterly irreconcilable factors, the arrogant and humiliating demands of Germany and the proud refusal of France to submit to humiliation. The height of the crisis has yet to be reached. Meanwhile France need entertain no misgivings as to the part her friends will play when the crucial hour of her trial has arrived.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

IN view of the great extension of international motor touring during recent years, the proceedings at the thirteenth annual congress of the League of Touring Associations, which has just completed its sittings at Geneva, are of considerable interest to the motoring community. One of the principal subjects of discussion was that of the feasibility of establishing a universal and simplified "triptique" system, for the purpose of relieving the touring motorist from the inconvenience of having to deposit the substantial sums of money demanded by the various countries in which they desired to tour. In some cases these have amounted to as much as £700, so that it can readily be understood that many motorists have been debarred from the pleasures of Continental touring solely on account of the inconvenience of having to make such heavy deposits. The chief advocates of a simplified and universal "triptique" system were the representatives of the Automobile Association and Motor Union, Captain L. A. Kingston and the Secretary (Mr. Stenson Cooke), and, in spite of opposition on the part of other representatives, they were eventually successful in inducing the Congress to decide to suggest to the various Governments the summoning of an International Customs Congress to consider the means of bringing such a system into operation. The A.A. and M.U. deserves great credit for its strenuous efforts to smooth the way for the touring motorist. If successful, as seems likely to be the case, touring by motor-car on the Continent will be freed from its most serious remaining drawback, and immense impetus will be given to a movement which has already done so much to promote international understanding and amity.

In the opinion of many who, in spite of the phenomenally rapid strides that have recently been made in the development of the science of aviation, have not allowed their enthusiasm to outrun their judgment, the true functions of the flying-machine will be found to lie in naval and military service and in rapid postal work. So far as can be seen, aviation must always and necessarily be attended by risks which the average individual will not undertake, even for the delights which are presumably experienced by the chosen few who can "float in the wake of the evening star." In the utilisation of the aeroplane for naval and military purposes we are admittedly behind other countries, as we were in grasping the possibilities of the motor-car, but we have at any rate the satisfaction of knowing that to Great Britain belongs the honour of having established the first aerial postal service in Europe. A definite contract has been entered into with the Postmaster-General by the organisers of the "First United Kingdom Aerial Post" whereby on and from Saturday, September 9th, letters and postcards will be collected from special boxes located at some dozen of the most important business places in London and taken to a central post-office, whence they will be transmitted to the Hendon Aerodrome for conveyance by aeroplane to Windsor. The project is purely experimental, and the unique service will only be in operation for a limited period; but there is little doubt that it will be followed at no distant date by the inauguration of a permanent and regular aerial postal service.

A case of some interest to motorists generally was heard at the Lambeth Police-court the other day, when a private owner was summoned by the London County Council for "keeping a motor-car without a proper licence, and for delivering a declaration wherein the particulars required to be therein set forth were not fully and truly stated." It transpired that the defendant, when making application for his licence, delivered a declaration in which the particulars and cylinder measurements of his car were correctly stated, but in which he worked out the licence duty at four guineas, whereas, worked out by the Treasury regulations, the figures specified showed the car to be liable to the six-guinea tax. His contention was that the car, being an old one, did not develop the horse-power which its measurements indicated according to the official formula. Before making his declaration he had had the car carefully tested and found its actual horse-power to be such as to bring it within the four-guinea tax—a contention in which he was supported by the makers of the car. Of course, however, this defence was held to be invalid by the magistrate, who pointed out that the Treasury regulations made no distinction whatever between old and new cars. The result was that the defendant was ordered to pay a small fine for taking out an inadequate licence, whilst the summons for making an incorrect declaration was withdrawn.

The makers of the Victor Vest inform us that gratifying testimonies to the remarkable efficiency of the device as a factor in tyre economy are received from users by almost every post. Calling at the works of the Challenge Rubber Mills the other day to ascertain whether the Vest was maintaining its popularity, the present writer was shown a number of testimonials received on the same morning from private motorists. All were highly eulogistic, and several gave figures which showed that the Vest had enabled many hundreds of miles of additional running to be obtained from old covers which would otherwise have been discarded as useless.

The Rover Company, Ltd., of Coventry, desire to draw the attention of owners of "Rovers" to the fact that they are always glad to hear from them as to the running of their cars, and to write them fully giving any advice they may require in the matter of care and upkeep.

A NEW FACTOR IN MOTORING.

The best is generally good enough for most people; but generally most people are lamentably unsuccessful in getting the best. How, for example, may the motorist get the best tyre? It is the matter of moment to him; but only the costly experiment will answer the question satisfactorily.

If he could exhaustively test every tyre on the market until the best had been determined; if his years of experience and an expert knowledge of rubber and its preparation, had given him ideas for improvement which he could incorporate in that best tyre, and again exhaustively test until he was entirely satisfied with the results, he would be able to claim that he had the best. Is that not so?

Then we have the best tyre because that has been our method. With entire liberty of choice we made our selection, incorporated our ideas, entered into a binding contract with the manufacturers (a firm of the highest reputation and experience), and produced—the VICTOR TYRE. Indisputably the VICTOR TYRE is the best.

The VICTOR VEST continues its extraordinary successful career. The VICTOR VEST is a new foundation, and a new life, for any old cover. It prevents punctures and bursts, and enables the cover to be run to its last shred of tread. We give a written guarantee that it will save 50 per cent. on normal tyre cost—£5 on every £10 spent on tyres.

These two make a new factor in motoring. With the VICTOR RETREADS (sound covers for unsound free) they make the most effective trio available to the motorist to-day. We shall be glad to prove that.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

SINCE I last wrote a railway strike has begun and ended—ended in a complete victory for the Companies. The men, however, will obtain a rise in wages, which, after all, is what they desire, and the Companies will obtain the right to advance rates, which is also what they have been struggling to accomplish for a long time past. Thus both sides ought to be happy. But the strike will have done more than this, for it has taught us that if we desire to end these perpetual labour struggles we must enforce labour contracts just as we enforce all other contracts. If a man belongs to a Union, and if that Union makes an agreement on his behalf, then the organisation must be responsible, and the members themselves must be responsible. It is impossible to enforce labour contracts against the workmen separately, and they can only be made valid through their Unions. The railway men had absolutely no right to strike, and strikes out of sympathy must be rigidly forbidden. They must be made illegal, otherwise we get a tyranny which can only end in revolution. Mr. Asquith, no doubt, did perfectly right to call in the aid of the military, and the men behaved very sensibly in submitting. But military rule in a democratic country like England is extremely dangerous, as we have seen in the case of Llanelly. We had another instance of the danger, and indeed futility, of military rule in the great American railway strike, where many hundreds of people were killed and the whole trade of the United States disorganised and crippled for some years. Hard-and-fast rules cannot be made in a country like England. Compromise is the very essence of government. Last week I complained of the incompetence of Mr. Lloyd George as a Chancellor. This week I must praise his marvellous powers as a mediator. Neither Mr. Asquith, who tried bullying, nor Mr. Buxton, who tried suave officialism, could make the smallest impression on the labour men. But Mr. Lloyd George, who has a flair for peacemaking, settled the whole question very quickly. The railway strike has shown the Liberal party who is their real master. It is not the Prime Minister, but the Chancellor.

Markets have naturally been dull and depressed during the whole week, but prices have not fallen as much as one would have expected. In plain truth, the bear has shown himself a most useful animal, and I cannot understand why bear tactics are not more encouraged on the Stock Exchange. If everybody were allowed to sell short just as they are in the United States we should have much stronger and steadier markets. But in England we all buy at the same time, rush prices up to an unhealthy level, and invite a collapse—which always comes. The Stock Exchange has been bearish for weeks past, and when the railway strike came the bears thought it a good opportunity to buy back. As a result, if we add the dividends to the present quotations we shall find that the heavy Home Rails have fallen very little.

MONEY.—The money markets have been fairly steady. There is no demand from the speculative point of view, and prices are sufficiently low to release a great deal of money that is usually employed when quotations are at a high figure. Copper and rubber, two speculative commodities, are only half the price they were some time back. Thus many millions have been freed. The Bank of England has gradually strengthened its position, and its ratio of reserve to liabilities is now very high. Its actual cash in hand is also above the average. The great banks on their side are carrying much larger supplies of cash than they usually do. Indeed the Bank of England and the joint stock banks have been taking in sail for some months past. There is no doubt that they were completely scared by the Birkbeck Bank failure, so scared that rather than permit the Yorkshire Penny Bank to collapse they took the unusual course of taking it over themselves and guaranteeing the assets. It is said in the City that there is further banking trouble ahead of us. This is possible, for banks that have invested a large portion of their funds in gilt-edged stocks and have failed to write them down are now face to face with a very serious depreciation.

FOREIGNERS.—All foreign stocks, except the gambling counters, keep as steady as a rock. There is not the smallest attempt to sell. On the contrary, it would almost seem as though there had been some buying. For instance, Egyptian Unified have actually risen, and Russians are steady at higher prices. Perus, in which there was once a bull account, have naturally fallen, and Tintos, also a great gambling counter on the Paris Bourse, have been weak. Such stocks as these we expect to find weak in days of trouble.

HOME RAILS.—The man who has courage will buy Home Railway stocks to-day. Of course the really wise purchased last account, when the heavy stocks were full of dividend. Notwithstanding the semi-panic in this market last week, the fall was nominal, for if we added the dividends we should find that Great Westerns, Midland deferred, Brums, Great Easterns had fallen very little. North-Easterns have of course their own special troubles to face. But even they are quoted at 128 ex-dividend, which would leave them 131½. Lancashire and Yorkshire are 96½ ex-dividend. As we have pointed out, the Companies, although they have lost considerably in traffics during the past six weeks, will certainly recoup themselves next year in the advance in rates. North-Eastern traffics are certain to be bad, for they have had now nearly a week of disturbance. But all the lines will show serious losses, especially in the passenger traffics. Losses in goods traffic will probably be made up when the goods go forward. People having goods to send must send them. But passenger traffic, once lost, cannot be regained.

YANKEES.—The American market has not recovered, and Unions still remain the one weak spot. Lovett denies all the bear rumours; and declares the line is in perfect order and business good. Nevertheless thousands of shares are sold, and quite 50 per cent. of the stocks sold are on bear account. Atchisons keep steady, no doubt in the hope that shareholders will get a plum out of the hundred million convertible bonds that are to be issued after the meeting on October 26th. The Atchison proposes to acquire 242 miles from Needles to Mojaava. Although it is part of the Atchison main line system, it really belongs to the Southern Pacific, who leased it to the Atchison in 1885. Eventually Atchison will double track its system from Chicago to San Francisco. It seems that some arrangement has been come to with the Southern Pacific for an immediate purchase instead of waiting till the end of the lease, which expires in 1979.

RUBBER.—From the point of view of the shareholder, rubber continues to be a depressing memory. Prices do not move, and reports from all the outside shows are gloomy. It will be remembered that the Henriquez Estates, a rubber company owning a plantation on the Isthmus of Panama, issued a prospectus promising the usual gigantic profits. The public were not in the mood for rubber, and the issue was a failure; but the promoters found the necessary money and marketed the shares at a huge premium during the boom. As there was very little chance of a Castilloa plantation in Panama ever paying a dividend the same promoters sold off a portion of the property to the Henriquez South, and again marketed the shares at a substantial premium. They now have the audacity to issue a circular asking shareholders in both companies to allow a combine to take place, and they propose to assess the shares. Therefore the two companies, whose total capital was £76,000, are now to be capitalised at £100,000, although they have been conspicuous failures. Practically nothing is said about rubber in the circular, but the whole talk is of timber. Mr. Gillingham, who was put forth as a great rubber expert, now poses as a reporter on the timber prospects, and altogether the whole thing is extremely impudent, and no shareholder in either company should dream of joining the reconstruction. It is useless to throw good money after bad.

OIL.—Shells have hardened up during the past few days, and it is possible that they may improve still further. The Anglo-Maikop Corporation, which reconstructed itself some little time back with the idea of giving the deferred shareholders ordinary shares in place of their deferred, and allowing them to sell out if they desired, has now issued its statutory report, by which we find that only 79,363 shares were applied for by the shareholders, who were offered 153,750. But there is a note appended to the report which states that there is a further sum of £38,213 due to the Corporation in respect of shares sold but not yet delivered. Can it be that these shares were taken up but not paid for? The meeting will be held on September 1st, and probably some shareholder will ask for an explanation of this curious item. It is possible, of course, that Anglo-Maikop has sold some of its other holdings to the Stock Exchange, which did not deliver them at the date of the statutory report.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir Market remains in a most depressed condition, and nothing seems to cheer it up, not even the record of gold for the month of July, which record, by the way, was obtained by poaching on the reserves of gold. Paris is quite determined to have no more to do with Kaffirs. The working costs appear to be going up, and the yield to be going down. The price of all the leading Kaffir shares is even now quite high enough, and the yield of most of the best is under 10 per cent. This is not enough, because as the life of the mine grows less so has the price of the share a tendency to fall out of all due proportion to the life. No one should invest in Kaffirs unless he can obtain a clear 10 per cent. on his money after allowing for amortisation.

RHODESIANS.—The Rhodesian Market goes from bad to worse, and during the past account one of the dealers failed. The matter was not of any importance, but it was nevertheless depressing, and prices did not improve in consequence. It seems hopeless to expect the big houses to do anything just now. Sir Abe Bailey takes very little interest, and he is really the only man who can lead the market to success. He now intends to lead a bride to the altar, which will be much easier and infinitely more satisfactory to himself. He is an extremely able man with an infinite capacity for making money.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Cements are very flat, but Marconis are quite strong and are talked much higher. Nevertheless a good many people are unloading their miscellaneous shares, for they are afraid of labour troubles. I think they are wrong, for I believe that our industrial market has some of the best investments in the Stock Exchange.

JUSTICE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—You very properly ask for opinions. This strike, per se, is of comparatively small importance save for the moment. A transient period, and we shall be as usual again, with perhaps a few more pence added to wages here and there, and naturally a little less straw for the making of bricks. When will mankind learn the greatest of all laws—you cannot add to without taking from?

Instead of fretting over the present eruption between employed and employer—so-called—should we not be better occupied in seeking a solution of the problem that gave us last week in the Labour world?

Is it not the fact that for the past fifty years—ever since the gasp of relief ascended for the completion of the Crimean War—this country has been resting on its laurels, living in a state of false security—asleep? Where have been the Governments, of either party, who have awakened and warned us that Great Britain has but a given acreage, and that Nature favours it annually with four seasons only? Where has been the political foresight at Westminster these past decades that would have averted the labour and capital collisions of to-day? One Government gave us the Suez Canal—thank God! What else has been done save that wholesale making of increasingly bewildering laws which have succeeded in sapping and crippling hopelessly the capital and industries of the country, and have apparently ended in little or no good for the masses for whom they were intended, and were as so much "sop."

Is it without the bounds of calculation that we owe the condition of things as they are to-day between employer and employed to the fact that the masses had the franchise and free education too soon and have lost their heads—thanks largely to the lavender-gloved Labour agitators who, by their cupidity, flourish on the Labour funds both in times of peace and war. The worker thinks he is cute. So, too, is the official agitator!

The John Bull orange has been sucked ravenously by all in power, from the highest to the lowest, for the past five or six decades. During the while we have made unnecessary and unjust wars; caved in at international diplomacy; and accomplished but little politically beyond fulsome talk and blithering bathos. If Science and Art had not been in the rear, God help poor old England! Had there not been private enterprise building up huge businesses where would the country have been? Sovereigns, Cabinet Ministers, Members of Parliament, Judges, Bishops, priests, and deacons ever take but do not create.

Let the employer and employed be told the truth. We may patch to serve a time, but capital is on its last legs. Export figures are of no avail when, as in my business, they represent an article made up or put together of materials and machinery bought from abroad: and which when for sale to America has a 25 per cent. duty plastered on to it. When shall we have a new public Department—a National Business Department?—Yours obediently,

ARTHUR VITTON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The inconvenience to the nation from the anarchy caused through strikes is not the only inconvenience from which it suffers. What about the inconvenience from the anarchy emanating through a breach of legal procedure, not to mention incompetence, on the part of the Government itself? Are we justified in our censure of the strikers when our Prime Minister is himself a striker, a striker of the darkest hue—a State wrecker?

If we appeal for justice, let us have, for our own sakes, a wise and not a mean dispensation of it. Without strikes—and I am not pleading the cause of the agitator who thinks of nothing but filling his own pockets, neither am I sanctioning riots—how are our industrial evils and inequalities to be righted? We all know the prime duty of Government consists in the maintenance of insular unity and peace, but Government policies which are grounded upon economic inconsistencies or contradiction must ever fail in this prime duty.

The fact is, Sir, the nation is made to suffer through its own weaknesses—for giving incompetent persons and law-breakers absolute power. After all is said and done, it is the people, and the people alone, who are to blame, and there is no way of escape from this fundamental truth.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

"WHO PAYS?"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—During the Liberal Party's occupation of office the country has had legislation passed avowedly for the benefit of the Democracy. Admitted that the object of the Liberal Party (especially the out-and-out Lloyd Georgians) may be for the greatest benefit, and has the highest and most pure motive, it must also be acknowledged by every responsible member that in spite of all this beneficial legislation all is not well in the State. The continuous and serious unrest throughout the country, particularly among the Democracy, as evinced by the industrial wars recurring one after another, prove the failure of a policy of government for the benefit of one class, whose vote, but not responsibility or stake, may preponderate over all others, at the expense of and to the detriment of other classes.

The present Government have failed in their highest duty because they have attempted this policy and neglected to govern the land for the common weal. In order to provide the money necessary for the working of all their "wild-cat" schemes they have taxed every capitalist, every employer of labour, penalised every enterprise, and boasted that in so doing they were compelling the rich to contribute more to the support of the poor. But they forgot that they were increasing the cost of production, and consequently increasing the cost of the very necessities of life for that class whom they through their schemes would benefit.

On every side they have been compelled to intervene between Capital and Labour, and every time they have so acted they have seen evidence of the severity of the struggle for existence for both employer and employed. Yet not once have they attempted to remove the cause of these disputes, but have gone on, and on, adding daily to the burden which both have to bear, till now at last they are compelled in this their latest intervention, "to give assurances to the railway companies that they will propose to Parliament next Session that an increase in the cost of labour, due to improvements of condition for the staff, would be a valid justification for a reasonable general increase of charges within the legal maxima if challenged under the Act of 1894." In plain words, the Government have sown the wind and are now reaping the whirlwind, because they are pledged to assist in still further increasing the cost of living.

What honour will the harvest bring when, on every side, in every trade, there is more discontent? The Democracy will find it still more difficult to live, and will demand and fight for yet higher wages until the breaking-point is reached, when capital has been driven from the country, and employment fails. Then the Democracy will arise and demand from the Government and from their own leaders an account of their stewardship, and in the desire for revenge depose all lawful authority. The Democracy will thereupon say, and say truly: "You promised us all these grand measures for our benefit. You told us that the dukes, the landed proprietors, and the bloated capitalists would be made to pay; but we have found that we, the great Democracy, have had to pay, and the benefit is not worth the expense. We have found that it costs us 15 per cent. more to live, and our wages have only increased 5 per cent. We are 10 per cent. worse off now than we were six years ago, and we can get more and greater benefits from our own societies for less expenditure without your help. We have found that the burden you have placed upon us is greater than we can bear, and we demand that you, the Government of this country, shall either place our employers in a more equitable position on the home and foreign markets to enable them to give us more work and higher pay, so that we may bear the load, or give place to better men, who will know our needs, and who will govern the country for the country's good, and not attempt to set class against class, brother against brother, but will seek to legislate so as to bring peace, love, and understanding among all classes in the land, and make us strong as a nation, ready at all times to present a united front to every foe in defence of our interests, our flag, and our King."

T. McLEOD.

West Hartlepool, August 22nd, 1911.

THE REFERENDUM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—Recent events have again emphasised the necessity of ascertaining by means of an impartial referendum the opinion of the public in regard to the wisest means of permanently adjusting the grave differences that exist between capital and labour. As wisdom is not confined to politicians or restricted to Cabinet Ministers, we consider that the collective opinion of the people should always be obtained in reference to matters that directly concern the national welfare. The Independent Political Association is establishing the necessary machinery for taking a referendum of the people on all subjects of supreme importance and particularly in cases where the will of the people is ignored, suppressed, or misconstrued. The questions of Home Rule and Payment of Members are two matters that we desire to submit to a referendum without delay, and the result of the comprehensive poll we propose to take will be published in due course.

I think it will be agreed that work of this character can best be conducted by an independent association without party bias; one, moreover, animated with the object of recording and tabulating public opinion in the exact form it is expressed. Might I be permitted to mention to all interested in this proposal that our ability to carry it out efficiently depends entirely upon the amount of practical support we receive?—Yours faithfully,

S. SKELHORN,

Literary Secretary.

MOROCCO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With the Morocco imbroglio in full swing, a volume just published by M. Lucian Hubert, Deputy, "Politique Extérieure," chez Alcan, Paris, 3f. 50c., is quite a welcome event.

M. Hubert was a reporter of the Algeciras Act in the French Chamber, and his speech delivered at this occasion, and also subsequently on the debate on the same problem, is reproduced in this volume, and show with mathematical precision that the French statesmen were quite prepared to Herr v. Kiderlen-Waechter's coup. In a nutshell, the whole problem is as follows.

The French have to pay the piper and the Germans have to call the tune. Moreover, the latter expect that all countries shall help them, and as nobody is inclined to do it they shout that "the Germans are hemmed in."

M. Hubert quotes also a sentence from the Gazette de Cologne, which shows the German mentality, "You cannot arrest the evolution of a people with a wall of paper." Of course the superman is German's deity, and we have to pay homage to his chief, Herr v. Kiderlen-Waechter.

In this volume is also a report from M. Hubert about the Franco-Belgian Treaty of the 28th December, 1908, and the French pre-emption rights upon the Belgian Congo, which is not yet ratified by the French Parliament. The over-cleverness of the late King Leopold has delayed the discussion and the ratification of this Treaty.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. GERSONY.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As one who is responsible for a "purely phonetic" alphabet, I am not able to agree with all of Mr. Archer's statements on the above subject, though I am thoroughly in accord with his opposition to the use of diacritical marks. The use of the diagraphs, th, sh, ch, &c., is not satisfactory from a scientific point of view; and new symbols are preferable, and are, moreover, already in existence.

Any one who cares to do so may see the result of my own investigations in "The English Language Simplified" (Kegan Paul, price one penny). I regret that only the alphabet and a few illustrative words are there given; but careful experimentation on a large scale has been made and shows the applicability of the system to ordinary use.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

LAST week we insisted that neither Mr. Churchill nor Mr. Lloyd George was entitled to the praise of having brought the railway strike to an end, although both should be commended for their belated efforts to repair the mischief for which they were primarily responsible. The Home Secretary is apparently incapable of learning wisdom by experience, which it is usually said conveys a message even to persons of limited intelligence. In another column we publish an interesting interview with a Justice of the Peace for Liverpool, graphically describing the arduous work and dangers which fall to the lot of these unpaid servants of the public. They do no talking, and therefore there is no suggestion of salaries ranging from £400 per annum. This may possibly be because they do something useful. In this country the paid judiciary numbers about three hundred; in Germany the same work is performed—no better—by nearly two thousand paid Judges and magistrates. It is a little hard that men who willingly give their time, and incur hardships and dangers, such as are depicted in the interview we print elsewhere, should be the sport of an ignorant occupant of the Home Office. This person, as we have said, learns nothing. So late as August 14th, he remitted half the penalty on a man who had very properly been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for being drunk and disorderly, the man having previously been convicted over three hundred times. We lately referred to Mr. Neil Primrose as an incorrigible nincompoop, and we now have the pleasure of including the Home Secretary in the same category.

The agricultural labourer of Norfolk who rashly boasted last week that he would be pleased to “change jobs” with the local clergyman, and challenged the Rev. A. C. Mackie to this peaceful duel, found himself scared at the last moment, and withdrew as gracefully as may be. His challenge was unexpectedly accepted, although, as the layman naturally could not officiate in church, the day chosen was last Saturday. Mr. Mackie was perfectly willing to plough and sow and reap and mow “and be a farmer's boy,” and in consideration of the fact that he had occasionally taken his share in the work of the field he generously agreed to give his friend two hours start. When, however, the belligerent tiller of the soil caught a glimpse of the duties awaiting him, his dreams of a cosy day in the Vicar's armchair with a pipe in his mouth and his feet on the table vanished incontinently; for among the items on Mr. Mackie's programme figured the translation of English into Greek, the preparation of two sermons, the choosing of Sunday's hymns, some house-to-house visiting, and the writing of an address to children. So he backed out, acknowledging, doubtless, that, however faulty the reverend gentleman's hoeing or reaping might prove to be, his own Greek would be faultier still; admitting, too, that there is considerable truth in the old maxim “Each man to his trade.” And perhaps some of his confrères will now recognise that a man who works with his brain in apparent ease may tackle tasks just as important and difficult as those of the man who bears literally the burden and heat of the day. Both play their part, and both are necessary.

Fifty-five original letters of George Eliot, written by her to Mrs. Alma Stuart, have been presented to the British Museum by Mr. Roland Stuart; in the same volume are bound a few letters by G. H. Lewes written to George Eliot. The extracts given in the Times of Monday last are extremely interesting, and show a tenderness and a sympathy which are not always to be deduced from a perusal of her novels. There can be no “more substantial good,” she writes, “than the certitude of having helped another to bear some heavy burthen—of having lessened pain and given the sweetness of fellowship in sorrow. That is just the one good which seems the more worth having the more our own life is encompassed with shadows.” There is not much of the cynic or the stern outlook here, and the letters seem to prove that true character and the true attitude to life are more often betrayed in notes penned at odd times to intimate friends than in the more calculated words which are meant for the world at large.

It is stated that a clever mechanical genius of Berlin—anxious, doubtless, to improve the quality of the human race—has succeeded, after years of labour, in constructing an artificial man. This new species of the genus homo can walk and talk, sing and whistle, laugh and “make all movements.” Whether it can carry on an intelligent conversation, throw unpleasant persons downstairs, answer the bell or play golf is not stated, but at any rate it is reputed to reply to questions and obey certain words of command, and, since it is a life-sized figure practically indistinguishable from flesh and blood a yard or two away, it may have its uses. If only the inventor will give us a man guaranteed not to go on strike we foresee for his factory a huge sheaf of urgent orders, and for himself a large fortune.

REALITY

I.

When we, the old wise Deities
 Who rule by Life's Realities,
 Whose fingers crush the Golden Keys
 And bar the Ivory Gate,
 Would claim a child from cradle-head,
 To Truth's best, sternest service bred,
 To win from lies the long-misled
 And break the spells we hate,

II.

Think you, we to his christening bring
 The gifts whereof our vassals sing,
 The household fire, the marriage ring,
 That gentler fates unfold?
 No! In his hand we lay the dower
 Of stranger gods—a primrose flower,
 An elfin-lamp, a glittering shower
 Of dead-leaf faëry gold!

III.

And thro' youth's tireless nights and days
 We doom him to the dreamer's ways,
 To seek (as men seek us) the praise
 Of our worst enemies;
 By starlit hill and lamplit town,
 We bind him to go up and down,
 And rail against the fair renown
 Of Life's Realities.

IV.

And when we've led him, half his years,
 Far-seeing, in the blinding tears,
 And fearless, in the growing fears
 The long rebellion brings,
 In one quiet hour, we grant him sight
 Of us, unveiled, in his dream's light. . . .
 Did aught but dreams e'er praise aright
 The Sacred Common Things?

THE STRIKE—AND AFTER

THE after-effects of the great strike are making themselves felt, and considerable tact will be required if they are to be prevented from doing further damage. Great Eastern railwaymen are complaining that they have not been reinstated in their old positions—are grumbling angrily because men who honourably fulfilled the duties demanded of them, in spite of the wild appeals of the agitators, have been allowed to retain positions dishonourably vacated by the grumblers. Thus rumours of another sectional railway rebellion are in the air; and in unhappy Wales—where Mr. Lloyd George, taking the opportunity afforded by laying the foundation-stone of a chapel, has been smoothing matters over by reminding the populace that Liverpool was just as bad as Llanelly—the Labour unrest has spread to the coal-miners. We sincerely trust that during the next month or two, while negotiations are in progress, the Rhondda Valley workers will control their inflammable tempers, and strive to see both sides of a question; at present they seem to be of the opinion, to paraphrase a well-known saying, that

“What South Wales thinks to-day England will think to-morrow.”

Meanwhile it may not be out of place to consider briefly one or two points raised in our correspondence columns by our article entitled “The Fruits of Coddle,” appearing in the issue of August 12th. Our chief trouble, said the writer of a letter which we printed the following week, is “the inconvenience” caused by strikes. “Inconvenience” is a mild word; had he said the wicked waste and the danger, he would have been nearer the mark. No objection was made to the workman earning a “living wage;” such an objection would be fatuous indeed. No sane man, whatever position in life he may occupy, objects to fair payment for labour, whether that labour be skilled or unskilled; but when the unskilled worker, adequately paid, clamours for shorter hours and more money (both time and money so gained being, we fear, in the great majority of cases, entirely wasted), there is need for vigorous protest. And when the willing worker, skilled or unskilled, not in sympathy with the strikers and their trail of wastrel followers, is compelled to be idle under threats of bodily harm, where does sanity or justice come in?

For their needs, many sections of the strikers were earning a comfortable wage; those who were underpaid have undoubtedly the right to strive to alter the conditions of their labour, but have not the shadow of a right to wreck or to impede the work of others. Again, relations between employer and employed were “pleasant and profitable” at one time, both to masters and men; the writer of the letter exposes his ignorance by doubting it. His example of injustice is valueless without a knowledge of further facts relative to the men's discharge.

“Their strength,” says our correspondent, “lies in Labour, and Labour only.” How logical, then, to cease work at the bidding of raucous-voiced orators, and to risk misery of every kind! He should descend—or ascend—to the level of a common-sense point of view, and listen thoughtfully to the pathetic distortions of truth to be heard at any Socialist gathering in the parks on any evening, before he puts pen to paper again. “To argue that the dock-hands struck because their wives and children were starving,” said one of our contemporaries in a well-considered leading article, “or, as Mr. Ben Tillett maintains, that it is the Pharaohs of capital who, by hardening their hearts to all appeals, brought about the crisis, is an execrable perversion of the facts. It is far nearer the truth to say that the country has been brought face to face with an industrial war of unprecedented magnitude mainly because Trade Unionism, combined with Socialism, has produced evils which palliatives and mild remedies can never cure.”

The plea of another correspondent, whose letter we published last week, for a “National Business Department” can hardly be taken as a serious suggestion to ameliorate the present situation. With more Departments comes more complication, and already we have as much machinery in motion in the way of Conciliation Boards, Special Commissions, &c., as can be conveniently managed; nor would a “Business Department,” which, in the nature of its constitution, would have to specialise in interference with the work of others, be long in favour. His opinion that the masses, being supplied too soon with free education and fresh liberties, have lost their heads, carries much weight. Into another aspect of the question, raised by “H. C. D.,” concerning the responsibility of the present Government for the extraordinary events of the past month, there is no necessity now to enter. From time to time we have pointed out, and shall continue to point out, that legislative irresponsibility reacts upon, and degrades, and disorganises the very heart of the nation.

W. L. R.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE "CURE" HUMBUG—II.

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

UNDER the electric lights appear all the types of faces which are familiar at Monte Carlo or at Enghien—fair-haired Anglo-Saxons losing their money without turning a hair; callous Slavs, half-drunk, and caring not two straws whether they win or lose; nervous and excitable Italians and French, who seem to feel the loss of a five-franc piece more than the Anglo-Saxon or Slav does his thousands. All the familiar mascots are laid on the table—old knives, bunches of keys, teddy bears, and knick-knacks. But still the game goes on as it has ever done, up and down for the punters, one night ahead and the next down, while every evening the steady dropping of the five francs and louis pieces sounds as the sweetest music to the delighted ears of the proprietor and his shareholders. The third year at Humbugbad has been a gigantic success. It encourages the proprietor and promoters to indulge in a gigantic scheme of advertisement for the following year. Agencies are established in London, Paris, Vienna, and Berlin. The Press is filled with advertisements, and beautiful photographs of the leading features of the district and of the hotels are reproduced in divers colours. Patrons are invited to book their rooms in advance to ensure them.

The promoters, however, are not altogether satisfied with the class of visitors they are attracting. There are not enough of the Anglo-Saxon race, who are the heavy gamblers; and there are not enough well-known names in the society circles of London and Paris who fill the society columns year in and year out. In a word, something must be done to make Humbugbad a little more fashionable. If only a Grand Duke or a meandering-homeless-throneless Prince or a real live Duchess could be induced to come, the future status of Humbugbad would be assured. Then, again, up to the present there has been a singular and most unfortunate absence of coquettes—those vultures who follow wealth and prosperity. Special terms are arranged for the coquettes, but the Grand Duke presents greater difficulties. Steps are taken to find an indigent one who would be delighted to live free of charge for a month or six weeks in such pleasant surroundings. He is found, fixed upon, and approached. Now persons who apply for rooms are informed that those they require are reserved for the "Grand Duke." The news spreads like wildfire. The attraction is irresistible. Applications from the familiar names in the society columns now come pouring in by the score. A record season is anticipated. Especial efforts are made to provide attractions at the Casino. A priceless band is hired; the best companies from Paris are engaged to appear at the theatre; the coquettes come pouring in, and once you have the coquettes and the Grand Duke, there is and can be no looking back.

And what a season that was at Humbugbad! The hotels were filled to overflowing, and yet hundreds were turned away disappointed; the restaurants were nightly packed, and prices went up fifty per cent. all round. The shop from Paris which had set up branches made huge profits. The names of those who dined at the Grand Duke's tables were duly reported day by day in a special article written by "Our Correspondent on the Spot" to the New York Herald. The amount of money which changed hands at the baccarat-tables surpassed the most sanguine expectations. Every evening the Grand Duke sallied forth to try his luck with several thousand francs borrowed from the hotel; but this was willingly given, and repaid throughout the town an enormous percentage of profit.

The season closed in unparalleled splendour with a magnificent floral fête. The promoters saw their last guests depart with a chuckle of joy and devoted the winter months to counting their profits. The coquettes swore to return in a body the following season. Next year the Grand Duke was not invited. The proprietors had still greater ambitions. The process of evolution from an impoverished Grand Duke to a real live reigning monarch is not a difficult one. The proprietors received orders well in advance to reserve an entire floor of the Imperial Hotel for a King. Again the news spread like wildfire. Alterations to provide for the monarch's comfort were made in the rooms. Again the prices went up with a bound. Again another record season was anticipated. But the spring had been a dry one; the summer had been drier still, and the surrounding country was as parched and arid as the Sahara. Six weeks before the season was due to commence the head of the syndicate received the following telegram, "Source dried up; water will no longer flow. What are we to do?" The awful news almost stunned the proprietor. His face turned ashen grey, his hair still greyer. He called a meeting of his directors. Like condemned criminals awaiting the hangman's cart they sat round in solemn silence. They saw the profits and labours of five years dashed from their hands. The last to arrive at this momentous board meeting was the chief doctor of Humbugbad, who had been given a seat on the board. "Why, what is wrong with you all?" he said. "You look scared out of your wits." They broke the news to him. The doctor smiled a cynical smile. "Is that all?" he coolly remarked. "I thought the hotel had caught fire, which would indeed have been a disaster." "But what is the use of Humbugbad without the 'source'?" asked the trembling chairman of the syndicate. "Oh, Humbugbad shall have its 'source' all right," replied the doctor. "But how?" asked a chorus of eager voices. "I can make it by a very simple chemical process," answered the doctor, "provided there is a river or a stream somewhere in the neighbourhood which still flows." "But will it have the same marvellous curative qualities?" asked the chairman, anxiously. "My dear fellow," replied the doctor, dryly, "the chairman of a great syndicate like ours should be a man of the world. Do you suppose that that little, warm, iron-charged stream really does any good or harm to any one? Not a bit of it. It is not the waters which provide those wonderful cures; it is the moderation which people practise whilst taking them which does the good, and carries on all these worn-out, old, over-fed roués and gamblers for another year of dissipation. My chemically prepared water will have exactly the same result, and we need not have any anxiety for the future."

For the next six weeks workmen toiled night and day to divert a stream from the little river half a mile from the "source," and in building a small reservoir underneath the marble cupola and installing the necessary chemical filters and heaters to give it the same warmth and same taste. The work was just completed in time. The royal monarch came, and with him a magnificent retinue of officials, Ministers, favourites, and satellites. Pictures of him, cup in hand, taking his turn in truly democratic fashion with the rest, filled the illustrated papers of the Continent. At the end of six weeks he left, but the head of the syndicate was at the railway station to see him off. Just before the train started some such charming and characteristic incident as the following was duly reported in the Press:—

His Majesty then stepped up to the manager of Humbugbad and grasped him warmly by the hand, saying: "I am delighted with my cure; I have never taken any waters which suited me so well. I feel better than I have felt for years, and will certainly return next year." Then, taking it from his A.D.C., his Majesty handed the manager the Second Class of the Universal Order.

STATE INSURANCE IN GERMANY—II.

OLD-AGE PENSION

THIS is granted to every one of seventy who has paid 1,200 contributions and has maintained his claim. In the five different classes of contributors this pension amounts to £5 10s. per annum in the lowest class, £7 in the second, £8 10s. in the third, £10 in the fourth, and £11 10s. in the fifth and highest class. In each case a subsidy of £2 10s. is contributed by the Imperial Government, the Insurance Institute finding the balance.

THE INVALIDITY PENSION

is somewhat complicated, and I must give some examples to make my meaning clear. The contributors are divided into five classes of wage-earners:

Class I. receiving	£17 10s. p.a. or less.
„ II. „	from £17 10s. p.a. to £27 10s.
„ III. „	from £27 10s. p.a. to £42 10s.
„ IV. „	from £42 10s. p.a. to £57 10s.
„ V. „	£57 10s. and upwards.

Three factors go to make up the pension—

- Firstly, the Imperial subsidy of £2 10s.
- Then a foundation payment equal to 500 times a supposed weekly contribution according to class.

SUPPOSED CONTRIBUTION.	FOUNDATION SUM.
Class I. 12pf. × 500 =	60 marks or £3
„ II. 14pf. × 500 =	70 marks or £3 10s.
„ III. 16pf. × 500 =	80 marks or £4
„ IV. 18pf. × 500 =	90 marks or £4 10s.
„ V. 20pf. × 500 =	100 marks or £5

Should less than 500 contributions have been paid, the missing weeks are reckoned as being in Class I. If more than 500 contributions have been paid the contributions of the lowest class are eliminated.

(c) An increment sum is paid for each week's contribution. These sums amount in Class I. to 3 pfennigs per week, in Class II. to 6, in Class III. to 8, in Class IV. to 10, in Class V. to 12 (10 pf. = one penny).

For different classes of over 500 weeks, the higher 500 count.

Example: 100 contributions in Class III., 150 in Class IV., 50 in Class V., 40 illness weeks (reckoned as payments in Class II.), 160 weeks to make up, reckoned in Class I.: 500 weeks.

Foundation sum—

$$100 \times 80 + 150 \times 90 + 50 \times 100 + 40 \times 70 + 160 \times 60 = 500$$

$$\text{or } 100 \times 16 \text{ pfennigs} + 150 \times 18 \text{ pf.} + 50 \times 20 \text{ pf.} + 40 \times 14 \text{ pf.} + 160 \times 12 \text{ pf.} = 77.80 \text{ marks.}$$

$$\text{Increment—} 100 \times 8 + 150 \times 10 \text{ pf.} + 50 \times 12 \text{ pf.} + 40 \times 6 \text{ pf.} = 31.40 \text{ marks.}$$

Total annuity—50m. Imperial subsidy. 77.80m. foundation sum, 31.40m. increment = 159 marks 20pf., or nearly £8 per annum.

Example II.: 50 contributions in Class I., 100 in Class II., 200 in Class III., 300 in Class IV., 100 in Class V.

The 500 highest contributions are 100 in Class V., 300 in Class IV., and 100 in Class III.

$$\text{Foundation sum—} 100 \times 20 \text{ pf.} + 300 \times 18 \text{ pf.} + 100 \times 16 \text{ pf.} = 90 \text{ marks.}$$

$$\text{Increment—} 50 \times 3 \text{ pf.} + 100 \times 6 \text{ pf.} + 200 \times 8 \text{ pf.} + 300 \times 10 \text{ pf.} + 100 \times 12 \text{ pf.} = 65.50 \text{ marks.}$$

Total annuity—50 marks + 90 marks + 65.50 marks; total, 205.50 marks, or £10 5s. 6d.

A widow's annuity is paid to a widow permanently disabled, or disabled for more than twenty-six weeks, on the death of her husband, he being an insured person. An orphan's annuity is paid for the children under fifteen years of a deceased insured man and for the orphan children of a deceased insured widow. Widow money is paid on the death of the husband. Orphan endowments are paid on the completion of a child's fifteenth year. The Imperial subvention towards each widow's annuity amounts to £2 10s., to £1 5s. in the case of an orphan's annuity, to a single payment of £1 10s. towards each grant of widow money, and of 16s. 8d. towards each orphan's endowment.

The widow's and orphan's pension is made up in addition by contributions from the Insurance Institute concerned amounting to three-tenths in the case of a widow, three-twentieths in the case of an orphan, one-fortieth in the case of every further child of the invalidity pension drawn by deceased, less the Imperial subsidy. Thus if the pension, less subsidy, was 160 marks, and a man leaves a widow and four children, the widow gets £2 10s. State subsidy plus £2 8s., or 48 marks, as her annuity. For the eldest orphan she receives 24 marks, or £1 4s., per annum, and three-fortieths, or 12 marks (12s.) altogether, for the three younger children.

Widow-money amounts to one year's widow-annuity plus a lump sum of £2 10s. paid by the Government. Orphan's endowment amounts to two-thirds the orphan annuity plus a Government contribution of 16s. 8d.

The contributions as recently altered amount in Class I. to 16pf., in Class II. to 24pf., in Class III. to 32pf., in Class IV. to 40pf., and in Class V. to 48pf. (10pf. = one penny), and are paid in equal shares by masters and men, being generally speaking deducted by the former from the men's wages and paid in the form of stamps—a procedure with which we are about to become familiar. The Invalidity Insurance is at present administered by thirty-one Insurance Institutes and ten "admitted Club Institutes," the latter being large semi-public industrial establishments or bodies which, by reason of the guarantees they offer, are allowed to undertake the administration of the law. Both masters and men enjoy equal representation on the Insurance Institutes. Appeals against the decision of these Institutes lie with the Insurance Office (Obersicherungsamt), on which both masters and men have representation, and finally with the Imperial Insurance Office, where like conditions prevail.

I must not forget to call attention to a fact with which the public here are only beginning to be familiar—the great boon that this insurance has proved to be to the working classes as an agent for combating disease.
